It must be plain to any less peculiarly constituted mind than Mr. HOWELL's that Sir CHARLES WARREN neither has nor claims any "power to revise decisions of magistrates." The only "decision" pronounced by Mr. BAGGALLAY was that the girl accused had not been proved guilty of the offence imputed to her. BLOY was not before the magistrate, except as a witness, and the magistrate had no jurisdiction to deal with him. Mr. FOWLER was clearly right when he said that "he regarded the question as one of "internal discipline in the police force." Sir CHARLES seems to have made a very thorough investigation. He examined not only policemen in the same division as BLOY, including the Superintendent who took the charge, but also friends and neighbours of the girl. He came to the conclusion that BLOY had spoken the truth, and he said so in a police order. It has been contended that the inquiry should have been an open one. If it had, there would have been no protection for witnesses, and a repetition of the scandalous farce associated with the name of Miss CASS. The one mistake which Sir CHARLES WARREN made, and which we must admit was a grave one, is that in the official document exonerating BLOY, he reflected, though not in the strong terms attributed to him, upon the decision of the magistrate. That he had of course no right to do, and Mr. MATTHEWS long ago expressed to Mr. BAGGALLAY his regret for the occurrence. Here is a pretty thing to occupy a representative Assembly, overburdened with the affairs of an empire. BLOY, we understand, has been removed from West Ham to Poplar. Mr. BAGGALLAY has received an apology from a Secretary of State. The girl suffered no more hardship than any other defendant who has been acquitted and discharged. Sir AUGUSTUS STEPHENSON, the Solicitor to the Treasury, who instituted an inquiry quite independent of Sir CHARLES WARREN'S, also exonerated BLOY, whom, therefore, it would have been impossible to visit with any penalty. Mr. PICKERSGILL's motion was merely one more attempt, and a miserably unsuccessful one, to get up a case against what Mr. GLADSTONE calls "the admirable police force of the "metropolis." The fount and origin of these attacks is perfectly notorious. Mr. PICKERSGILL and Mr. HOWELL are only tools. If the Metropolitan Police had not in the year 1885 detected and brought to light certain nefarious practices over which it was sought to throw the veil of philanthropy and religion, this defiance of the police would have been left to their old enemies, who do not mingle hypocrisy with crime. Policemen may conduct themselves like other people, as a case heard before Mr. VAUGHAN on Tuesday shows. Indeed, one of the worst results of the disgraceful campaign to which we have referred is, that it tempts all decent people to support every constable and magistrate, whether his acts be wise or foolish, right or wrong.

SIR HENRY JAMES ON UNIONISM.

GREAT credit is due to some Gladstonians for the combination of sadness and mildness with which they have rebuked Sir HENRY JAMES's statement that the Liberal-Unionist members of the Eighty Club were "expelled." This unwonted moderation may perhaps be accounted for by the fact that they are in possession of something like a case—a luxury which has not fallen to the Gladstonian share since the end of 1885, at any rate. As a matter of fact, we believe that the Liberal-Unionists were not expelled from the Eighty Club. That Society, like another and greater thing, is a peculiar institution. It scorns the vain delights of the ordinary temple of luxury and ease. The privileges, advantages, and benefits which its membership confers, as far as profane and disqualified outsiders are aware, consist of the right and duty to work for the Liberal cause, and of the right and duty to entertain distinguished Liberals at dinner and be edified by the words of wisdom that drop from their mouths. It is believed that neither of these privileges was forcibly withheld from Mr. ELLIOT and his fellow-recalcitrants. They were quite at liberty to go on working with the Eighty Club—it being understood that the work of the Eighty Club was to be strenuously directed to the turning out of such of themselves as were members of Parliament from their seats, and to the carrying of the measure to which all of them, whether members of Parliament or not, were as unflinchingly opposed as in "Eighty" all Liberals, save two or three, were. They were perfectly at liberty to entertain and to listen—always provided that no man on their own side was ever to be entertained or listened to, and that they were to supply the dinner, and be paid with the words, of strict Gladstonians only, from Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT and Mr. MORLEY down to, in process of time, Mr. HARRINGTON and Dr. TANNER. On these terms, we believe, they might have continued members of the Eighty Club till the year Eightyhundred, if they and the Club had the secret of such long life. Finding the prospect of belonging to a working and entertaining Club which was working only for their own political destruction and entertaining only their own political enemies not enticing, they ceased to belong to that Club. But they were not expelled.

The crime of Sir HENRY JAMES in making the statement that they were expelled is so great that, we repeat, much credit is due to Gladstonians for their moderation in denouncing it. It is not ever, or indeed often, thus with them now; despite the Pisgah sights of promised (or shall we say promissory?) lands on which Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT from time to time permits his ravished eyes to rest; despite the declaration of Sir GEORGE TREVELYAN that all is well, and despite the fluent fatuity of Mr. HERBERT GLADSTONE. The right which was long ago asserted and vindicated by Gladstonians to the title of the ill-tempered party establishes and confirms itself day by day. We saw last week the mere raving to which, supposing him to be serious, an intelligent man like Mr. LABOUCHERE was reduced; and though the sight of Lord SALISBURY laughing at an impertinent competitor in his (Mr. LABOUCHERE's) own pet project of abolishing the House of Lords has restored Mr. LABOUCHERE this week to good humour and something like good sense, the memory of his description of the Gang will not soon perish. Mr. LABOUCHERE's party at large are even crosser than Mr. LABOUCHERE. As the Government shoots eddy after eddy, and avoids rock after rock, the Gladstonian gloom grows to such an extent that a far-seeing and kindly-minded man may tremble for the chances of their continued belief in Providence, their own earthly Providence of Hawarden. The general favour with which the two great schemes of Mr. GOSCHEN and Mr. RITCHIE have been received has prevented them for the moment from grumbling at these; but the signs of driven-in exasperation are only the more evident. One humble Gladstonian, exhibiting the effect of continued ill fortune upon Irish gallantry, was constrained the other day to relieve his feelings by informing his Irish audience that "English "peeresses are an ill-favoured race"—that was the only word of comfort he could find in a long Parliamentary letter. Others more chivalrous relieve themselves by an additional concentration of wrath upon Mr. ARTHUR BALFOUR, whose relish for abuse must surely have grown by this time as callous as GARRICK's for praise. Sir HENRY JAMES could have had no difficulty in finding a tender place where all is raw.

The late legal adviser, however, of the late Liberal party did not confine himself to improvising jests on the Eighty Club, or to applying afresh those of a poet of our own on the inside-out identity of Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT's uniform. He went back to that general argument on the main question which is sometimes, and by Separatists naturally enough, sneered at as repetition and platitude, but which it is absolutely necessary to keep before the public if the Unionist alliance is to be upheld and the Unionist object kept safe. It is sometimes urged, and again by Separatists naturally enough, that this Unionism, this alliance ad hoc, is a sterile and negative creed, which cannot long continue to inspire a majority of the people of the three kingdoms. To this there are two answers—one of demonstration and the other of retort. In the first place, the alliance has already, in this very Session, produced two great constructive measures, each of more importance in its kind than anything which Mr. GLADSTONE, with his huge majorities of 1868 and 1880, was able even to bring in; and one of these is as good as carried. Further, it is at least possible, and, especially if the Gladstonian attitude remains the same, it is even probable, that the continued amicable working together, at first in independent fashion, of the Tory and Liberal sections of Unionism will produce a distinctly new party. Such a party would aim, as Sir MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH suggested, in his singularly sensible and sound speech to the Primrose League on Wednesday, neither at mere resistance, nor at that continual tinkering with institutions which has been the curse of the last fifty years, but at the kind of foreseeing legislation of which PITT set the example a hundred years ago, and which was only checked by the actual excesses of democracy in France and the threatened imitation of them at home. And, on the other hand, the reproach brought against Unionism recoils with crushing force on the Gladstonian party themselves. There, if they like, is a party with a programme which has no future in it. It is not the programme of the old Liberal party; for, in the first place, that programme is still held complete and unbroken by the Liberal-Unionists with Lord HARTINGTON at their head; and, in the second place, the negation of one of its chief articles has taken the place with the Gladstonians of the affirmation of all the rest. Yet again this negation is quite essentially negative. Every Gladstonian knows that he is fighting for nothing but for some form of Home Rule, and no Gladstonian knows what form of Home Rule he is fighting for. The form of the year before last is officially pronounced to be dead, and is buried under the seal of every Gladstonian leader. No other form has ever been proposed, much less accepted or recommended, by authority. Mr. FREEMAN, the other day—at that beggarly Home Rule meeting at Oxford which contrasted so remarkably with the meeting held last week at the sister University by one section only, and that the smallest, of Cambridge Unionists—said that Home Rulers had a special right to and interest in the toast of the Crown. There is another toast which they can give even more sincerely in the same sense, and that is the toast of Mr. GLADSTONE. Mr. GLADSTONE'S sealed orders, Mr. GLADSTONE'S undisclosed nomination, these are the things, and the only things, that the Separatist party can put its faith or its fortunes upon. It has no other principles, no other programme, and when it goes to the country it must go to the country on a blank schedule of policy. Certainly there could be no greater proof of confidence than the acceptance of such a schedule; but the chief hope of Gladstonians that it will ever be accepted must lie in the continued success of another thing in which the word "confidence" figures—to wit, the confidence trick.

SCARLET TAPE.

WILL anybody be surprised to hear that the water-pipes of a metropolitan householder recently burst? They did so, and the householder sought relief at the hands of a plumber. The plumber, for one reason or another, was not available, and the householder tried to bethink himself of another. One of the consequences of living in a metropolis is not always to know, when your usual arrangements are momentarily out of gear, where to look for a substitute. The householder, therefore, being a person of resource, turned into the nearest post-office, and asked leave to look at the Directory. The clerk told him that it could not be. Being a male he announced these surprising tidings, not with savage glee, but with sympathetic regret. His words were sufficiently remarkable to be recorded. "Sir," he said, "we are not allowed to keep them."

It is not known how long ago this ingenious method of inflicting a petty inconvenience on a large number of the lieges was devised by the mighty intellects brooding over St. Martin's-le-Grand. Nor is it known, or even possible to imagine, how any person can have justified, even to himself, the issue of so ridiculous an order. If there is one place in the world where a Post Office Directory is likely to be useful it is a post-office, and if there is one book in the world which the customers of HER MAJESTY'S Postmaster-General are likely to want to consult it is a Post Office Directory. Why, then, should a privilege which everybody has long made use of without thinking about it be suddenly and arbitrarily abolished? There can be but one answer. In the words of Mr. LEWIS CARROLL, "Because he knows it "teases." Who "he" may actually be does not matter. For practical purposes he is Mr. RAIKES. He either is or has control over the actual culprit, and he is in any case the person responsible to the public. The matter being here and now brought to his notice, he has an excellent opportunity of making himself useful by rescinding the absurd regulation without the loss of an instant. If he does not do so, he will in the next few days cause many innocent persons to hope earnestly that there is some truth in the singular report that he is about to proceed to a remote colony in a high official capacity. The wish may not be in the highest degree altruistic, or in the widest sense patriotic, but it will be natural, intelligible, and widely felt.

THE PASSING OF THE CONVERSION BILL.

THE rapid progress of Mr. GOSCHEN'S conversion scheme through the House of Commons may be a proof of the value of the new Procedure Rules, or it may be only one of various pieces of evidence that the Opposition has been taught to avoid obstruction by observations made during the recess. Of the two explanations the second would be decidedly the most acceptable, though it is not wholly reconcilable with other matters. But to whatever cause the speed may be due, it is satisfactory to find that we have come again to a time in which the House of Commons can attend to business. After a long series of Sessions, in which every day before Easter was wasted in barren and acrimonious talk, it is like a return to health to find an important measure introduced, debated, and carried before an exceptionally early holiday. The Pharisee is not a model we are taught to imitate, but the comparison he made in his own favour was human. In this matter we may, provided it be with Pity, and not with Swelling or Pride, reflect that the scheme has been creditably received by those to whom it must entail inconvenience and even loss. There has been no sign of the unpatriotic selfishness on the part of the bondholders which compels France, for instance, to pay a rate of interest in excess of what is made necessary by its credit. Mr. GOSCHEN'S Bill has been received, if not with enthusiasm—that could hardly be expected from human virtue—still with resignation by small investors, and even by the heavily-burdened and ill-treated race of trustees, on whom it will impose more unremunerated trouble and more responsibility.

The proceedings in Committee last Tuesday seem to have been quoted from the reports of a Session of twenty years ago. Mr. GEDGE was fiercely wroth with the Bill, and called it ill drafted because it did not promise to do what it was never meant to do. But the anger of Mr. GEDGE and his tender regard for the New Threes were neither novel nor troublesome. The attempt to get up a case of bribery against the Ministry on the strength of the commission to be given to bankers might have been annoying in recent times. On Tuesday it failed completely. The scolding of Mr. H. FOWLER, the stern morality of Sir W. HARCOURT, and the grave doubts of Mr. GLADSTONE did not occupy more than a reasonable amount of time. Mr. CHILDERS helped the Ministry materially by pointing out that he had not done what Mr. GOSCHEN is doing. This instantly reminded the House that Mr. CHILDERS'S conversion scheme had been a complete failure, and afforded further reason for taking a very different course from his. The question is a very simple one when it is put in plain words. It is only whether the Ministry, having a piece of work to do in the general interest, is or is not fairly entitled to make a small payment to private persons who give help? There may be no exact precedent for the form of what the Ministry is doing; but there are abundant precedents for the substance, without going to the purchase of the Canal shares, or the more recent action of the Indian Government. It is not seriously pretended that the bondholders will lose anything by the payment of 1*s.* 6*d.* per cent. to the bankers. The commission is given to encourage a part of the business community which can materially facilitate the working of the scheme to exert themselves. To offer it to the bondholders who may manage their business directly would be to pay them for doing their own work—and work which has been made compulsory by Parliament. Mr. GEDGE'S attempt to include the New Threes in this part of the scheme only shows his belief that the commission is in some way a gift made by Government to individuals. The conversion of this stock will be immediate and automatic. There is no occasion here for the intervention of an agent, or even for any action on the part of the bondholder, and therefore no occasion for the payment of any commission. As regards the other stocks, there is need for voluntary co-operation by the public and their agents, and the 1s. 6d. per cent. is offered to stimulate it. The only reason for refusing to give the commission would be that it is excessive or unnecessary; but it has not been proved to be either. The bondholders will gain by a reward which will encourage their bankers to act promptly. Mr. CHILDERS's complaint that the one-and-sixpences may mount up to 150,000*l.*, or even 200,000*l.*, only shows how deeply rooted is the faith that all spending of money is vicious. The larger sum would be a moderate amount to pay to facilitate the working of a measure which will save the State over a million at once, and far more a few years hence. His plan only cost 5,000*l.* in circulars sent out by the Bank of England, it is true; but then it was a complete failure. It is better to give a pound for getting something done than twopence for nothing. If Mr. GOSCHEN wished for a text on which to write an essay on the difference between useful and useless expenditure, he might well take that 5,000*l.* and this 1s. 6d. per cent. The House of Commons showed its view of the matter by a majority of 117.

RECENT POLITICAL SPEECHES.

IT seems at last to be admitted by the Gladstonians themselves that they are not winning. True, they endeavour, while admitting the fact, to examine it for its concealed consolations. Indeed, they are sometimes heard to go further than the well-known saying of one of the historic leaders of their party, and to come near to maintaining, not merely that losing at their favourite game is the next best thing to winning, but that it is the better thing of the two. The precious jewel in the toad's head is so very precious to them, it would appear, that they can hardly bring themselves to speak of its wearer as "ugly and "venomous" at all. Adversity is so invaluable a teacher; it is giving them, as Sir GEORGE TREVELYAN has just said at Cirencester, so exactly "the discipline they want" that they feel it to be ungrateful to complain of its discomforts. This is a very edifying frame of mind, and long may it and its cause continue. That the Unionist party should administer the discipline of adversity, and that the Separatists should do the profiting by it, is a division of labour of which we cordially approve. If the latest electoral defeat of a Gladstonian candidate exercises so salutary an effect upon their political associates, we can only express our hope that, to use a homely phrase, "there is more where that came from." We cannot but fear, however, that the moment the supply of this healthy medicinal agent intermits—as, in the nature of things, it must do now and then—we shall note an instant change in the attitude of pious resignation. The truth is that, as Lord HARTINGTON substantially, though indirectly, put it the other night at Carlisle, the party which follows Mr. GLADSTONE are unable to resist either the elating or the depressing effect of the only signs which they look for or care about in political controversy. Their "final and con- "clusive argument against us is," said Lord HARTINGTON, "that we are a small party, that we are diminishing, and "are speedily to be swept away into political insignificance. "And these facts, if they are facts, which we deny, seem "to be held up as reasons why we should change our "opinions." To Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT, who is the largest dealer in the taunt in question, they are reasons, and, what is more, the only reasons which he practically recognizes, why men should change their opinions. The year before last Sir WILLIAM and the other converts among whom he was the most distinguished made the, for them, most mortifying blunder of shouting with the crowd which proved not to be the largest. Their only hope now, since the other crowd would now naturally object to the addition of their voices, is that the relative proportion of the two crowds may be transposed. That is for them the beginning and end of politics. This is the one practical question of absorbing interest, which eclipses all speculative issues whatever. How, then, can they help being elated or depressed, according as they think they see signs that their crowd is beginning to exceed the other, or that it is maintaining its original level of inferiority? And how should they be elated or depressed at anything else?

Unionists, as the leader of their Liberal wing points out, have principles which they are glad to know have controversially triumphed; and under sporadic electoral defeats they can always sustain themselves with the hope that right reason will prevail again, as it has prevailed before, with the constituencies as a whole. At the same time it is natural and legitimate to rejoice in moderation at all contemporary signs of success, and the eminently cheerful tone of Lord HARTINGTON's last speech is fully justified by recent events. The County Government Bill is, of course, a measure altogether to his taste, and he no doubt regards it with satisfaction, as notably strengthening the Unionist alliance on its Liberal side. In connexion, too, with this subject he took occasion to correct a current misrepresentation of his views on the matter of Local Government in Ireland. He repudiated the declaration attributed to him by Mr. MORLEY that "the Irish people should never have self- "government till they had renounced the idea of nationality." It is characteristic of that nebulous school of politicians with which Mr. MORLEY has chosen to associate himself that they should regard a practical statesman of Lord HARTINGTON's type as in the least likely to trouble himself about the renunciation of so vague an "idea." One might as well say that the Irish could not with safety be admitted to this or that political privilege until they formally recanted the belief that Ireland is "the first flower of the earth and first "gem of the sea." The important question is not whether they retain or renounce an "idea of nationality," but whether they persist in or desist from the attempt to compass certain definite political ends which are dangerous to the interests of the United Kingdom. Lord HARTINGTON, however, goes further than this, and to a point to which we at least are not prepared to follow him. "I do not believe," he said, "that the Irish need necessarily abandon their demand for "a separate Parliament before they receive the boon of "increased local self-government. All I ask is that Parlia- "ment should satisfy itself before it gives assent to a measure "largely extending powers to popular bodies in Ireland "that the Executive Government retains in its hands all "the powers which are necessary for the enforcement of "order and for the enforcement of justice between class and "class and between man and man." Surely, however, we may further ask that Parliament should satisfy itself that the extended powers thus conferred upon popular bodies in Ireland are not capable of being diverted, or, at any rate, are not likely to be diverted, to the promotion of the movement for a separate Irish Parliament.

The melancholy contrast between the moods of the two parties receives further illustration from a comparison of Sir MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH's animated address of last Wednesday, at the East End, with those chastened utterances of Sir GEORGE TREVELYAN to which we have already referred. Although a preacher of resignation, and of the acceptance of the schooling of adversity, Sir GEORGE is not altogether successful in the practice of those virtues. Much of the speech which he prefaced by the admirable exhortations above mentioned was somewhat querulous in tone, and it contained throughout a great deal more complaint than argument. What, for instance, is to be said of this protest against the "singular unfairness" with which the Irish members are treated? "When people wanted "to justify the severities used against the Irish members "they were in the habit of quoting from speeches made "by them years ago, at a time when one of the great British "parties, under the guidance of its great leader, had not "declared itself to be in earnest to do justice to Ireland." We can quite understand Sir GEORGE TREVELYAN's dislike of quotations from speeches made years ago, or even from those made not many months ago; but, as a matter of fact, the process is not in the least necessary for the purpose for which it is stated to be employed. "When people want to "justify," what Sir GEORGE calls—but only in the case of some half-dozen men of conspicuous position, and not in that of the scores of obscure persons who are undergoing them in Ireland—"severities against the Irish members," they do not need to quote, and, in fact, would gain nothing by quoting, from speeches made by these members years ago. What people do quote from are speeches made only weeks or days ago—speeches actually inciting to those offences which bring down "severities" on those whom they lead astray, and richly deserving, therefore, of the punishment meted out to them. And when Sir GEORGE TREVELYAN, who has himself assisted to govern Ireland under a far sterner code of law than exists at present, talks of the "persecution of "Irish members, both inside and outside Parliament, going "on with greater barbarity than ever," we can only marvel at the judicial fatuity which seems to overtake even the best intelligences once prostrated before Mr.

GLADSTONE's. What may it be, this "persecution"? Is it perchance the plank-bed—that disciplinary couch with which Sir GEORGE TREVELYAN a few years ago, nothing doubting of the excellence of his own motives, and never for a moment suspecting himself of "barbarity," provided Mr. TIMOTHY HARRINGTON? No wonder Sir GEORGE contends that "a "man should be judged by his speeches of to-day," though even that stipulation indeed is not altogether a safe one; for, if the yesterday speeches of the former Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant cannot, according to his present views, be regarded as doing much honour to his heart, his speeches of to-day are singularly unfruitful of credit to his head. Such a deliverance as that of the other night at Cirencester—so futile in point of thought, so peevish and petulant in tone—is indeed a pitiable falling off from the earlier reputation of one who was wont to be among the brightest and most incisive of political speakers. It is an "awful example" of the consequences of straying from the straight route and firm foothold of the Unionist path into the jungle and morass through which the wretched followers of Mr. GLADSTONE are condemned to flounder after their leader.

THE ESERCITO SCARE.

AS the Esercito is said to be well informed, and not alarmist, it must be supposed to have some authority for the startling story it has set going this week. Its little piece of news is of the most stirring character as it stands. If the Italian military paper is to be believed, France was some weeks since "on the point of making a coup de main "on Spezia." The Ministry of Marine at Paris had its plan and its aim, and the ships were almost ready. On the other hand, the Italian Government was not ready, and when it was informed of the good intentions of its neighbour had to make frantic preparations both at Spezia and Genoa. Things were soon on a different footing; and, if the declaration of war, which was to have preceded the actual sending of the French squadron by a few hours only, had ever actually come out, it is to be presumed that the assailants would have found à qui parler.

When a story of this kind is published by a paper with a reputation to lose and known to enjoy official inspiration, it must be presumed to be published for some purpose. As to the truth of the details, we do not profess to have an opinion. The report may be substantially accurate, and yet not be of much actual importance. A few weeks since may mean the time when France and Italy were at the height of their dispute over the irregularities of the French Consul and the Italian Pretor at Florence. If that is so, then the Ministry of Marine at Paris may very possibly have prepared a plan for an attack on Spezia in case the war which M. FLOURENS seemed to be anxious to provoke did actually break out. No doubt, too, the Ministry would be disposed to show how smart it was by having its squadron ready within a few hours of the publication of the declaration. That an attack on the chief Italian arsenal would be undertaken if ever the countries were actually to begin fighting was always well known. But, though all this may be true, it does not follow that France was getting ready, or is inclined to make an attack on Italy out of pure malignity. If the Italian Government happens to have a dispute with its neighbour, it ought in common prudence to be prepared to see its quarrel end in open war, and to prepare accordingly. So the story in the Esercito may have some historic truth, and yet may be more disquieting than much that appears daily. More interesting than any evidence of the truth of the story would be some account of the Esercito's reasons for publishing it at this time. A Continental paper of a semi-official character does not usually print even thoroughly trustworthy information likely to cause alarm except for a definite purpose. If the Esercito thinks proper to make its information public at this moment, and the Riforma, an undoubtedly official paper, is allowed to confirm the story in a way, it may be taken for granted that the Italian Government and War Office have some reason for letting it do so. The secrets of rulers are good things to guess at—if a man likes the amusement, which is somewhat idle—but the significance of the Esercito's story is patent enough. France and Italy are on the worst possible terms. The incident at Florence, the other incidents on the frontier, the riot at Arles, and the denunciation of the treaty of commerce, with all the angry talk and legislative action which have followed, are all proofs of the ill humour of both parties. On the French side there is a firm conviction that the Italians are an ungrateful, upstart nation, which owes everything to France and forgets its obligations. On the Italian side there is an equally settled belief that France, after paying itself for its trouble in '59 by taking Savoy and Nice, wants to be paid in subservience also, and would like to play Russia to Italy's Bulgaria. There is a good deal to be said on both sides, for the Italians have been unblushingly cynical, and the French are as incapable as ever of thinking that there can be any reciprocity of services between themselves and their neighbours. That any nation can be justified in considering its own interests first and those of France afterwards, is what has never appeared credible to the French mind. The mere notion of such a thing fills them with disgust and perfectly unaffected moral indignation. Both parties being in this frame of mind, they are, of course, prepared to believe anything of one another; and that explains how a serious paper like the Esercito can gravely assert that France was about to make a piratical attack on Spezia. Some basis there probably is for believing in the existence of that plan at the Ministry of Marine; but it would require a stronger and more daring Government than has been seen of late years at Paris to play the very dangerous game described by the Italian paper. But, whatever amount of truth there may be in the story, the existence of feelings of anger and distrust on both sides is one of the most serious features of the dangerous general position in Europe.

IMPERIAL FEDERATION.

THE Imperial Federation League is entitled to think nobly of itself at all times, and speak well of itself at its annual meeting. Perhaps those evil times, when "the "Empire lay listless all over the world, politically passive," were not so evil as Lord ROSEBERY is bound to represent. The Empire's passivity never extended to the stoppage of its growth. It could always digest and grow bigger, which were the most important things it had to do; and, if it did not find it necessary to stop every moment and take note of its increase in size, that was no sign of want of health. A countryman of Lord ROSEBERY's was of opinion that it was exactly the reverse. However, the period of excellent or not excellent passivity is over, and the Empire has taken to listening to itself. Happily what it says by the mouth of the Imperial Federation League is what we like to hear it say. The Empire is not only conscious of its unity, but satisfied with it. The examples of the growth of Imperial sentiment cited by Lord ROSEBERY are very pleasing. The formation of the Australasian squadron and the presence of Australasian gentlemen in the House of Commons are both excellent signs. Perhaps Lord ROSEBERY himself is not the least encouraging example of the growth of a feeling favourable to the unity of the Empire. The wind must have been blowing strongly in that direction when a member of his Lordship's party can talk about the greatness of the Empire as a thing worth preserving, and even can display "Imperial sentiment," though the word and the thing are associated with the memory of a late wicked Tory statesman, who excited the wrath of the virtuous by insisting on their value.

We do not like the League the less because it has made its mind up not to try to cut Parliament up and turn it into something new. The wind has not been blowing in that direction of late, as Lord ROSEBERY knows, and it is wiser in the League not to wish to replace the historic Parliament of England by any brand-new invention on the lines of the Legislative Chamber of the last territory admitted to form one of the United States. How many of the members of the League agree with Lord ROSEBERY in thinking that it would be desirable to have a "Senate" in London consisting in part of Colonial representatives who would take a share in general government we do not know, though we guess. For the rest, it does not greatly signify, since they have all decided to allow this imaginary Senate to remain in the condition of pious wish. In that state it can do no harm. The Leaguers will deserve the character of practical men claimed for them by Lord ROSEBERY by agreeing to take it for granted that—as he himself put it—we have the essentials of any possible Imperial Constitution already. It may seem that, if this is so, the Imperial Federation League has no further reason for its existence. But it would be cruel to extinguish a patriotic body which is doing no harm, and is even anxious to forward the doing of some good. It may innocently hold its yearly meeting, and eat its dinner. If it also "keeps a "vigilant eye" on the public good, that will do no manner of injury. The objects on which the Chairman asked it to direct that eye are worth watching. He spoke of "the different "requirements for Imperial defence that lie outside these "islands," a phrase which probably owes some of its form to the reporter, but conveys a sufficiently distinct meaning. He also urged the League to do its best to facilitate communication between the different parts of the Empire, to utilize every organization and opportunity "that may seem to offer "a chance of drawing our different commonwealths closer "and closer," to further Colonial aspirations in that direction, and generally to preach the word at home and in the Colonies. If the League does these things, said Lord ROSEBERY, "the scattered peoples of one race under our flag "will recognize more and more deeply the unity of the "Empire in sympathy and interest and aim. And when "that is done, our work will progress of itself." What the work is, unless it is the formation of the Senate aforesaid, is not particularly clear. When the mother-country and the Colonies have realized the unity Lord ROSEBERY describes, the work, we take it, will be done—and we are by no means sure that it has not been done already. Neither is it very clear how the League as a body is helping the work on. There need be no cavil on that point, however. The League does reasonable service, after all, by meeting and dining yearly in the cause of unity. It could not choose a finer symbolical illustration of what friendly union means.

GENERAL BOULANGER.

THE result of the Court of Inquiry which is to be held on General BOULANGER'S alleged misconduct cannot be doubtful. Whether the General came to Paris in a pair of blue spectacles or not does not greatly matter. There can be no doubt that he came to Paris without leave. He has confessed it himself, and does not even attempt to deny that he came not only without leave, but in spite of a refusal of the permission which he had asked. This was, of course, distinctly insubordinate conduct. It may be the case, as General BOULANGER has asserted, that leave is never refused to a divisional commander who wishes to visit Paris on private affairs; but the mere fact that it was refused to him shows that he was not considered to be in the same position as other officers of his rank, and the refusal was substantially an order to remain at his post. In order to prove that he has not been guilty of insubordination, General BOULANGER must show that it is a recognized practice in the French army for divisional commanders to leave their commands in defiance of the Minister of War. He will hardly be able to prove that, and the Court of Inquiry must condemn him as a matter of course. No doubt the journey to Paris is a pretext for the proceedings against him. He has been dismissed, not because he has broken a regulation of the service, but because he is believed to be playing a political rôle. But that was only what he might have expected. A general who wishes to impose himself on the Government of his country should take care not to give his enemies an advantage over him. It is quite possible that General BOULANGER provided the pretext and provoked the dismissal.

Whether General BOULANGER will be effectually silenced by expulsion from the army is, however, very doubtful. He will, of course, be rendered unable to head a military rising, except in the very improbable case that the French army is ripe for a revolt. The General himself, doubtless, never intended to imitate the proceedings of Spanish generals of the old stamp. His hope must have been that he would attain power by making himself generally popular. It is not at all clear that he will be less able to do that as a civilian than as a soldier. He is certainly not popular with the people of Paris, or at least with that part of them which makes its opinion known through newspapers of standing. But, then, neither was Prince LOUIS NAPOLEON, and yet he became both President and Emperor. The discreditable incidents of the General's career are not worse than early incidents in the life of the Emperor NAPOLEON III. The letters to the DUC D'AUMALE answer to the landing at Boulogne, and the blue spectacles, if they are not imaginary, are equivalent to the contemptible fiasco at Strasburg. Compulsory retirement from the army will not even make it impossible for General BOULANGER to carry through a coup d'état; for, if he is ever in a position of sufficient influence to make one at all, he will readily find another ST.-ARNAUD to do the military part of the work for him. Everything depends on whether he can attain to that position or not. If the probability is to be judged of by the qualities of the men at present at the head of the French Government, it may be said to be very considerable. The whole body of Republican politicians are obviously thoroughly afraid of the General. They have watched him, set spies on him, and seized on a technical excuse for getting rid of him. Of course this has marked him out more distinctly than ever as the natural leader of all those Frenchmen who regard the Third Republic with contempt. Their number is considerable; and, if they were ably led, the present race of politicians could be easily swept aside. The Chamber is showing itself more and more incapable; it will neither govern nor allow others to govern. An astonishing instance of its haste and incompetence has been given during the passing of this year's Budget. On the recommendation of the Budget Committee, a number of fiscal changes were accepted, which abolished taxes to the amount of 300,000,000 francs. They were mostly taken from the Excise on alcoholic drinks. When the Chamber, which had left the discussion of the Budget till the eleventh hour, and was working with frantic haste and excitement, discovered that it had thrown away this enormous slice of the revenue of France, and had not even thought of any alternative resource, it suddenly undid all it had just done, and replaced the repealed taxes in a lump. No Chamber can long survive the contempt which must be caused by such frivolous stupidity as this, and it is only one example out of many. The whole administrative business of the French Government is conducted in the same way. The finances of the country are in a state which threatens to illustrate once more what Mr. CARLYLE called the greatness of bankruptcy. The immense wealth of France is taxed to the extremity of even its power of paying. In spite of this, however, the waste and extravagance in all the Government offices is greater than it has ever been since the fall of the old Monarchy. The floating debt is accumulating with astonishing rapidity, and the Government only gets on from month to month by renewing its bills, by paying enormous interest (considering how good the credit of France is) for temporary accommodation, and by the expedients of an impecunious tradesman. It is impossible that this can continue much longer without leading to a crisis. There is no political ability in the Chamber, no organized parties capable of governing, no common principles or common aims to keep men together. France has been misgoverned and oppressed before; but even during the years just before the Great Revolution it was never in such a welter of feeble incompetence. Unless it is to sink into utter insignificance, there must be a speedy and complete change. How it is to be brought about is, no doubt, a very obscure question. Neither Bonapartist nor Royalist leaders occupy a position which promises well for their success in seizing power. M. CLÉMENCEAU, the only untried politician in the Chamber, has never given any sign that he is other than a wire-puller and windy speechifier. M. FERRY is hated with extraordinary rancour. There is certainly nothing intrinsically improbable in the opinion held by some observers that, if General BOULANGER plays his part as a politician with judgment and spirit, and a proper contempt for the mob of little men in the Chamber, he may sweep them all out of his way. To be sure, he has not yet proved that he has much more governing faculty than his cousin M. CLÉMENCEAU, but at least he has not shirked office, and has not confined himself to intriguing with no visible object, except to make government by other men impossible.

THE ARREARS BILL.

AMONG the many excellent reasons which justified the Government in declining to reopen the question settled by the Land Act of last year, it would have been quite sufficient for them to have relied upon one alone. All that could possibly be represented as equitable in Mr. PARNELL'S Bill was offered to him and his followers under Mr. POWELL WILLIAMS'S amendment; and as they rejected that offer last Session, so did they this year decline to entertain it. The theatrical indignation of Mr. DILLON—that picturesque and romantic patriot, who, by some unfortunate chance, is continually being put, like any prosaic HEALY or O'CONNOR, to the defence of his veracity—cannot make people forget one of the most significant passages in the Irish debates of 1887. It is the simple fact that the Parnellites had last year the fullest opportunity of including the tenant's arrears of rent in the relieving operation of the Act, on the bare equitable condition that he should be prevented from going to the County Court to get the debt to his landlord cancelled, and then paying twenty shillings in the pound to the small shopkeeper and the gombeen man. Not only did they decline this opportunity, but they displayed much irritation and uneasiness at the mere circumstance of its being presented to them. Mr. DILLON is quite mistaken in supposing that the public have forgotten the contortions of the Irish party in wriggling out of acceptance of a proposal which, though obviously just in itself, was most distasteful to a class of tenants' creditors whom, in the interests of the National League, it would be most undesirable to offend. These humiliating gymnastics, we can assure Mr. DILLON, are perfectly well remembered; and, though we can understand his annoyance at being so pointedly reminded of them in debate, he ought to reflect that the mere form of the issue submitted to the House in the amendment to Mr. PARNELL's motion for the second reading of his Bill would alone have served the same purpose as Mr. CHAMBERLAIN's and Mr. BALFOUR's speeches. Mr. PARNELL and his party had before them the proposition that "no Bill providing for "a composition of arrears of rent in Ireland will be satis-"factory to this House and effectual for the relief of the "tenants which does not at the same time deal with their "debts to other creditors than the landlords." Having this proposition before them, they elected to support instead a proposal to deal only with the debts due by the tenant to his landlord. It does not need to be a profound politician to understand the meaning; it needs only to be an intelligent and honest man. And, inasmuch as the majority of Englishmen, though not professed politicians, are intelligent and honest, we can leave the question to their judgment in perfect repose of mind.

We are, however, very far from admitting that, even if the Parnellites make such a concession to conscience as would have been needed in the acceptance of the amendment, the case for further "relieving" legislation would have been established. Mr. T. W. RUSSELL, who seems a little too ready to believe that a unique political position gives a necessary title to supreme political influence, would have done well to more closely examine the basis of his Bill—a little less objectionable one than Mr. PARNELL's—before submitting it to the House. As it was, his case was quite unequal to sustaining the destructive attack of the CHIEF SECRETARY for IRELAND. Mr. RUSSELL's two main propositions—that, if a rent has been "unjust," the arrears must be unjust, and that it must have been unjust if it has been reduced by a Land Court—afford melancholy proof of the moral and mental chaos to which the legislative methods invented by Mr. GLADSTONE have reduced plain men's understandings. The words "just" and "unjust" have probably undergone harder usage within the last ten years than they have suffered since the days of the Sophists. We will content ourselves for the present with asking Mr. RUSSELL to explain to us why it is that, if the arrears of a rent which has been subsequently reduced are "unjust," the excess of returns from a holding the rent of which has been subsequently raised are not unjust also. The cases are precisely analogous; and, if the landlord has no moral claim to the arrears of a rent which, by the assumption, is more than the land is worth, the tenant cannot possibly have a moral claim to retain that part of his profits which arose from his having held the land at less than its value. But one point alone in Mr. BALFOUR's excellent and closely-reasoned speech would have been sufficient for the answering either of Mr. RUSSELL or of Mr. PARNELL. The County Court judges already have the power to spread arrears over a number of years when the tenant shows that his indebtedness is not "due to his own act or default." Yet this power has only been exercised in one-quarter of the cases that have come before them. What would be likely to be the proportion of cases in which a County Court judge would exercise a discretion of wiping out the arrears altogether? No answer was given to the question by Mr. HEALY, who followed Mr. BALFOUR, and than whom no one is more capable of finding an answer if it were possible; and the point was of course beneath Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT's rhetorical notice. Yet it is really decisive of the whole controversy.

OBSTRUCTION AT LAST.

AT last the Parnellites have broken through the restraints which have been placed upon them, and, with the assistance of a few distinguished recruits, have tried their hands again at the game which recent Procedure reforms have made so difficult and unprofitable to them. Of course their case was a most plausible one—it always is. Indeed, it almost always used to be, even in the days when they were not compelled to satisfy the proprieties represented on the front Opposition bench. Mr. HEALY denied, for instance, that he had used any "threat" of obstructing the Criminal Evidence Bill. He had merely "expressed his "intention of exercising his constitutional right of oppo-"sing the measure." In the exercise of that constitutional right he will have the assistance of some of Mr. GLADSTONE's late official colleagues; while the grounds of his opposition are supported, it is fair to add, though it is somewhat singular to have to do so, by a speaker of no less authority, personal and professional, than Sir HENRY JAMES. Mr. HEALY and his friends are vehemently hostile to the proposal to allow an Irish prisoner to tender himself as a witness in his own case. They admit, as the House generally was agreed, that it might be a good thing to allow English prisoners to do so, but in Ireland a different state of things prevailed. And this position Mr. HEALY proceeded to fortify by a series of arguments which have, so far as we can see, no sort of application to a proposal which cannot affect one single prisoner in Ireland, unless he chooses. Nevertheless, the contention was taken up by Mr. MORLEY and Sir HENRY JAMES, the latter of whom, however, argued against the extension of the Bill to Ireland, not so much, as we understand him, on the merits of the case as on the general ground that it is inexpedient to give any benefit to the Irish people unless with the approval of their representatives. Although he thought that the Irish members would in this case be teaching the people wrongly, "yet they would," he continued, "teach the "Irish people that this was a hostile measure, and if they "did that, might it not be that the Irish criminal" (Sir HENRY JAMES must clearly have meant "prisoner") "would "take up an attitude of dogged hostility to the measure, and "always refuse to go into the witness-box?" But, if so, who would be injured? And what would become of Mr. HEALY's fear of "conferring on removable magistrates the "power to cross examine the prisoners deprived of the "protection of a jury"? Sir HENRY JAMES deserves thanks for having so clearly brought out the fact that the Bill "confers no power on removable magistrates," as suggested by Mr. HEALY's amendment, but that it would rest solely with the prisoner to confer or withhold these powers himself.

It cannot, of course, be a matter of much importance whether the provisions of this Bill are extended to Ireland or not. No doubt it would be rather hard upon an Irish prisoner, who might be able to demonstrate his innocence if made a competent witness in his own case, that he should be debarred of the privilege because the member for North Longford desires to embarrass HER MAJESTY's Ministers; but that, after all, is the affair of the Irish constituencies. Every electorate must be assumed to have the representative, just as every nation may be assumed to have the kind of Government, which it deserves. Ministers would, of course, be fully justified in declining to extend the benefit of a new law to Ireland in the face of the factious opposition of Irish members, and whether they should or should not take this course at some future stage of the measure is a point worthy of consideration. But they were undoubtedly right in resisting the attempt to force their hands on Thursday night, and in vigorously employing the Closure to defeat it. Mr. PARNELL, who, as the leader of the House remarked, had abstained for five hours from taking part in the debate, can have no possible right to complain of being shut out by the motion of Closure at half-past ten, the more especially as he was allowed a subsequent opportunity, under rather unusual circumstances, on which we trust that the SPEAKER will not permit a precedent to be founded, of addressing the House. The acrimonious discussion which followed on the question of fixing the next stage of the Bill was of a kind familiar enough in these cases. The only novelty was the active participation in it of occupants of the front Opposition bench. It would have been better if Mr. MORLEY and Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT had held aloof from the dispute and had intervened at a later moment, so as not to have left it to a colleague of Mr. SMITH's to repudiate on his behalf a charge of "discourtesy" which they must well know to be grossly unjust.

A JAPANESE PICTURE-BOOK.

THERE are many excellent things, as we have shown, in that exhibition of Chinese and Japanese art which Mr. Colvin, with admirable taste and judgment, has arranged in one of the rooms in the new White Building in the British Museum; but there is nothing more entertaining than the set of makimonos by some artist of the Yamato-Tosa school, in which are figured the adventures of the heroic Minamoto no Yorimitsu, otherwise known as Raikō, and the companions with whose aid he exterminated that dreadful ogre, the Shiūten Dōji, or Drink-bewildered Boy—the devourer of maidens, the ravening demon, who oppressed the "sea-surrounded, dragon-fly-shaped land" which is Nippon somewhere about the year of the Christian era 947. The story, says Mr. Anderson, "is as well known in Japan as that of Jack the Giant-Killer in England," and has been a theme for the Yamato-Tosa men from the thirteenth century onwards. As old at least as the seventeenth century, the set of illustrations included in the British Museum collection are marked by all the characteristics of the style, and are probably as representative of the ideal and the mannerisms of the gifted Fuji-wara no Tsunē-taka, the founder of the academy, as a man living four centuries later could make them. Their material is paper; they are thirty-four in number; in Mr. Colvin's selection, which is perfectly efficient, and tells the story with a fine regard for its more picturesque and romantic qualities, we are presented with full twenty-three, in which the tale is told almost from the beginning of time and altogether from the beginning of the action. They are arranged in the first two show-cases on the floor of the room, and in Mr. Colvin's Catalogue their numbers run from 134 to 157.

To our mind the Yamato-Tosa men were the least artistic and the most absurdly conventional of all the painters of Japan. Their colouring was shockingly crude; their drawing is absurdly inhuman and inexpressive; to show the inside of a house their genius was equal to nothing more intelligent than the device of taking the roof off, and asking one to look in on the interior from a point of view impossible to any save the intimates of the limping Demon known to Don Cléofas; and they have other qualities which go far with western critics to affirm the superiority of such men as Hōku-sai and Yō-sai and—speaking generally—the draughtsmen of a later age. But it is not to be denied that they have plenty of grotesque invention and a fine enough feeling for pictorial romance; and they who doubt it have but to turn from this series of drawings to the excellent "Night March of the Hundred Demons" (No. 33 in Mr. Colvin's Catalogue) hard by to have their doubts removed and experience the inception of a genuine sense of admiration and regard. In some ways, to put the matter briefly, the Yamato-Tosa artists were common idiots; but in others they were men, if not of genius, at least of remarkable and sterling talent. This is obvious in such specimens of their work as Mr. Colvin has thought fit to exhibit; and it is most obvious of all, as we think, in this particular set of pictures They are the work of a man in whom the sentiment, the gift, the faculty—call it what one will—of illustration was native and vigorous. He saw his motives clearly; he reproduced them as exactly as he could; and, having looked at them with a certain care, it is found, upon reflection, that we know the whole of the story as a commentary upon which they are designed. The merit is not so common in western illustration as might be supposed. We are nothing if not "artistic," and to tell a story graphically is the last thing to which, as a rule, our illustrators will condescend. They do not think of their author, and they think still less of his public; what they are concerned with is the "pictorial quality"—or words to that effect—of their own work; and the consequence is that nineteen times out of twenty they produce a commentary that is merely feeble as art, and that has no apparent connexion with the subject-matter of their theme. They do not elucidate—they confuse; they do not illustrate—they bewilder. They might do worse than go and learn their trade of a man (unknown) whose colour and drawing will make them shudder, and whose idea of (say) a cloud is scarce less rudimentary and inexact than the concept Mrs. Todgers would have invented of a wooden leg.

Mr. F. V. Dickins, in an excellent translation, first printed in the Journal of the Royal Asiatic Society, is inclined to believe that the original Shiūten Dōji was one of the autochthones, the yebisu, who, declining to be altogether dispossessed by the Japanese proper, took valiantly to the hills and defied the Mikado steadily, until some legendary hero, some Yoshitsunē or Yorimitsu, went out against them with bow and blade, and brought the heads of them back to Kiyôto. The leader of these bands of savages was not always, Mr. Dickins opines, of the yebisu; he was now and then a Japanese of independent mind and no particular morality; and of such a desperado the legend of the Shiūten Dōji may well be a memory. In Mr. Dickins's version "the incidents of the story," we are further informed, "are not unskilfully put together," while "the reflections scattered through it . . . sketch, after a fashion not less instructive than quaint, the half-official piety and wholly conventional loyalty" (both very good things in their way, we may note) "that were regarded as the main elements of civic virtue" under a dynasty that need not further be particularized. The series of pictures secured by Mr. Anderson, and set out in Mr. Colvin's cases, were once, it is understood, "the illustrations of a set of mackimonos," but "have been divorced from the text apparently for the reduction of bulk." The story they tell is as grotesque and withal as gruesome—as quaint in incident and as grim as regards essentials—as any we remember to have heard. As edited by Mr. Colvin in pictures and by Mr. Dickins in prose, it is very well worth study; and such of our readers as may care to visit the White Building and the Print Room, and thereafter to get sight of Mr. Dickins's paper—from which we have quoted freely—will secure themselves a good deal of entertainment, and will, besides, obtain some glimpses of a new and quite extraordinary world.

The Shiūten Dōji and his band of demons, it must be understood, have long been the terror and the scourge of the surrounding district. None of the neighbouring virgins were secure; and the scandal reached its height when the daughter of a certain Kunimasa—a young person "of marvellous beauty of face and form"—disappeared "one night about midnight, and could not again be found." In his despair the afflicted parent took counsel of "a right skilful physiognomist whose name was Seimei," and of whom it was said that "demons and goblins had little chance with him." Seimei "laboured at his art" for some seven days and nights, and then informed Kunimasa that his daughter was not dead, but the captive of a demon whose lair was situate in the Senjō ga Take—the Peak that is Ten Thousand Feet High—and that by the use of exorcisms she might be restored to the society of her sorrowing friends and relations. Kunimasa hastened to repeat the report of the right skilful one at the Court of his master the Mikado, Murakami Tennō; and there in solemn council, on the advice of a certain Minister, it was resolved to call in the aid of one Yorimitsu, "a pillar of the military nobility, in strength unrivalled, in bravery without equal, in war invincible"—a man, in fine, before whom even the Shiūten Dōji might tremble and turn and be changed. "Dreadful," said the Minister, in a strain of oratory that reminds the candid reader of Mr. O'Brien calling for his breeches and boasting about the Plan of Campaign, "dreadful is the glare of his eye, exemplary his piety, swift his action; him the gods guard, him no dangers can affright"; backed by the Mikado's approval he would become merely irresistible. The Majesty of Japan approved; Yorimitsu was called in; and with his calling in begins the pictorial interest of the story. Mr. Colvin has suppressed the first drawing, which shows the effect on the Mikado of the report of the Ogre's crimes, and starts with Yorimitsu receiving his sovereign's commission to go forth and extirpate the evildoer. The next three numbers—which show how Yorimitsu and his companions prepare themselves for their enterprise by means of prayer and purification—are also suppressed; but the sixth (in Mr. Anderson's Catalogue) is given, and it shows us Raikō (to call the hero by his shorter and his more convenient name) with his comrades, the valiant Tsuna, the undefeated Kintoki, and three others, sitting in council, while their squires are grinding swords, preparing provisions, feeding the horses, and generally making ready for the expedition. In the seventh picture the band, disguised as wandering Buddhist priests, are preparing for the start; they are clad in weeds of grey; they are packing their armour into the wooden wallets proper to the folk whose likeness they have assumed; their trusty swords—long, two-handed, tremendous—are indifferently dissembled. The next picture reveals them in the act of journeying towards the monster's lair, but pausing in converse with a yamabushi, even a wandering priest of the hills, an ancient man of a venerable aspect and a sage. With this philosopher, who is no other than the Spirit of Sumiyoshi, they take counsel, and they take drinks; and soon he is discovered in act to furnish Raikō with a magic helm and a bottle of liquor, both which gifts, as we shall see, will presently come in useful. More than this, the Spirit (of whom Raikō has made a vast deal from the first, and who is possibly not unsusceptible to flattery) volunteers to conduct them on their way; and, under his guidance, they are seen climbing terrific mountains and crossing ravines on tree-bridges, in a style of landscape, touched with the true Skelt feeling, where the clouds are like rolls of paper, and the rocks are contorted into shapes that seem to clamour for the presence of Grindoff and his fatal Millers. In the next number of the series they have reached the borders of a mountain lake, and there they happen upon a damsel, "whose beauty was beyond that of most women"; in the water was she washing—washing a bloody garment; and when they spake with her "she answered not, but fell a-weeping," till "her face was as of one wrung by a terrible anguish," and they took her for a crony of the Ogre, even the Shiūten Dōji, sent that way to lure them to their destruction. She soon convinced them, however, that her intentions were strictly honourable; she told them her name (which was nothing shorter than Naka Mikado no Hanazono); she gave them details of the Dōji's way of treating his captives—whom in life he caused to shampoo him, and of whom, when he was tired of them, he made his accursed meal—which set them beside themselves with anger; she instructed them how to reach his cavern, and that when they got there they would find him "fair-skinned and not unseemly, of burly frame and fierce look, a giant stern of eye and puissant of arm beyond measure." Faring forward from her, the heroes came to the Ogre's castle, where one sees them received by a company of demons exulting in the prospect of fresh meat with a breadth of grin and a capacity of leer that makes them incomparable company; and the next thing is that they are in presence of the Ogre himself. He appears to them, being less than common drunk, and still having some wits about him, in one of the least offensive of his work-a-day shapes, and they behold him as a very large, very bloated, and rather "muzzy" Chinese boy. With him do they hold high wassail; he pledges them in bowls of blood; he gives them to eat—and Raikō is found equal to the occasion—the leg of a young woman; they drink together, and the saké fails not to produce its due effect; the demon does a fantastic dance (in the manner of Mr. d'Auban) before the company, and the accomplished Kintoki returns the compliment in kind. Meanwhile, the drug presented to the heroes by the Spirit of Sumiyoshi is being introduced into the saké-pans, and the Dōji and his merry men are presently as drunk as pipers. Two noble damsels—one of them the daughter of Kunisada—have been sent for to shampoo the brute; and, though he has offered to receive Raikō and his comrades into his retinue, and indeed has treated them handsomely according to his lights, it is evident, when we see him led off in a beastly state of intoxication between two of his retainers, that the end of him is near at hand. As soon as he is gone, indeed, the heroes take counsel with the two damsels; they arm themselves, Raikō putting on the magic helmet received from the Spirit of Sumiyoshi, and they set forth to tackle the monster where he lies. They are seen in act to break into his room, the good Spirit suddenly appearing with a coil of rope; and in the next picture they are face to face with the Terror in person. He has assumed his natural shape, which is that of a vast, bloated, spider-like, vermilion-coloured giant; he sprawls enormous in sleep, while the noble (and afflicted) damsels shampoo him; he is a terrific and disgusting spectacle; and they tie him up with (one can imagine) a certain queasiness—a certain feeling of nausea. Raikō, however, is not a bit afraid of him, nor are Tsuna and Kintoki either; in the beginning they had "felt their hair stand up with terror, and their livers perish" at the sight of him; but they have seen him drunk since then, and Raikō, flourishing his "rocksplitting sword," cuts off his head at a single blow, while Kintoki and Tsuna and their comrades go to work like men on the monster's trunk. Then is seen a dreadful thing. The Dōji's head leaps into the air, "pursued by a spout of blood," and swoops down on Raikō from above, like some horrible bird of prey. Of course, it is all of no avail. Not Amadis himself was a more puissant knight than Raikō. Here is the end of the Dōji.

Other pictures show the hero and his comrades visiting the Ogre's larder, where dead Young Persons hang most piteously on hooks, like the unnatural butcher's meat they are; vanquishing the Ogre's guards in combat, and taking it out of them without mercy when they have vanquished them; returning homewards, through romantic mountain scenery, in the company of rescued damsels, not, it is hoped, ungrateful for their rescue; and, finally, presenting themselves at Courts laden with demon heads, amid the acclamations of the populace. One must see out the story, of course, and it must be confessed that the compositions representing the fight with, and the punishment of, the Dōji's henchmen, have real merit. But the great picture of all is unquestionably the attack upon the Dōji himself. The artist has worked up to it as to a culmination, and he has so far succeeded that, once seen, it is not forgotten.

MR. LABOUCHERE CLOTHED.

LAST week we had occasion to notice a deplorable instance of frenzy in an intelligent though mistaken politician. This week Mr. Labouchere has once more come to the fore with a letter to the Daily News, on the subject of the House of Lords. Now we do not agree with Mr. Labouchere as to the House of Lords—there are probably no two intelligent corporations in this kingdom who differ more heartily with (persons wholly ignorant of English would no doubt say from) one another than Mr. Labouchere and the Saturday Review on this point. But when a man differs intelligently, and does not talk nonsense about villains and traitors whom it is necessary to watch, and who are going to do dreadful things under cover of heaven knows what, he deserves to be taken more or less seriously. We say more or less; for we are convinced, as some not wholly foolish persons before us—one Shakspeare, one Dryden, one Swift, one Canning, one Sydney Smith, and some others—have been convinced, that you may be none the less really serious for mixing humour with your gravity. But undoubtedly a person may, if he likes, doubt of the efficacy of a House of Lords, provided always that he is ready to be made a hare of when it is proved that his objections are futile and mistaken. It is only when he elects to play the big bombardoon, and to cry lamentation and mourning and woe, villany and treason, rape, murder, and all the pleas of the Crown, that it becomes impossible to treat him otherwise than in pantomime fashion. Even before Mr. Labouchere's letter, a half-uncomfortable feeling seems to have prevailed among Gladstonians that their very genial and clever leader in the Upper House (vice Lord Granville, become a noble shade) had made a mistake. Mr. Labouchere has said this very plainly and very forcibly, and he has said it in a manner which precludes altogether the possibility of interjecting Times Danaos, or hinting that, if Mr. Labouchere objects to Lord Rosebery's plan, it is because Lord Rosebery's plan is really good for the House of Lords, and not bad for it. We conceive that Mr. Labouchere's letter is quite an honest one; and we conceive it for this reason, that he has given hostages by proposing a plan of his own. It does not seem to us one whit a better plan than Lord Rosebery's, for reasons which we shall mention presently; but it is not a plan pour rire. It is quite as reasonable as Lord Rosebery's mixture of fish, flesh, fowl, and bad red herring; and it would not be more wanting in the real characteristics of a Second Chamber. Moreover, Mr. Labouchere seems to us to have done a real service in endorsing Lord Salisbury's argument to the effect that any combination of hereditary peers and elective peers would be just as obnoxious to Radicals as the present House. He has given a very useful warning that tinkerings and tailorings of the House of Lords will leave it just as it is in the estimation of those who either are democrats or pretend to be (for what reason God only knows!) Wherever he attempts to be constructive or to be combative of Tory principles he fails; for the simple reason that he comes into collision with those old, those abominable, but those quite invincible laws of fact, logic, and human nature which will not budge for the votes of twenty thousand majorities of cobblers. But when he criticizes his own less thoroughgoing associates he is very useful and edifying. He contradicts himself, of course; when you engage in a conflict with the laws just enumerated you usually do. For instance, he says that "we have no objection to a House of Revision and Appeal, provided its functions are limited to those duties. . . . But we object to a . . . House which may emasculate and minimize at its will Liberal measures." Now a "House of Revision and Appeal" simply means a House that can emasculate and minimize at its will. But we have no quarrel with him on this score. And we have to thank him for having brought some amiable, but unpractical, persons on his own side back to and face to face with the facts of the case.

Let Mr. Labouchere state in his own words what he and the people whom he calls Liberals do object to. He admits that he and they "have no personal quarrel with the members of the House of Lords." He sweeps away the silly nonsense about a peer here and there who has done something, probably not worse than his neighbours do, but something which, thanks to his being a peer, is widely known. He fences, it is true, rather than fights with Lord Salisbury's very cogent contention that the Conservatism of the actual House of Lords is an accident which rather justifies than condemns it—a contention which, by the way, Lord Salisbury might have argued out with advantage. But he says that "they [his so-called Liberals and he] consider it grossly unfair that, when they have obtained a majority at the polls, this majority should be stultified by a few hundred rich men, neither elected nor selected, and whose sole right to legislate and to meddle is derived from the somewhat apocryphal services of their ancestors." Now we have so strong a case that we can afford to be generous; and we'll tell Mr. Labouchere at once what we'll do with him. We will make him a handsome present of half a dozen question-begging terms in this passage—the "stultified," the "rich," the "neither elected nor selected" (the last of which words is a gross fallacy), the "meddle," the "somewhat apocryphal," and so forth. Ungenerous controversialists might insist on these, on every one of which Mr. Labouchere could be irrecoverably tombé in five minutes, with the consent even of a fair Radical audience. But we will give him all this for the present, reserving, of course, the right to enforce it later. It is, it seems, a dreadful thing to "they" that, when "they" have obtained a majority at the polls, it should be capable of having its will obstructed by a hereditary House of Lords?

Part of the answer to this is purely historical, and it was hinted at, though not completely given, by Lord Salisbury. It is utterly false that the stultification of popular majorities, to use Mr. Labouchere's own term, happens only when those majorities are Liberal. From the very nature of the case, the restraining influence of the Upper House is most wanted and most used in such times; but its exercise has not in the very least been confined to them. On the contrary, in the one period of English history when there was for some time a Tory majority as ignorant, as violent, and as prejudiced, as—well, let us say—some Liberal majorities have been, the House of Lords was the chief bar in its way, and the Government had actually to revert to that same remedy which Lord Grey, in the opposite case, had only to threaten, and to swamp the House by a creation of peers. Of such crucial instances there have been only two, one on each side; but of approaches to them there have been many. It may be laid down, without fear of contradiction from any one who knows English history, that whenever the House of Commons has been for any length of time distinctly Tory, the tendency of the House of Lords has been to be Liberal, and vice versâ. And it is exactly in this fact, and in the reasons for this fact, that the value of the House of Lords consists.

But we have not done with Mr. Labouchere, whom it is quite a pleasure to handle now that he is clothed and in his right mind. Not only has this "stultification" of which he complains been automatically and equitably directed now to the Liberal, now to Tory majorities, but no Assembly otherwise constituted than the present House of Lords could be expected to exercise such an influence. Perhaps we have said too much in the last phrase; for you might frame an Upper House which would do as well, but only at a cost of what Mr. Labouchere and his friends call reasonableness, which would be far greater than in the case of the House of Lords. And not only would it be more unreasonable, but it would be infinitely more cumbrous, costly, and capricious. The hereditary principle which excites such wrath is the only simple means of providing "a House of Revision and Appeal" (we thank Mr. Labouchere for that term) which shall be competent to revise and quash the results of an elected body when necessary. To put elect over elect is not only false heraldry, but folly in itself. You want some method of making an Upper House which shall be independent of popular judgment, which shall presumably have had all advantages of education, and such a position as shall make it reasonably free from corruption of every kind.

You cannot possibly get that by election in any form or shape. There is not such an elected body in the world, except, perhaps (and we are not quite of Lord Salisbury's mind there), the American Senate, while the independence and power of the American Senate, such as they are, depend directly on the peculiar federal constitution of the United States. The hereditary principle, in aristocracy as in monarchy, provides the desideratum which the wit of thirty centuries has not been able to provide otherwise. It excludes, except in the case of persons as foolish as Citizen Carnegie, jealousy or heart-burning; for one Englishman who was not born a lord is no more jealous of another Englishman who was born a lord than if he had been born to blue eyes and his neighbour born to black, or (if Mr. Labouchere denies the analogy) than if he had picked up the deuce of trumps and his neighbour in the same deal seven, with three honours. It supplies a body of men who have an interest to qualify themselves, and who, even by Mr. Labouchere's reluctant testimony, do qualify themselves for the duties of legislation in a fashion certainly not to be excelled, if it is to be paralleled, by the Assembly which used to contain Mr. Whalley and does contain Mr. Biggar. And it supplies, as nothing else has ever been found to supply, that "second thought" which no man of sense would like to dispense with in his own private case. We have put here the arguments for the House of Lords merely by sample and ex abundantia, for we might go on for columns. And there is at least one retort which Mr. Labouchere cannot now make. He cannot say that he does not want a Second Chamber at all, for he has supplied his own recipe for it—a curious mistake in the case of a thoroughgoing monocamerist, as some folk call it.

RECENT EGYPTIAN DISCOVERIES.

IT is curious that there should be so much information extant about the Twelfth Dynasty, although we are absolutely unable to fix its date. It was the twelfth family of kings which ruled in Egypt; but we cannot affirm with certainty that it succeeded the eleventh or was succeeded by the thirteenth. In fact, to judge from the evidence of the monuments before dates can be assigned, the first six dynasties were followed by the twelfth, and that by the eighteenth and the nineteenth. We may safely assume that the Twentieth Dynasty began to reign in 1200 B.C.; but absolute chronology only begins with the Persian invasion in 527 B.C. We might suppose that, if 1200 can be fixed for the Twentieth Dynasty, it would be a mere matter of calculation to discover the date of the Twelfth; and this is, naturally, the German assumption. The same great Egyptologist who gave us a complete hieroglyphic grammar, nine-tenths of which must have been evolved from his own inner consciousness, dates the Twelfth Dynasty from 2466 B.C. to 2266; and his theory suffices to work by, though, as we have said, we cannot reach back with confidence to within a whole millennium of the year 2266. Yet the names, the successions, the pedigree, the performances, the officials, the geographical limits of the power of these remote kings are almost as well known as if they had been Roman emperors. Usertsen succeeded Amenemhat, and Amenemhat Usertsen, until three of the one name and four of the other had reigned from Nubia to the Delta, with almost equal ability, and leaving behind them monuments, not so much of personal wealth or greatness, like the pyramids of their predecessors, as of public utility, like the Labyrinth and the Nilometer, by which the water supply was regulated all over Egypt. If we would know something more about these great rulers, something of their personal qualities, we must seek it in the records left by their officials, and so far, if we may judge, "like master, like man," they must have been seven of the most enlightened legislators who ever reigned over any people of whom we know. In these records we learn what were the morals and manners likely to be approved by the monarch, and each official prides himself on having carried out the just, wise, and benevolent policy of his master. The inscriptions of Beni Hassan and the remarkable "Second Sallier Papyrus" have been repeatedly translated and quoted, and show that long before Moses the principles illustrated by the Ten Commandments were known and acted upon by Amenemhat I. and his son. His advice to his successor is to give to the lowly and strengthen the weak; to comfort the afflicted, and to see that none in his land should want bread. In the papyrus just named Amenemhat states that "he sent his messengers to Abu." It is the discovery of the tombs of these messengers which Mr. Wallis Budge described in the interesting paper read before the Society of Biblical Archæology at the end of last month. Mr. Budge was sent out to Egypt by the Trustees of the British Museum, and had an advantage over most explorers in that country as his knowledge of hieroglyphics was already complete; and he entered on the labours prepared for him by General Grenfell at once and fully armed to overcome the greatest difficulties of reading and interpretation. He had another advantage in the fact that much of the heavy work had already been carried out, and that he was spared the most laborious part of such excavations as those of Mr. Petrie, who has always had to organize and control a band of native workmen. It was thus possible for Mr. Budge to economize his time to the utmost, and it must be allowed that he got through a prodigious amount of work in the few weeks of his stay.

The tombs newly discovered are on a hill of sandstone, seen on the right hand, or western bank, as we approach Aswan, the ancient Syene, the Ptolemaic Sunnu, the Biblical Seveneh, the archaic Abu, or town of ivory or the elephant, from which the island in the river is still called Elephantine. At this point the granite formation crops out, and the western hill, Contra-Syene, is the last ridge of the sandstone which borders the Nile from Silsilis. The ancient lords of Syene buried their dead on the western side, as did the Pyramid-builders and the people of Thebes, as much for convenience as for any religious reason. The Twelfth Dynasty tombs at Beni Hassan are on the other bank, and their entrances face the opposite way, towards the sunset. Of the finest of the tombs at Syene, Mr. Budge remarks that it could best be seen at 9 A.M., when the morning sun shone directly into it. The monumental tablet of Sabben could be seen at the far end. We have remarked on the remote antiquity of the Kings of the Twelfth Dynasty; but Sabben ruled Aswan under the Sixth. His royal master was the giant centenarian Ra-nefer-Ka, or Pepi II., who reigned a hundred years. The tomb of Sabben is in fine preservation, and full of inscriptions. A second tomb, not in such a complete state, is that of Mechu, and a third, that of Heq-ab, but the most important is on a higher level. This is called No. 31 by Mr. Budge—a number which gives us an idea how the whole hill is honeycombed. Before describing the tombs Mr. Budge gives us interesting particulars of the ancient approach to the high level. What the makers of the grottoes aimed at chiefly was that the best stone should be used; and, though Sabben had to be content with a lower stratum, Nub-kau-Ra-necht was buried where the stone is best and hardest, near the top of the hill; and one of the most interesting features of the discovery is that a fine broad staircase ran from the quay up a hundred and fifty feet to the layer of stone in which the tombs are cut, and that this stair is still almost perfect, although the quay has been wrecked. The stairway of Milosis, described in Allan Quatermain, was perhaps fifty feet higher, but cannot much have surpassed this one at Aswan. Similar stairways must have existed at Thebes and at Beni Hassan, but they have long perished. Between each set of steps at Aswan is a slope, up which the coffins were dragged by men on the steps at each side. When General Grenfell first discovered the tombs, he cleared the sand from the steps; but already, in eight months, when Mr. Budge arrived, so strong is the drift, they were completely covered, and had to be dug out again.

The tomb No. 31 is at the top, and, from what Mr. Budge tells us, must be considered a discovery of the highest interest and importance both in art and history. The great man here buried was the son of a lady named Satihetep, who, as Mr. Budge believes, was the daughter of Se-renput, who occupied an adjacent tomb, and who certainly lived under Usertsen I. Heq-ab, mentioned above, was the brother of the lady Satihetep, and Mr. Budge found a wrecked tomb which had belonged to Seten, a granddaughter of Se-renput. So that, as he observes, Se-renput was the founder of a great family of rulers of Elephantine during the Twelfth Dynasty, and these tombs were made for him and his family. At Beni Hassan there is a similar succession of local rulers, similarly connected through daughters. Se-renput held a chief command in an expedition to Ethiopia, which took place in the forty-third year of Usertsen I., and which is also mentioned at Beni Hassan, where Amen-em-hat-Ameni is described as having distinguished himself signally at the head of four hundred men. The tomb of Nub-kau-Ra-necht, his grandson, is, however, the finest of the series and the best preserved. The mummy pit within was also discovered, a pit within a pit and within a third pit, the care taken to preserve and conceal the bodies having been most elaborate. "We found," says Mr. Budge, "in one corner of the pit a hollow about two feet deep, which led to a very narrow passage about two feet wide by eighteen inches high. We dragged ourselves through this passage one by one, and found that on the other side there was a fourth square pit or shaft, the sides of which had been carefully smoothed." The shaft was filled up with small stones, and further than this point the explorers did not penetrate; but the shaft was no doubt the final resting-place of Nub-kau-Ra-necht.

As we have said, the number of tombs in this same hill is very great, and we must refer to Mr. Budge's forthcoming paper for an account of some of them, and of an interesting Coptic "dayr," or convent, at the foot of the slope. It concludes with the remark that the stone staircase is unique, and that the so-called "Proto-Doric" columns of two of the tombs are of a character elsewhere unknown. One of the most curious deductions relates to the violation of the tombs at some very early period, and Mr. Budge quotes an interesting passage from the Coptic Life of Pisentios, as to the existence and treatment of tombs in the seventh century A.D., but Mr. Budge is disposed to put the principal destructions down to Cambyses. The tombs of the Sixth Dynasty were probably opened in the troublous interval before the accession of the Twelfth; and the later and finer caves may have been destroyed under the predecessors of the Eighteenth Dynasty; but Mr. Budge thinks the ruin was not wrought by Egyptian hands, and quotes the Chronicle of John, Bishop of Nikiu, who expressly states that the Persian soldiers destroyed the town of Aswan; but in addition great damage was done by crowds of fanatical recluses, anchorites and ascetics, who took up their abodes in these spacious tombs, and, looking upon the divinities of ancient Egypt as devils, destroyed or plastered them over, as may be seen in the Temples of Karnak and Luxor, and many other places.

THE NEW YORK THEATRES.

THE New York theatrical season, which is now drawing to a close, has been interesting and profitable. Some good plays have been produced, and some new histrionic talent has been made known. Unquestionably the most important position in the chronicles of the season belongs to Mr. Bronson Howard's new comedy The Henrietta, which was produced at the Union Square Theatre. Mr. Howard has written a genuine comedy, brilliantly illustrating a peculiar phase of American life. The Henrietta is not a yacht, a horse, or a woman, though mistaken for the second and third in the course of the play. It is a "wild cat" mine, which the millionaire Wall Street financier, Nicolas Van Alstyne, admits that he won in a game of poker. The shares of the Company become the hinge upon which his vast fortune turns. The ruthlessly mercenary spirit of his elder son, Nicolas Van Alstyne, jun., leads that young man to become the secret financial opponent of his father, and to accomplish the old man's ruin. In the beginning of the play, however, the father, finding that his second son, a vapid, foppish club-lounger, has fallen in love with his ward, a sweet young girl, gives him $500,000, and then washes his hands of him. Nicolas the younger has betrayed an innocent girl, and to clear himself with his wife declares that the brother is the author of certain discovered letters. The younger son shoulders the brother's sin to shield the devoted wife, and is in turn deserted by his own fiancée. He plunges into Wall Street speculation, and, having lost about one-fifth of his half-million, appears at the office of his father's broker on the day when the crash comes. He promptly hands over his $400,000 to his father's clerk, and so saves his parent: while the unexpected turn in affairs carries off the unhappy elder brother by heart-disease. This is a faint outline of the story on which Mr. Howard has built a play which has not one uninteresting moment nor a single dull line. The action is full of life and significance, the situations are strong, the dialogue crisp and sparkling, and every character a clear-cut study. The old financier is a personage of wonderful strength and depth, and the club-haunting son is a masterly representation of what is commonly termed a "dude." W. H. Crane and Stuart Robson, who have been acting together for a number of years, are the central figures of the comedy. Mr. Robson's performance of Bertie Van Alstyne is one of the best pieces of character-acting he has ever done. Mr. Crane's work, however, is of a higher sort. As Nicolas Van Alstyne he has revealed the possession of greater powers than he was known to have. There are strength, dignity, and pathos in some of his scenes, while in others he beams with genial humour. He has earned an enviable position on the American stage by this performance. The play was generally well acted at the Union Square Theatre.

At the Madison Square Theatre the most important production artistically was that of Elaine, a dramatic version of the Laureate's poem, made by George Parsons Lathrop, novelist and essayist, and Harry Edwards, stage manager at Wallack's Theatre. As many as possible of Lord Tennyson's lines were used in the drama, but several hundred new ones were written by Mr. Lathrop, who has written many smooth poems. The idyllic beauty of the story, the unusual excellence of the stage effects, which included a faithful reproduction of Rosenthal's picture of "the dead steered by the dumb," and the effective acting of Annie Russell as Elaine, gave the play no small prominence among the novelties of the season. Beyond that little has been done at the Madison Square, Heart of Hearts having achieved only a moderate success.

The Wife, written by Bilasco and De Mille, is another American play which has been successful. It was produced at the Lyceum Theatre on November 3, and will run to the close of the season. The play is a smooth and interesting domestic comedy, founded on a woman's devotion, with incidental appearances of infidelity on the husband's part. The local colour is American, but is not essential to the story. Miss Georgia Cayvan, who impersonates the heroine, has won a leading place in this class of play. Her methods have notably improved, and she has to a large extent freed herself of a studied artificiality which was a conspicuous feature of her earlier work on the stage. The Wife is generally well acted, and is put on the stage with great care.

At the Standard Theatre Paul Kauvar, a drama by Steele Mackaye, was produced on December 24, and has been running since that time to crowded houses. Mr. Mackaye's play is based on imaginary incidents of the French Revolution, and shows the misfortunes that follow the love of a prominent Republican, Paul Kauvar, for the daughter of a Duke. By the machinations of a good old-fashioned villain, who loves the girl, it appears that Kauvar has betrayed the Duke to the Revolutionary authorities after having married the girl. The rest of the play is taken up with the gradual demonstration of Kauvar's fidelity and heroism. The play is a melodrama, but a very good one. The situations are theatrically powerful, and the interest is strong from beginning to end. A striking feature of the play is a tableau vivant, gradually revealed behind a gauze scene in a totally dark theatre, every light in the auditorium and on the stage being turned off. The tableau represents Kauvar's dream of his wife's death on the guillotine. Another feature, in the last act, is the mob, which is magnificently trained.

Mr. Daly opened the season at his theatre on October 5 with Pinero's Dandy Dick, which was a failure. He followed it speedily with another of his own light and pleasing comedies, called The Railroad of Love. This was an exceedingly attenuated play, but it had considerable movement, and was acted with delightful skill by Mr. Daly's company of accomplished comedians. It was followed early in February by a revival of Shakspeare's Midsummer Night's Dream. This production was a veritable triumph for Mr. Daly and his company. The manager and author, with his customary conscientious devotion to the highest dramatic art, carefully studied the text. He made as few alterations as possible, and changed the sequence of only a few incidents in the comedy. He devoted a wonderful amount of patient care to the preparation of the scenic effects, and, in respect of stage attire, the presentation of the comedy was one of the most complete and appropriate ever seen on the American stage. The success of the production, however, is unquestionably due to the admirable acting of Mr. Daly's players, who have again demonstrated in a striking manner the ease with which they can step out of the high collars and long trains of modern drawing-rooms into the tunic and sandals of antiquity. Miss Rehan has added another triumph to her long list by her charming impersonation of Helena, and Mr. Drew has succeeded in disguising his familiar methods in his excellent treatment of Demetrius. Mr. Skinner and Miss Dreher are excellent as the second pair of lovers. Mr. Lewis has caused considerable discussion in New York by his unique performance of Nick Bottom. His quaint conception and original acting of the part have quite upset many preconceived notions; but his interpretation is admitted to be full of merits. The other parts in the comedy are all well acted, and the production has met with the success it deserves.

Mr. Edward Harrigan, whose curious dramatic portrayals of low life in New York have for years delighted American playgoers, has departed from his customary lines, and produced a play called Pete, in which he makes a study of the negro of the Southern States. The theatre is crowded nightly, but the drama is far from being the author's best work. There are strong points in it, and Mr. Harrigan's own acting is remarkably effective; but as a play Pete is not well made.

Mr. Edwin Booth and Mr. Laurence Barrett are acting together in America with the greatest possible success. They produced Julius Cæsar at the Academy of Music, New York, on December 26, and played a short engagement there to extremely large audiences. Mr. Barrett's Cassius has long been regarded as his best work, his appearance and methods being admirably suited to the part. Mr. Booth has done no better acting of late years than he has done during the season now closing. His art has deepened and broadened, and his command of all his resources has reached the highest condition of certainty.

The Shakespearian drama has been further made known in New York through the labours of Mme. Modjeska, who lately brought out Cymbeline, Much Ado About Nothing, and Measure for Measure. The first and third of these plays were unknown to the American stage. Mme. Modjeska, playing a short engagement with her travelling company at the Fourteenth Street Theatre—a house miserably unprepared for any serious work—produced these dramas and acted the heroines in a manner which attracted large and enthusiastic audiences, and won her the praise and thanks of the more scholarly critics.

CANVEY ISLAND.

CANVEY ISLAND is only thirty miles from London, yet the two places are but little acquaint. Most Canvey Islanders have never been to London, and most Londoners have never heard of Canvey—unless, indeed, in connexion with the problem of the disposal of London sewage. Yet its history may interest the curious, and the island itself will well repay a visit, for it is a quaint, old-world sort of place, and oddly un-English in many ways. It lies down the Thames, between Gravesend and Shoebury on the Essex shore. It is about five by three miles in extent, is as flat, and for the most part as treeless, as the Haarlem Lake, and like it has Dutch traditions, and is beloved of the Dutchman of to-day. Not that Canvey ever belonged to the Dutch; their connexion with it came about in this way. The Romans who embanked the Medway and the Thames doubtless did the same for Canvey, for they overran all the land about, and evidence of their industry may be found in the broken pottery which was often, until lately, washed up upon Leigh Beck, its extremest point. The Saxons have left ample evidence of their existence in local nomenclature, and the Danes of theirs in ruins which may still be traced; for here, under their leader Hasting, they were beaten in a great battle by Alfred, who took from them their fortress "Beamfleet"—i.e. Benfleet—on the mainland, "with deep and wide trenches," as Camden says. But the mighty engineers were gone, and things in Canvey went from bad to worse; until, in Camden's time, the tides had so far worked their will that all the arable land, of which there had been much, was ruined, for the island, he says, "is oftentimes quite overflowne, all save hillocks cast up, upon which the sheep have a place of refuge. For it keepeth about four hundred sheep." In 1621 (about eight years after Camden wrote) a principal owner, Sir Henry Appleton, with others interested in the soil, agreed, as appears by the records, to hand over one-third of the lands to one Joas Croppenburgh, a Dutch engineer, on condition that he should "in" and embank the island, ensuring it against future inroads of the sea. The land so made over is still called "Third-acre land." Croppenburgh's work was followed by a considerable immigration of Dutch, who sustained severe loss at the hands of their own countrymen during the Dutch incursions in the year of the Plague, and most of them then left. But if a pure Dutch name would be hard and a pure Dutch pedigree impossible to find, the round face, the heavy, square figure, and the stolid temper are characteristic of the Canvey Islander of to-day. As Lindisfarne, in short, is essentially Scandinavian, so Canvey is essentially Dutch.

Crappenburgh did his work conscientiously enough; but exceptional storms and spring-tides upset his calculations, and in 1735 so great was the damage to live stock from these causes (Canvey then fed near four thousand sheep) that the Third-acre land was by Act of Parliament saddled with a first charge—limited to 10s. an acre—towards the expenses of the wall; the remaining two-thirds were only to be rateable should more money be wanted—at that time a remote contingency. But the storms of 1881 wrought such frightful havoc that this land was charged as high as 1*l.* per acre, a sum equal to the value of its rental. Consequently, the only land at present worth the holding in Canvey Island is "Third-acre land." The wall is finished now, and a solid bit of work it is; but the area it encloses is sadly contracted, and acres away over its eastern limit one may trace the old Dutchman's handiwork running down to the point, and see even now the remains of old fleets and ditches when the tide goes down. The point itself, indeed, has entirely gone to sea to the extent of half a mile within the last few years.

"The Lobster Smack," sometime "The Sluice," Canvey's principal inn (she has, by the way, only two), lies just under the wall by Hole Haven, a little creek where barges and bawley-boats can ride. It is pleasant to lie in bed and watch the lights as the great steamers feel their way down Thames. Here, too, are rare chances for studying Dutch character, for the light that shines from the windows of the inn is a spell few Dutchmen can resist. And as the small Scheldt trading-boats come up the Thames, one by one they lay-to in the creek till morning light. London and Amsterdam have done many a stroke of business in a quiet way at this retired and convenient half-way house, for a bargain is wonderfully helped by a glass or two of old Schiedam. This house has seen some curious doings in its time, before the white coastguard station put in an appearance, with its trim flower-beds, its flagstaff, and its handful of steady men. Mine host has often reason to be glad of the society of these useful allies when emergencies arise. For your Dutchman, stolid and phlegmatic in his sober moments, genial and somewhat noisy later on, has a tendency by 11 o'clock or so to become wildly unmanageable and to "run amuck" at everything and everybody when closing time begins. Fortunately for himself the landlord is a strong and a plucky man, and is moreover ably seconded by his better half. There is an old flight-shooter, too, who can always be relied on in a row. Like most of those about the "Lobster Smack," he is honourably scarred. The loss of two fingers is the form it takes with him. Ask him how it happened, and he will say, "Well, sir, you see it was just like this 'ere. We was a-heltin' out a Dutchman one night, and I went for to hit his head, and he dropped sudden, and blest if I didn't drive right at that there beam."

Canvey contains about three thousand acres of land in all, and this was divided among eight different parishes, and was titheable to them. Whether the clergy of any of these parishes ever collected their tithes in person on this island we cannot say; but it is certain that for centuries no other consideration ever brought them there—the Church left the islanders absolutely alone. For marriage they had to trudge to their respective parish churches on the mainland, often a weary way; for burial they took their dead to Benfleet. A little chapel put up by the Dutch colonists in the seventeenth century was the first place of worship on the island. But the Dutch left, and the chapel fell into decay. It was rebuilt by one who held a small farm there, which he charged with 8*l.* for a few sermons. This was slowly improved upon, and in 1715 a wooden chapel was consecrated by Compton, Bishop of London, "for 20 sermons a year." After a long interval some of the neighbouring clergy provided by contributions for a few more sermons, which were supplied in fine weather by the chaplain for the time being. Things have gradually improved, and for some years now Canvey has been happy in the possession of its first vicar, a wooden vicarage, and a wooden church; while quite recently, by a crowning and an almost superhuman effort, the island has been semi-parochialized. All the houses in Canvey are of wood, any heavier material is considered liable to disappear beneath the soft alluvial soil.

The cause of law and order was further promoted about three years ago by the introduction of a policeman to the island for the first time. It would be impossible for those who have become familiar with "the bobby" to conceive the storm of scorn and indignation aroused by the arrival of this humble guardian of the peace. "Canvey don't want no p'lice," insisted a parlour orator; "let 'em keep to the mainland, I says. Ain't we already got the Clesiasticals?" The Ecclesiastical Commissioners having been compelled by bad times to take some land in hand themselves at the other end of the island, they are regarded by the islanders as in some dim way an expression of authority and interference, and as the authors of all their woes. An abstraction known as "Guv'nment" has the same significance in the minds of rustics in other parts. "Fust chance I has," interposed our friend the flight-shooter, "I leads him down in the evening to the marshes beyent the fleets and takes the planks up"—a Christian determination which was much applauded. The fleets are deep and wide ditches which bisect the flats in all directions; they are crossed by narrow planks at rare intervals, and a stranger left down there on a cold winter's night would fare badly indeed.

Ten-shilling licences have been the ruin of the winter sport which once made Canvey so attractive to the wildfowler. But a visit to it in summer-time will well repay the lover of nature. The bearded tit has been driven away, and the prowling plant-stealer has hunted there unchecked, but what remains of flora and of bird-life is singularly characteristic and interesting. The trees of the island are mostly disposed in one small group, but this can boast a rookery. One word as to the name "Canvey." Camden talks of "the island Convennos, which is also called Κώουννος," which, he says, Ptolemy mentions in his Geography. This name, he adds, is still retained in "Canvey." Had Ptolemy seen the island from a balloon, his use of the term would have been more intelligible, for the general shape of the island as then seen would be that of a pear; but given to a place as flat as a pancake it is an obvious misnomer. Further, the Canvey Islanders would not have been careful to have preserved Ptolemy's word had they ever even heard of it. It has been suggested that Canvey, which often appears in records as "Canwe," "may possibly be a British name, since 'Canwe' in Welsh means bright, shining, glistening," and that this would fitly describe the appearance of the place, partly from the vast bank of shells on its eastern point, and more so from the fleet by which it was bisected as late as the time of Elizabeth. There are difficulties in the way of this derivation; but we will leave it as it stands, for we are free to confess we cannot supply a better.

DRAMATIC RECORD.

MR. ROBERT BUCHANAN somewhat misinterprets the necessities of his position. In an Author's Note to his play, Joseph's Sweetheart, he states that he has "had" to suppress, to amplify, to alter, and otherwise to treat Fielding's novel Joseph Andrews. As a matter of fact, Mr. Buchanan "had" to do nothing of the sort. That which he "had" to do in truth, if he had regarded the subject from the proper point of view, was to leave Fielding alone. Mr. Buchanan does not seem to be gifted with the sense of humour and appreciation of character which would enable him to understand the genius of the great eighteenth-century novelist. He is fortunate in appealing to a manager who is not concerned for the reputation of Fielding, and to audiences so ignorant of literature, so little able to comprehend the wonderful vigour and vitality of the writer on whom hands have been laid, that they do not know the difference between an adequate adaptation and a Buchananism. In the same Author's Note Mr. Buchanan asserts that "the critics, almost without exception, pronounced a favourable verdict" on the attempt to dramatize Tom Jones; but the exceptions were in truth a good deal more numerous than the sentence quoted would lead the reader to suppose. Mr. Buchanan also laments that, "as in the case of Sophia, he finds himself, to some extent, forestalled by Sheridan." Sheridan's presumption in daring to forestall Mr. Buchanan is very shocking. How could Sheridan venture to take such a liberty? We only hope that Mr. Buchanan will treat Sheridan with contemptuous neglect, and not find some day that he "has" to Buchananize The School for Scandal, by introducing the Ghost of Hamlet's father to frighten Joseph Surface, or Falstaff to sing a topical song to Charles's festive companions.

It would serve no good purpose to show how Mr. Buchanan has picked scraps out of Joseph Andrews, and misfitted them into a commonplace melodrama of his own invention. We dimly trace perverted Fielding in the circumstance that Lady Booby is in love with her footman Joseph Andrews, that he and the quasi-Parson Adams are found together on occasions, that Squire Booby supports his brother-in-law, who turns out to be well born, and in a very few other particulars. The plot of the drama really deals with incidents for which no sort of warrant is to be found in the book. Not content with this, Mr. Buchanan has taken startling liberties with the characters. Lady Booby, for instance, becomes a perfect monster of vice and cruelty, pursuing Fanny and Joseph with the most relentless hate, and the abduction of the virtuous Fanny occupies the greater part of the five acts. Lord Fellamar casually sees the girl at Lady Booby's house, and that evil-minded dame perceives how she may revenge herself on Joseph, who has repulsed her advances. "Promise me to get that girl into your power. Use any means!" her ladyship hisses into the libertine's ear, and so Fanny is carried off from Parson Adams's cottage by Fellamar's Welsh chaplain, Llewellyn ap Griffith, forced into a coach, and brought to his lordship's town house. Some hundreds of dramatists who preceded Mr. Buchanan have ventured to forestall him in the episode of the virtuous rustic maiden abducted by the licentious nobleman—it is not only poor Sheridan who so far forgot himself as to be guilty of forestalling the author of Joseph's Sweetheart. As for Joseph, he finds his father, and that father, moreover, a baronet or a knight, before the play is half over. The late Mr. Alfred Bunn forestalled Mr. Buchanan in the introduction of the character; for Sir George Wilson is in fact none other than Count Arnheim of The Bohemian Girl. Joseph, however, in a handsome dress of yellow brocade, sets off to track his Fanny, and he runs her and Fellamar to ground in a kiosk at Ranelagh—here exhibited as a very vulgar specimen of Cremorne. Fanny is rescued, a duel is arranged to take place between Joseph and Fellamar, and here we certainly lose our respect for the hero. If a gentleman were going to fight a duel, there is one thing that he would never do, and that is, talk about the chances of the combat, on the whole rather despondently, to the girl he is engaged to marry. Surely it would have been well worth while for the adapter to ascertain the customs and sentiments of gentlemen in this position. Seeing what manner of play Joseph's Sweetheart is, we cordially admit that it does not matter in the least.

We scarcely know how to criticize the acting of the play, being doubtful as to what standpoint to adopt. Joseph Andrews might have been such a man as Mr. Conway shows; and, apart from this, the actor gives a very spirited and natural study of the character. Mr. Conway is intelligent, most probably he is acquainted with the book, and altogether he does at least as well as circumstances admit. Miss Kate Rorke, who has all the qualities which make a successful heroine of melodrama, imparts a charm to the part of Fanny. It would not be fair to urge that she does not suggest Fielding's creation, for Fielding had not forestalled Mr. Buchanan in describing adventures which she undergoes. Miss Vane has to play Mr. Buchanan's Lady Booby, and not Fielding's, and she seems to accomplish this task with considerable skill. Mr. Thomas Thorne is ill fitted with the name of Parson Adams. We recognize no trace of our good old friend. Mr. F. Thorne talks stage Welsh as Llewellyn ap Griffith. He sings the popular "Hob y deri dando," so well known to all who are acquainted with "pennillion," but in case any among his audience have attended Eisteddfodau, it is desirable that he should learn the tune. Mr. Cyril Maude did creditably as Lord Fellamar, and Miss Eliza Johnstone's Mrs. Slipslop was not without merit.

The worst defect from which a play can suffer is the absence of central motive. Before all else there should be a leading idea—in fact, a plot—and this the incidents should directly support and develop. These are the first axioms of playwriting, and, as Mr. Pinero's new "domestic drama," Sweet Lavender, does not fulfil these indispensable conditions, it must unhesitatingly be set down as a bad play. We notice that the critics differ considerably in their estimates of this work, which was produced at Terry's Theatre on Wednesday evening. For our own part we have seldom been so utterly bored at an evening performance. We admit Mr. Pinero's cleverness in picking up and presenting odd and unconventional types of character, though in Sweet Lavender we only have a couple of them, in the shabby dipsomaniacal barrister, Dick Phenyl—the part acted by Mr. Terry—and the love-lorn hairdresser and wigmaker, Bulger, whose feelings of affection for the laundress at 3 Brain Court, Temple, have so much overcome him that he does not attempt to conceal the fact of his having descended to poetry; but Bulger is the merest sketch. A friend lives in the Temple with Phenyl, and tries to keep him from drinking; and this law student, Clement Hale, is deeply in love with the laundress's daughter, Lavender Rolt, otherwise known as "Sweet Lavender," a character not improbably suggested by the Fanny Bolton of Pendennis. An attempt is first made to interest us in the love affairs of Hale and this handmaiden, an attempt, however, which is the less successful because, in the hands of Mr. Bernard Gould, Hale becomes a very commonplace young man; and Miss Norreys, the Lavender, appears to be mourning the melancholy circumstance that she has not a comic part to play. A less convincing ingénue than Miss Norreys in Sweet Lavender we do not remember to have seen; she appears to be nervously apprehensive lest the audience should suspect that she is going to be funny, and altogether Lavender strikes us as a most depressing young woman. At the end of the first act her mother, Mrs. Rolt, seems about to take up the running. It is indicated that there is a mystery in connexion with her, and that the banker, Mr. Wedderburn, who has adopted Hale, is at the bottom of it. We do not really reach this, however, for the best part of a long hour and a half. Meantime the banker's niece, Minnie, who has been engaged to marry Hale, but prefers his brotherly affection, becomes a prominent personage, and we are invited to concern ourselves with the flirtation between her and a volatile American named Bream. In course of time a new side issue comes up for consideration; Phenyl is represented as the chief creditor of Wedderburn's bank, which has suspended payment. Little or nothing comes of this, and we are carried on to the mystery which was suggested at the end of the first act. There had formerly been a liaison between the barrister and the laundress, and Lavender is their daughter. Phenyl, in various stages of ebriety, pervades the play, and is often amusing. The lean, shabby barrister is a quaint figure, and would be a great deal quainter if Mr. Terry did not make such painful efforts to be grotesque in speech and gesture. The parts of Minnie and of Mrs. Rolt are played with excellent taste and judgment by Miss Maude Millett and Miss Carlotta Addison. The former is charmingly fresh and natural. Mr. Valentine also shows ability as Bulger, and a word of commendation may be added for the Bream of Mr. F. Kerr. The manner in which the piece straggles makes it sadly tedious; but we can cordially praise the lighter passages of the dialogue. There are many humorous, witty, and fanciful lines, such as, indeed, are happily characteristic of all Mr. Pinero's pieces.

There is sound reason to hope that in Miss Julia Neilson, who has made her first appearance on the recognized stage as Cynisca in Pygmalion and Galatea, we have an actress who will presently occupy a leading place in the front rank of her profession. We do not believe in "born actresses," for acting is a difficult and abstruse art which must be learnt, and can only be acquired by practice. Dramatic aptitude, however, novices may possess, and this is possessed in a very exceptional degree by Miss Neilson. A musical voice, a correct ear, and intelligence of a high order were evidenced by her delivery of the verse; her face readily reflects the emotions she expresses; her bearing is graceful, and her gesture remarkably apt, unconstrained, and significant. We were much struck by the indication of Cynisca's nature which was conveyed in her first interview with Pygmalion. Jealousy of the statue is lightly, almost jestingly, hinted at; when she refers to the power Artemis has bestowed upon them there is no shadow of a thought in her mind that it can ever possibly be used; and yet with much subtlety the young actress in the midst of her loving converse reveals the depths of her disposition. The keynote of what follows is, in fact, faintly sounded. Over-anxiety to make much of every varying phase of the character to some slight extent marred the interpretation; on the other hand, in the delivery of some of the speeches we found a repose and restrained force which are exceedingly rare in the performances of inexperienced players. Miss Mary Anderson repeated her familiar impersonation of Galatea, Mr. Macklin gave a particularly able study of Pygmalion, and Mr. Rutland Barrington made a humorous Chrysos.

An interesting performance of Sheridan Knowles's The Hunchback was given at the Prince of Wales's Theatre on Tuesday afternoon. The interest of the occasion, of course, centred upon the young actress, Miss May Fortescue, who undertook the part of the considerably tried heroine Julia. Hitherto Miss Fortescue has not appeared favourably as an actress. She has seemed rather too much inclined to accept popularity on the easiest terms, and to pose as a star of the first magnitude ere she had learned the first rudiments of her art. Experience is a hard master, and Miss Fortescue has evidently soon found that people would not accept her with genuine favour until she had proved herself worthy of their commendation. This she emphatically won on Tuesday last. In the earlier scenes, it is true, she was rather artificial and stiff, but as the play progressed she manifested so much fervour in her love-making, and so much passion in her desolation, that she surprised by the firmness of her touch and the evidence which sh exhibited of having placed herself under the direction of some skilful instructor. Throughout she exhibited so much promise of still better things in the future, that we feel almost inclined to pass over her faults, which are plastic rather than elocutionary. She persists, for instance, in over-gesticulating, and ignores the value of the greatest of all histrionic arts—repose. We commend its study very earnestly to her attention. Mr. Willard was Master Walter, and we cannot say that it is a character which suits him, but he is far too intelligent to do anything indifferently, and in the last scene he was both powerful and dignified. The Sir Thomas Crawford of Mr. Conway was externally all that could be desired. His delivery, however, of Sheridan Knowles's somewhat sterile poetry was the reverse of satisfactory. He seemed, like many another English actor, determined to give his lines as little value as possible. Miss Webster as Helen was lively, but wanting in refinement; and Mr. Norman Forbes was capital as Modus, and did not over-emphasize that melancholy youth's shyness, which can so easily be rendered grotesque. Mr. A. Wood played Fathom very funnily, and Mr. H. H. Morell was a capital Thomas. We have rarely seen a more picturesque or accurate costume on the stage than the one of brown and yellow silk worn by Mr. Frank Rodney as Lord Tinsel.

A change in the cast of The Two Roses at the Criterion Theatre, which is given now occasionally for matinée performances during the successful run of David Garrick, has permitted Miss Ellaline Terriss to assume the character of Lotty, the younger of Digby Grant's daughters. Although this very young actress may have failed to efface souvenirs of Miss Amy Fawcett and Miss Amy Roselle in this same part, nevertheless she contrived to make a most favourable impression by her graceful and winning appearance and by her pleasant and fresh delivery. She is a little fidgetty, and has a tendency to overact; but these are defects which will surely disappear with practice. Mr. C. W. Somerset, who played Digby Grant for the first time, is a clever and painstaking actor, who somehow or other vaguely suggests Mr. Irving; but his make-up was the reverse of artistic, and did not assist him in creating as favourable an impression as he otherwise might have done. Mr. Sydney Brough was excellent as Jack Wyatt.

There is little praise to bestow on Miss Beatrice Strafford's matinée of Camille at the Prince of Wales's Theatre on Thursday. This lady, who has been absent for some time from the London stage, essayed a part which is associated with some of the greatest of modern actresses, and although she seemed to feel its emotions, she certainly failed to move her audience, as least in the sense she evidently desired. Mr. William Herbert, however, who played the part of Armand Duval, acted remarkably well. He was manly, and in the more passionate scenes exhibited a power which we scarcely imagined him to possess. He is altogether the best representative of this part we have seen in a very long time; for, as a rule, it is rendered the reverse of agreeable by violent outbursts of passion and general unseemly conduct on the part of a youth whom Alexandre Dumas (the son) distinctly describes as extremely refined and elegant.

THE HASTINGS SALE.

THE Hastings sale, which took place this week at Messrs. Christie, Manson, & Woods, although not a large one, has been of considerable interest. One hundred and thirty lots of Majolica, including some fine pieces, gave a good opportunity to amateurs, and the best of the plates, or dishes, were sold at prices varying from 100 to 410 guineas. Urbino, which may be called the birthplace of Majolica, was richly represented; so was Gubbio, a place in the same duchy. There were several pieces, too, from Caffagiolo, one of them bearing a peculiar mark very like that on a plate in the Rothschild collection, which is celebrated for having misled the compiler of the Catalogue of the Bernal sale (at which it was purchased) into mistaking the words In Chafaggiuolo for Incha Agricola. This Caffagiolo Majolica is remarkable for the richness of its blues. There were many specimens, again, of the Majolica commonly called Abruzzo ware, from the factories in the neighbourhood of Naples. Among these was a pair of plaques, one signed with the name of S. Grue, a man of science, who became director, in the seventeenth century, of the works at Castelli, one of the most celebrated of all the Majolica factories in Italy. The Hispano-mauro ware was exceptionally good, one dish fetching 325 guineas. Generally speaking, this kind of Majolica is inferior to the Italian. There were half a dozen specimens of the ware of Palissy, who, as is well known, was so zealous in his art that he put his chairs and tables into his furnace when he was short of fuel. One of his principal employments was making large earthenware vases and statues for French gardens, especially for those of Henri II. and his Court; but he is best known now for his small pieces encrusted with fish, shells, and reptiles.

The Limoges enamels, which were sold on the second day, furnished some interesting specimens of the methods that have been at various times adopted in that very difficult art, although it can hardly be said that all were represented. Some of the earliest enamels on metal, that are known, are cloisonnés, their surfaces being divided with gold filagree into compartments in which the enamel was enclosed. This method is still followed in parts of Asia. Next came the Early Limoges style, or champ levé. The chief characteristic of this method was that cavities for the reception of the enamel were incised by an engraver in a thick plate of copper. The next development was the Italian, "jeweller's style," whose great exponent was Benvenuto Cellini; and then followed another sort of Limoges, known as Late Limoges, in which the paintings were laid upon an opaque paste in transparent colours. There is yet another, called the Miniature style, remarkable for the variety of its colours, the gradation of its tones, and the number of the firings to which its plates were exposed. The Hastings enamels brought in some good prices, a small piece, only 7¼ inches long, fetching 350 guineas, and eighteen plaques, about 6 inches square, 598; but these prices seemed small in comparison with those realized at the Hamilton, Blenheim, and Fountaine sales, when enamelled dishes made from 1,000 to 7,000 guineas. Students of enamels were interested by comparing the Limoges with eight lots of Chinese enamels which were sold later in the day. It is not very often that a good collection of ivories finds its way into the market, and the thirty-four lots now sold comprised some very fair pieces. There were two ivory horns (or Oliphants, as they used to be called), several handsomely carved knife-handles, a diptych and a triptych, some caskets and plaques, and a number of statuettes. One or two of the latter, from 11 to 13 inches high, made something over 60 guineas apiece, and a casket more than 400*l*.

EXHIBITIONS.

THREE exhibitions of the one-man sort claim our attention this week. In each case some bond of unity has been found to give the drawings an interest as parts of a series of illustration. Mr. F. G. Cotman's "Around London," at Messrs. Dowdeswell's, is a set of landscapes in water-colour, which happen most of them to have been made not far from the town, but evidently without any definite purpose of illustrating all the scenery of the environs. The few that cannot pretend to come under the title have been made in Norfolk. They are somewhat unequal, both in ambition and in performance; but, on the whole, Mr. Cotman's aims are worthy and his methods artistic. The basis of his art is realism —a realism ennobled, however, by a broader and more dignified view of effect than can be gained by mere patient compilation of small forms and local tints. In "A Wedding Morning—Blakeney" (48) we admire the limpid quality of the tone, the luminous sky in true relation to the ground, and the fine delicate finish with which boats, rigging, &c., are fully made out without any hardness or undue prominence of definition. "Blakeney from the Downs" (42), another example of serious and well-calculated finish, arrests one's attention by the way in which dark green grass and gorse are given their true local colour without prejudice to the scheme of values or the feeling of air. The greens in "Distant View of Harrow-on-the-Hill" (3) are also strong and soft; and the picture presents a group of light bowery trees worked with a broad elegance of style that does not exclude a free delineation of natural forms. "Morston Church, Norfolk" (44), one of the largest, is broadly modelled; "Brickmakers" (47) is a good effect of light on figures, &c.; and "Horton Mill" (10), "Near St. Albans" (12), and "Parched Downs near Epping" (33) are fresh, aërial, and yet solid in aspect. A sad and tranquil view of nature may be seen in the bare trees and grey diffused light of "Sheds at Ruislip" (20); while "Strangers at the Gate, Pinner" (1), "Twickenham" (8), "Pinner" (23), "On the Colne" (26), "Pinner Church" (32), "Pinner" (37), and "The Bar, Blakeney" (43), are some among the good things which we have not space to describe.

In his collection of drawings of Oxford, on view at the Fine Art Society's Rooms, Mr. J. Fulleylove gives us both pencil drawings and work in water-colour. As usual, he has succeeded best in some of the latter, though he uses the pencil in many cases with a pleasing freedom and suggestiveness. It may be objected that, in drawing architectural subjects with the point, he should have been fuller and more precise in his information. But then it is evident that the artist merely wished to give a general idea of the corners of streets and dispositions of buildings that you might come across in a walk through Oxford. He has very rarely intended to give a thorough architectural account of the buildings he treats. Perhaps the frankest in execution and most consistent in effect of the water-colours are two studies of "St. John's College: Garden Front" (66 and 29). "Christchurch: Library and Peckwater Quadrangle" (27) shows a good treatment of stone; and the large "Magdalen College: Cloisters, &c." (21) is a fine and careful piece of workmanship, except in the false "chic" of the foreground figures. The interiors produce a good general effect, though brown and somewhat lacking in feeling for space and air. "Merton College: Interior of Library" (18), with its interesting treatment of the variously hued books, is perhaps the best of these. The painting of the Renaissance façade in "St. John's College, with Archbishop Laud's Library" (13), should not be overlooked; it is one of the finest of the purely architectural subjects. Suggestively worked, the detail in shadow exhibits no false hardness, and the colours of the stone, though faithfully given, do not interfere with the tranquillity of the mass of building.

Let no one imagine from the title of Mr. Haynes-Williams's exhibition at the Goupil Gallery—"Fair and Famous Fontainebleau"—that he is about to be introduced to the haunts of Millet, Rousseau, Diaz, Decamps, and the nursery of the Romantic landscape of 1830. It is with the Château, not the Forest, that Mr. Haynes-Williams has been occupied. Nor has he given us any glimpse of the famous gardens and picturesque staircase and buildings; he has confined his labours to the state-rooms of the Palace. He has been very careful in his drawing and perspective, very faithful in his treatment of ornament and decoration, and he has gone no further in the way of license than in cleaning up some of the faded stuffs and burnishing some of the gorgeous gilding. His work is perhaps too universally clean and shining. The most important rooms of the Palace are unquestionably the long, narrow "Galerie François I." and the "Salle du Bal," adorned with the combined monograms of Henri II. and Diane de Poictiers. Mr. Haynes-Williams, who has made his principal picture a general view of the first room, has given a most trustworthy delineation of the Renaissance decoration planned by Primaticcio and Benvenuto Cellini, and carried out by the foreign workmen of Francis I. Of Henri II.'s much finer gallery there is no general view, and we must be content with three pictures of various corners of the room. From these the style of the mural paintings may be gathered and the design of the deep embrasures; but the dark tone of the picture and the concentration of light prevents one from realizing the resplendent shimmer of the gold and satinwood of the gallery and the blaze of reflections which lights up every dark corner of the walls and floor.

We have deplored on former occasions an absence of freshness in the methods, and conviction in the aims of painting, which gave to Mr. Tooth's Gallery a uniform aspect of uninteresting commercial mediocrity. We see a tendency to improve matters in this respect; a real step has been made towards better things. The work of the inevitable trickster may still be seen, but tempered, as it should be, by sincere and serious art that looks like the production of a human being, and not of a mere machine. Nor is the talent of young Englishmen so entirely sacrificed as it was to foreign potboiling and unintelligent repetition of clever formulas. Mr. Alfred East has proved himself ere now, and his co-operation is worth securing for an exhibition; but he might have made his talent more distinctly manifest than he has in "Kilchurn Castle, Loch Awe" (44). His other contribution, "The Land of Burns" (91), somewhat redeems this failure by its solidity and superior air of truth. Mr. J. W. Waterhouse exemplifies his power of drawing and his sane realism of tone in a picture of classic subject, "The Rescue" (136). "On a Lee Shore" (6) is in Mr. H. Macallum's best style, fresh, vigorous, and free from exaggerated warmth of colour. Mr. W. L. Wyllie, in a genuine snow effect, "Winter on the Medway" (43), shows that he can still observe nature with sincerity, and paint it with freedom and vigour, notwithstanding his occasional sacrifices of late years to a false prettiness of colour. Mr. D. Farquharson, in two or three small canvases, and Mr. Logsdail in "A Side Canal, Venice" (29), paint solidly and robustly in good natural colour, and without any affectations or trivialities of style. Modern fashions of impressionistic handling and cool, fresh, grey colouring are represented by Mr. E. Dade's "Scavengers of the Sea" (23), Mr. Norton's "Toil and Pleasure" (101), Mr. F. Brangwyn's "Lazy Afternoon —Fowey" (34), and one or two similar canvases. Some really fine foreign pictures add distinction to this year's show. The superbly deep moving sky of Mr. James Maris's "Dordt" (3) serves to show up the hard steely flatness of the mechanically-executed skies in such foreign potboilers as Mr. J. Gallegos's "Souvenir of Venice" (103). Beside such work, indeed, Mr. H. B. Davis's laboured "Summer Time" (87), from last Academy, appears sincerity itself. Then we have a very happy instance of P. Billet, "The Shepherdess" (57), a canvas loosely and naturally painted in the honest colours of truth; a fine study of armour, "The Standard Bearer" (5), by Meissonier; and a life-size figure of a girl, by Th. Paraf Javal, called "The Lacemaker" (15). This picture possesses a charming refinement of colour combined with strength, which makes it agreeable at any distance from one foot to twenty. The type chosen is not beautiful in itself, but the artist has taken such advantage of its marked character as to give his work an irresistible charm. One cannot help admiring the even cream of the flesh tint, the judicious parsimony of pigment and labour shown by the artist in painting the eyes, the soft impasto of the cheeks, and the masterly treatment of all accessories to the head. We confess to not liking hard, small workmanship or smooth uniformities of texture that look like painted tin or coloured glass; but, upon examining R. Sorbi's "Blind Man's Buff" (118), or more especially L. Deutsch's "News from the Soudan" (63), we see such thorough modelling and drawing that we are disposed to forgive their unnatural aspect. Want of space prevents our describing work worthy of attention by Messrs. Lhermitte, Binet, Marchetti, Senêt, Chevallier Tayler, Rubens Santoro, F. Murray, Conrad Kiesel, and W. S. Coleman.

The composition of the French Gallery, Pall Mall, remains the same as ever. The bulk of the show consists of the very clever handiwork of men who seem each to possess a mould from which they can turn out any required number of proofs. One would think that they must become even more tired of this industry than we are. Do these gentlemen, with all the resources of nature and art at their command, ever try to grapple with some fresh aspect of nature, ever abandon themselves to the inspiration of the moment in their handling, or ever adventure themselves in some entirely new region of colour? Perhaps, if they do, they find it impossible to sell the results in England, where we heartily wish their well-known manufactures met with a cooler reception. The only charge which has been supported with any seriousness against Corot was that of a want of variety. The painters we are referring to need take no heart from the illustrious precedent. In half of his work, it is true, Corot was developing a style, and that so absolutely a new one as to require his whole attention. Moreover, his handling was always fresh, lively, and accidented, and his colour only apparently the same, while his whole art was so full of an uncloyed enjoyment of nature that it never produced the effect of an often repeated formula. Corot improved too, whereas Mr. Joanonitz and others have become the shadow of themselves. Nevertheless, the French Gallery contains some excellent pictures. Amongst works of the older school we have a note of colour and effect "The Last Gleam" (2) rapidly dashed in by Corot and yet showing a mysterious profundity of tone; a fat rich Dupré, "Near Barbizon" (53), totally unlike any part of the district; a dark, rather mannered Rousseau, "A Bit near Barbizon" (40), and a decorative figure picture, "Cupid's Own" (19), by Diaz. As examples of sincere realism we may mention Mauve's "Ploughing: Holland" (4); Windmaier's "Sportsmen Returning: Bavaria" (89); "Spring and Winter" (37), an effect of cold light in a peasant interior, with white caps, which Mr. W. Firle is beginning to paint too often; and Tina Blau's strong and lively effect of blue sky and warm buildings, "A Bit of Ancient Rome" (60). Of conventional work there is plenty. Mr. Heffner is best in small canvases, such as "Bavarian Homestead" (26), but he is weakly insincere in everything. Fair work comes from Messrs. L. C. Müller, Hermann Philips, A. Holmberg, Israels, Chevilliard, and some others. Mr. Seiler's minutely worked "Arrest of Voltaire at Antwerp" (39) is interesting from its subject and from the expression of the figures, while as a picture it is most aggravating and inharmonious. Without any effort of artistic treatment, intelligent plan, or master conception, it is niggled all over with the same ardour and preciseness of definition. The whole of a picture cannot be equally full and excited any more than a symphony all trombones and trumpets, without becoming a dead level of ineffectiveness. Besides, from the ordinary human point of view, one does not occupy oneself with the light on barrels and bottles when Voltaire is being arrested before one's nose.

THE RISE IN SOUND INVESTMENT SECURITIES.

SELDOM has the Stock Exchange witnessed so great a rise in sound investment securities as has taken place since Mr. Goschen's conversion scheme has been laid before the public. Had the rise occurred after a sudden fall brought about by a financial or political crisis, or had it come when a long period of depression was drawing to an end, it would not be surprising; but the rise has occurred when already the prices of such securities were unprecedentedly high. For many years past the creation of new sound securities has been much smaller than the demand for them. The wealth of the world is constantly growing; while railway construction in Europe has come to an end, at least so far as main and really profitable lines are concerned, and Government borrowing on a large scale there has not been for many years. On the contrary, our own Government has been steadily paying off debt; while the redemption of debt by the United States Government has been on a scale larger than ever the world has seen before. The consequence is that the amount of money available for investment exceeds the supply of new investment stocks, and the old investment stocks are, therefore, steadily rising in price. Some weeks ago we called attention to the amount of idle money that was waiting investment, and to the consequent rise in prices, because the owners of that money were growing weary of leaving it unemployed and were beginning to invest. The investment came to an end as political apprehensions grew; but once more investment has become active, because of the proposed conversion of the National Debt. Many holders of Consols and New and Reduced Threes had come almost to persuade themselves that conversion was impossible. In the present position of the Continent, with a great war always in prospect, they believed that the Government would not give sufficient consideration to the banks to induce the banks actively to assist the Government in conversion, and without such assistance from the banks they argued that conversion was impossible. Hence these people, though unwilling to receive less than 3 per cent. for their money, had continued their investment in the Three per Cents. But, when the conversion proposals were made known, they saw with the rest of the world that conversion would be carried, and they were eager, therefore, to sell out their Three per Cents and invest in other securities. It does not follow, of course, that the buying was really very large. Undoubtedly large numbers of the holders of Three per Cents are not content with 2¾ per cent. interest; and very many of them instructed their brokers to sell the Three per Cents and buy other securities, always providing, however, that those other securities can be got at prices that would still give them 3 per. cent. or more. In many cases, however, it was soon found impossible to fulfil those conditions, and therefore we are inclined to think that the buying was much smaller than would at first sight seem probable from the magnitude of the rise. The truth is that, owing to the scarcity of sound investments to which we have been referring, the new savings of the world have for years been going into kinds of securities which ten or twelve years ago careful investors would not have been satisfied with. Consols, and debenture, and preference stocks had become too dear, and many investors therefore put up with ordinary stocks or Colonial Government bonds. And that the buying has not been so very large as is often assumed seems to be proved by the fact that the fall in Consols was slight. If all the discontented Consol holders, or even a considerable proportion of them, had sold, the price of Consols must have fallen heavily; but even this week Consols have been at a premium of from 1¼ to 1½. It seems to follow, therefore, that the selling of Consols has not been exceedingly large.

The rise was greatest in the ordinary stocks of British railway Companies, some of those stocks having advanced in a couple of days fully 6*l.*; but it was very general in all the securities which are classed as sound investments. At one time Two and a half per Cents rose to nearly 98; Indian Three and a half per Cent. stock this week has been 107¼; Indian Threes are a fraction under par; Metropolitan Board of Works Three and a half per Cent. stock has touched 115½; Birmingham Three and a half per Cents, 112; and Manchester Four per Cents have touched 125. Practically, Corporation stocks yield from about 3⅛ to 3⅜, while British railway debentures and preference stocks yield from under 3 to about 3¼. Thus, the Four per Cent. debenture stock of the London and North-Western Railway yields barely 2*l.* 19*s.* 6*d.* per cent, and even the ordinary stocks of the best British railways, at present prices, yield only about 3½ per cent. All this, however, is quite consistent with a comparatively small amount of real buying. It is quite true, as we have said above, that the number of persons who wish to buy was large, but the knowledge that so many persons were intending buyers was quite sufficient to drive up the price without actual transactions on a very large scale taking place. The more far-seeing investors, ever since Mr. Childers's proposals were made, have been avoiding Consols; they saw that conversion might be postponed for a while, but sooner or later that it was inevitable. They have, therefore, been buying debenture and preference stocks, Corporation stocks, Colonial Government bonds, and the like; and not a few also, of a less cautious temperament, have been investing in the ordinary stocks of British railways. All those investors who bought without the intention of selling again were not tempted to sell by the rise which took place last week, and which has been fully maintained this week. Indeed, if they had sold they would be in the difficulty of the intending buyers—they would not know how to employ their money to greater advantage; and, consequently, there was found to be a very great scarcity of these stocks in the market, and the result was the extraordinary rise that has been witnessed. Ten or a dozen years ago the quantity of railway ordinary stocks "floating in the market," to use a Stock Exchange phrase, was very large. It was held by large numbers of jobbers, large brokers, and speculators. It was always, therefore, changing hands, and a very considerable speculation in those stocks was in consequence possible. But so large of late years has been the investment-buying of those stocks that the floating amount in the market has been steadily decreasing, until practically now a large speculation is impossible. Speculators cannot buy on a very great scale, for the simple reason that jobbers will not sell, knowing that, if they do so, they cannot buy in order to deliver. The scarcity that has thus been created fully explains the rise in sound investment securities that has taken place, without any assumption that very large buying has actually occurred. No doubt there was considerable speculation also in the rise. For some months past it has been known that conversion was imminent, and capitalists with large sums at their disposal doubtless bought the better classes of stocks, for the purpose of selling when conversion was announced. Doubtless, also, many members of the Stock Exchange, in anticipation that the demand would arise, were beforehand with investors, and bought all the debenture and other such stocks that they could obtain. But, after all, the influence of speculation in the matter was comparatively small.

As regards the future, much, of course, depends upon the course of politics on the Continent. If there is no war, the influences which have been tending to send up the prices of all securities for years past will continue to operate. The sounder classes of securities will either maintain their present price, or will advance somewhat more. It is not probable, indeed, that in the very best of those securities there can be much further rise. For example, there would be very little advantage to a holder of Consols to sell his Consols at the present moment for the purpose of buying London and North-Western Four per Cent. Debenture stock. On his Consols he will receive for the next twelve months 3 per cent. interest and 5s. per cent. bonus, making together 3¼ per cent., and in the following year he will receive 2¾ per cent. Practically, therefore, for two years he will receive 3 per cent., and for the following thirteen years 2¾ per cent. But if he were to sell his Consols and buy London and North-Western Four per Cent. debenture stock, the interest he would receive at the present price would be scarcely 2*l.* 19*s.* 6*d.* He would receive, therefore, for the next two years less interest than he would receive on Consols, and though for the following thirteen years he would receive more, the benefit would not be great. On the other hand, if he continued to hold Consols, and converted, the probability is that his 2¾ per cent. stock would rise in price, and that in the long run the holder of Consols would gain more by retaining his Consols than by buying London and North-Western Four per Cent. debenture stock. But while a further rise in the very best of these securities does not seem probable, there is no reason to anticipate any material fall. The causes that have brought about the present prices will maintain them, and possibly even may produce a slight further advance. In the less excellent but yet sound securities a further rise is not improbable; nor is it improbable that there may be some further rise also in ordinary railway stock; for although at present prices —assuming that the dividends remain as they were last year— the yield averages only about 3½ per cent., it is always to be recollected that the dividend may be increased. Good trade, for example, would augment the business of the railway Companies, and would increase dividends. There is an element of uncertainty, that is, in the yield of ordinary stocks, which introduces a certain amount of speculation. As the sound securities of all kinds thus steadily appreciate, it is reasonable to anticipate that there will by-and-bye be a recovery in the more speculative securities. Any upward movement in Continental Government bonds is hardly probable, however, unless Continental politics become less threatening. If, however, peace is maintained, industrial securities of all kinds, including American railway securities, even of the more speculative kind, can hardly fail to recover in price. Just as Consol-holders are dissatisfied with the lower rate of interest, many of the holders of debenture and preference stocks, Colonial bonds, and the like, will grow dissatisfied with the small interest receivable on their holdings at present prices. They will be tempted to sell, therefore, and to buy securities of a kind not quite so assured as their own. Those who sell to them in turn will look for a higher rate of interest, and thus, by the shifting of investment, the speculative classes of securities will at last be reached. Before that comes about, however, there must, in the first place, be a more confident feeling as regards the maintenance of peace, and, in the second place, there must be a re-establishment in the United States of better economic conditions.

CRYSTAL PALACE CONCERTS.

LAST Saturday was a day of modern music at the Crystal Palace, at least if the chief symphonic numbers of the concert are considered. The Symphony itself was Goldmark's Country Wedding, perhaps his best as well as his best known work. Much of modern effort in every art is the outcome of theory and science on the part of men who are afraid to be easy and direct for fear of being banal. In so far as they come from deliberate and scientific intention rather than from artistic taste, just so far will these works engage the brains of intellectual men rather than the feelings of emotional ones. Music belonging to this class of art is apt to be more interesting and absorbing to its maker than it ever can be to a listener, even as scientific realism in painting seems thrown away on all but painters whose experience enables them to appreciate it intellectually. Lack of knowledge is fatal to enjoyment of anything which demands not only familiarity, but special studies to be understood. When an author has approached a subject merely as a problem, those who understand the proposition alone can follow him, and it is by reason, not by feeling, that they determine the success of his solution.

In this Symphony, at least, Goldmark, whatever he became afterwards, showed himself straightforward and natural, and yet the Country Wedding is full of originality and innovation. Though his aims included programme music and some departure from symphony form, the composer's intentions lie on the surface, his melody stares one in the face, and his instrumentation and musical devices are most clearly suitable to the character of his themes. That he adopted a most unusual form for his first movement—namely, the air with variations—does not make his music formless or incomprehensible. The air itself has a certain old-world precision of measure, and the variations are as unconnected as those of Handel's time; but the composer shows himself original both in the structure of these divisions and in their piquant and varied instrumentation. All departments of the orchestra were handled with a judicious respect for the general effect by Mr. Manns's excellent body of artists. They emphasized to the full the pleasant contrast between the force of No. 5 and the coquetry of No. 6, followed with great steadiness the imitative passages of No. 9, and gave the gracious stateliness of No. 10 and No. 13 with delightful dignity and precision. The theme of the "Serenade" is a fine inspiration of simple melody, and the oboists, who bore most of the burden, played to perfection. After the fourth movement, which seems a little long and somewhat plaintive, the fiery entrance of the "finale" is very welcome. All played with care and energy, and the symphony was brought to a triumphant conclusion. Two numbers—also orchestral—stood, one at the beginning, the other at the end of the programme. Byron's Manfred was an excellent find for a modern romantic musician, such as Schumann, and the Overture is one of his best compositions for the orchestra. Its fiery starts and bursts, its grand march-like passages, and its soft but still active second subject, met with an intelligent and vigorous interpretation. Mr. Mackenzie's Ballad for Orchestra, "La Belle Dame sans Merci," is music somewhat difficult to follow, but it seems to improve at every hearing, and was certainly better played than at its last performance at these concerts. With all its grandly organized orchestral bursts, long prepared effects, and immense variety of melody and sentiment, we do not quite see its aptness to express Keats's simple jet of weird fantastic feeling. That, however, is hardly a fault in a fine piece of musical work. It merely means that the composer preferred to take a sort of vast mythological and Wagnerian view of the legend, and appended Keats's poem because it was well known, not because its style and expression were appropriate.

Miss Clotilde Kleeberg gave a lively and brilliant rendering of Mendelssohn's "Concerto for Piano," No. 1 in G Minor, in which she was materially assisted by the excellent and judicious playing of the orchestra. The lively runs of the "Andante" well suited her peculiarly tender and tinkling touch, yet she was by no means lacking in the force required for the powerful passages in other movements, and especially in the splendid brio of the Finale. Miss Kleeberg plays Handel well; the piece chosen was "Chaconne and Variations," in G Major, and it suited her sharp sparkling touch, which reminds one of the point of acid in a cool invigorating claret. Mrs. Hutchinson put a fair amount of dramatic feeling into Gounod's "Plus grand dans son obscurité" (Reine de Saba), and sang very pleasantly "Mütterlein, sprich," and "Frühling ist da," by Fischhoff.

FRENCH PLAYS.

FEW French pieces have proved more successful in this country than M. Emile Augier's fine comedy of L'Aventurière. The author has acknowledged that he modelled his earlier works upon those of Molière; but he certainly contrived to infuse into this particular piece a stronger dramatic interest than is usually to be found in plays of the school to which he attached himself in his youth; and although L'Aventurière was written some time before Gabrielle, and is in a purely literary sense greatly its inferior, it is infinitely more interesting when produced upon the stage. The action takes place in an age sufficiently remote from our own to enable the actors to use verse without appearing unreal or affected. It is said that M. Coquelin in Annibal, which was originally created by Regnier, preserves his great master's traditions, and follows his lines faithfully. This may or may not be so, but if it is, it is all to the greater honour of the pupil; and certainly in two scenes it would be very difficult to find any actor now living who could approach M. Coquelin. The first of these is the one in which Annibal, after indulging over freely in wine, reveals in an unguarded moment his sister's secret, and thus defeats his own and her purpose. This he plays with consummate skill; we actually seem to see the fumes of the liquor rise, reddening the face, and moistening the eyes of the intoxicated rascal. His vain endeavours to recover his reason and to pull himself together are depicted with a subtle elaboration which is positively fascinating, and as faithful a copy of nature as art can ever hope to give. And when at length he is finally overwhelmed by the strength of the wine, and, reaching the maudlin condition, falls into a heavy sleep, his so doing occasions a feeling of absolute relief, so eagerly has every movement been watched. He is equally excellent in the last scene of all, where his well-laid schemes are defeated through his own stupidity; and at last, when he finds himself face to face with the man who killed his own master, Matapan of Geneva, his trainer in sword-play, he collapses, drops his braggadacio, and takes himself off out of the presence of the outraged but triumphant Fabrice like a well-whipped cur. A close observation of M. Coquelin's acting, not only in this part, but in all the characters we have witnessed him perform this season, enables us to form a clear idea of his histrionic method. He depends rather upon the varieties of intonation of which his voice is capable and of the placing of the exact inflection upon various words, whereby he gives them their true value and even subtlest meaning, than upon elaboration of gesture. We know of no English actor of equal rank who acts so little. Scene after scene passes during which M. Coquelin always contrives to be interesting, but in which he barely lifts his hand or arm or moves from his place. This economy of gesture is all the more surprising coming from a Frenchman; but those who are acquainted with the traditions of the Théâtre Français will remember that it is one of the chief rules of that great institution to make its associates understand that they must never attempt a move or gesture without reason. We also observe that M. Coquelin avoids posturing or forming what English actors popularly call "a picture." He skilfully shuns making sensational exits or surprising entries. If he quits the stage in the middle of a scene, he does not do so for the emphatic purpose of provoking a round of applause, but goes off naturally, as the text requires him to do. The members of his troupe have been, we believe, for the most part recruited from provincial companies, and are not much known in Paris. This being the case, the excellence of their acting is all the more surprising. M. Duquesne has frequently been praised as an actor of exceptional versatility. As Fabrice in L'Aventurière he surpassed himself, and in the passionate interview in the fourth act with Clorinde he was genuinely tragic. When this wily woman, seeing that her game is lost, ventures to insinuate an insulting slur upon the memory of his mother, he turns upon her, and beats her down by sheer force of indignant fury. Mme. Patry plays the part of Clorinde admirably. It is no easy task to depict the different moods of this capricious and dangerous woman, who, for all her accomplishments and graces, has at the bottom of her nature much of the brutality which distinguishes her amiable brother. Like M. Coquelin, Mme. Patry is sparing of gesture; but her acting throughout is never inappropriate, but invariably graceful and dignified, and where it is necessary for her to pantomime the attitudes which she assumes are in the best style of plastic art. L'Aventurière is a piece with three parts of almost equal importance—Annibal, Fabrice, and Clorinde—but the other three personages are mere shadows. The young lovers are insipid, and Mont Parade, the astute Clorinde's victim, has only one fine scene, which M. Borel rendered very picturesque by his grand manner.

During the week M. Coquelin and his companions have appeared in Le Parisien and Le Juif Polonais. The first-named piece, which has been previously reviewed in these columns, contains a part which M. Coquelin plays perfectly; but the weird hero of the French original of The Bells is, in our opinion, not at all in his line. We willingly pay our tribute of admiration to M. Coquelin's great talents when displayed in parts which suit him, but those of a romantic character he certainly never ought to essay.

On Thursday evening M. Coquelin essayed, for the first time, a part hitherto associated with the names of M. Régnier and M. Got—that of the faithful old retainer Noël in Mme. Emile de Girardin's well-known comedy La Joie fait Peur, a piece which, although admirably written, is apt to prove very doleful and wearisome unless it is extremely well acted by all concerned. M. Coquelin's Noël is perhaps the most finished piece of acting he has yet given us; but, for all its elocutionary and plastic elaboration, it has, to the general audience at least, the aspect of extreme simplicity, so skilfully are the wires, to use the expression, concealed by his consummate art. In none of his other characters does M. Coquelin teach a greater lesson, to English actors especially, in the art of varying the inflections of the voice according to the numerous shades of emotion he wishes to express. It is, indeed, remarkable to note in how many totally different ways he repeats almost the same phrase, and what meaning he can give to apparent trifles. He draws a picture of the honest-hearted old servant which a Scott or a Dickens would have delighted in describing—full of tenderness, delicacy of sentiment, and quaint humour. His by-play, too, throughout is a study, and it is a veritable treat to watch the care with which he dusts the furniture and shakes the sofa cushions. He does not obviously pretend to perform these household duties, but honestly goes through them with all the solicitude of a trusty servant. His recognition of his newly-restored master was most affecting, and nothing could be more pathetic than his tender concern for his mistress in the hour of trial. His watchfulness over her, his delicate expression of love for her daughter, and his quaint drollery throughout were all rendered in a manner in every way worthy of a great artist. Mme. Patry played the part of the lachrymose mother, and rendered it interesting, which is saying a great deal for the excellence of her acting, since this character is written in a dreary and unnatural style, bordering very frequently on bathos. M. Jean Coquelin was a pleasant Adrien, and Mme. Baretty a very natural and unaffected Blanche.

THE INVITATION AND THE RESPONSE.

A certain patriot writeth:—

Dear Sir,

FEELING sure from the speeches you've made
 That you hold not the arrogant W-rr-n in awe,
We believe you will willingly lend us your aid
 In defying that minion of "order and law."
And we therefore invite you a meeting to call
 In the Square of Trafalgar for some future day
And, declaring that spot to be open to all,
 To eject the police in an orderly way.
If you hold, with ourselves, such proceedings to be
 The best means of defeating despotic intrigue,
Send a line by return to the Secretaree
 Of the "Mob Law and General Anarchy League."

One answereth him:—

My name is J. B-tt-mley F-rth,
There is no braver man upon earth,
 And I fully intend
 To your project to lend
My assistance for what it is worth.

But I've no metropolitan seat,
And I cannot but think it is meet
 That the patriots bold
 That distinction who hold
Should be first to descend to the street;

So 'tis better distinctly to state
That at present I purpose to wait
 Till they show me the way
 To the glorious fray
In a minimum number of eight.

Another replyeth:—

Sir Edward R—d
Is charmed indeed
 By the request you make him,
Which, were it not Exactly what
 It is, would greatly take him;
But, lest he err,
He would confer,
 Much as your offer flatters,
With some of those
Who, he'd suppose,
 Know something of such matters.

A third droppeth a line:—

Dear Sir,

The question of Trafalgar Square,
 As raised by the events of last November,
Ought to be handled, you must be aware,
 By, first of all, some metropolitan member.

And while I in your objects sympathize,
 Nor will my efforts spare your ends to gain,
The House, I think, an adequate field supplies
 Of action for yours truly,

C. S-le H-yne.

A fourth respondeth:—

The dearest wish of W. S. M'L-r-n
Has ever been to beard the imperious W-rr-n;
He thinks that when the House has risen for Easter
The bearding might take place; although ere he stir,
The metropolitan members, 'tis his notion,
Should take the lead to put the thing in motion;
Else the whole scheme may prove completely barren,
Or so, at least, thinks W. S. M'L-r-n.

What a fifth said:—

To vindicate the people's rights, dear Sir,
 I shall, I hope, be always found alert;
None with the London members will confer
 In mood more resolute than Thomas B-rt.

The reply of a sixth:—

Where the fight is raging thickest
In the Square, and stones fly thickest,
 There your eye shall surely mark
(Given the co-operation Of the London representation)
 Yours sincerely, G. B. Cl-rk.

Answereth at last a metropolitan member:—

A bold metropolitan P-ck-rsg-ll I,
 And I boldly make public the fact
That with those who are willing the law to defy
 I'm prepared—on conditions—to act.
I, of course, must confer with them first, and tell them
 Your proposal must lie on the shelf,
And I'll fix on a day to confer with them when I've conferred for a while with myself.

REVIEWS.

KINGSFORD'S HISTORY OF CANADA.*

THE title-page of the present volume, which bears a London imprint, gives no clue to the nationality or to the qualifications of the author, but from internal evidence it is apparent that Mr. Kingsford is a Canadian, and in point of fact the volume was published at Montreal at the close of last year. Mr. Kingsford undertakes to trace the history of Canada from the earliest date of French rule down to the series of events which have led to the present Constitution under which the Dominion is governed. The first volume—all that is yet published—carries the narrative down to the expedition of La Salle to the mouth of the Mississippi in 1682. The same ground has been covered from an American point of view by the series of independent historical narratives by Mr. Parkman, beginning with his Pioneers of France in the New World. It is inevitable that Mr. Kingsford, who has had access to original materials not, perhaps, available when Mr. Parkman's earlier volumes were published twenty years ago, should not agree at all points with the conclusions of his predecessor; and in a history which chronicles the clash of conflicting creeds and nationalities it is no doubt impossible to attain to absolute impartiality; but Mr. Kingsford expresses the hope that those who differ from him will recognize that he has warrant for the belief that his opinions are fully sustained by a discriminating examination of original authorities, and an endeavour to divest himself of all sentiment dictated by faith or nationality. Mr. Kingsford's work would have been more useful to the general reader if he had given a little more preliminary information as to the Indian tribes, and especially as to the geography of the early settlements. Facts within the cognizance of every educated Canadian are not so universally apprehended on this side of the Atlantic; for instance, the names of early settlements are altered or the settlements abandoned, and the localities consequently cannot be found in modern maps; yet Mr. Kingsford gives his readers no map to help them to follow his narrative, and he leaves them to find out for themselves such matters as the distinctions between the Algonquin and Iroquois races, taking it for granted that they know to which of these tribes the Mohawks and the Mohicans respectively belonged. If somewhat lacking in the minute local descriptions which give such a charm to Mr. Parkman's volumes, Mr. Kingsford deserves especial commendation for the pains which he has taken to lay before his readers in a few lines the previous history and character of each individual who appears in his pages. The broad outlines of the history of Canadian settlement are clearly laid down; the policy which governed it is plainly indicated, and the sequence of events is traced with due attention to their relative proportion and importance.

The precise period at which the St. Lawrence was first ascended by the mariners of Dieppe, St. Malo, and Rochelle is uncertain; the earliest recorded instance is that of Cartier, who, on his second voyage to Canada in 1535, made his way up the river as far as Montreal, where he ascended the mountain, and gave it its present name. His report to François I. was coloured so as to convey the impression that the dream of the age—the discovery of gold and precious stones—would reward his adventurous countrymen. It is a point of some interest that he mentions the Indian practice of smoking some years before the birth of Drake and Raleigh, the traditional discoverers of tobacco. He adduces evidence of previous European visits, which establish the fact that trade is more ancient than the record tells us. It does not appear that Cartier's voyages were followed up by any attempt at permanent settlement, though there is evidence that trade in furs was maintained by vessels annually arriving from Europe. The real founder of New France was Samuel Champlain, who has left on record by his own pen an unpretentious account of his exploits in Canada, which extended over a period of thirty-two years, from 1603 to 1635. Mr. Kingsford seeks to restore Champlain to the place in the history of the country which is his by right. Champlain's motives have been misrepresented and his actions unfairly criticized; his very writings were, as Mr. Kingsford shows, tampered with in their own interests by the Jesuits. His leading idea was > to establish the value of Canada to France. He looked upon its political and commercial importance with the eye of a statesman. To him it was the last thought to regard Canada as a mere field for the conversion of the savage.

Champlain's first voyage in 1603 was a commercial venture to Tadousac, at the mouth of the Saguenay. He parenthetically tells us that the Indians whom he met there informed him that their enemies were the Iroquois—a remark which Mr. Kingsford adduces as a proof that no subsequent proceedings of Champlain's created the deadly enmity generally ascribed by Mr. Parkman and others to his policy. Indeed, he later on deliberately refused to strengthen the Dutch on the Hudson by destroying the power of the Iroquois. On this voyage he followed the St. Lawrence to the foot of the rapids above Montreal, and the Richelieu sufficiently far to enable him to describe the lake which now bears his name. The recital of his adventures to Henri IV. induced the first attempt at settlement, which was made at Port Royal, on the Bay of Fundy; but the experience of two winters proved the unsuitability of the climate and the exposure of the colonists to rival attempts so long as they remained on the coast. Champlain saw the superiority of Canada over Acadia, and counselled a change of base to the internal waterway of the country, and his advice was followed. He also counted on the native tribes as powerful instruments in carrying out his policy; necessity made him the ally of the Indians; his aim was to organize the friendly tribes, to win them to Christianity and civilization, and by their aid to establish French power on the continent. The neglect of this policy led to the attack on the white settlers, the annihilation of the Huron race, and the ruin of the Jesuits' missions. In 1608 Quebec was selected by Champlain as the most suitable place for a settlement, and buildings were commenced. Specimens of oak were taken to France by Champlain, who even at this early date foresaw the future timber trade of the country. The death of Henri IV., followed by Jesuit ascendency at Court and the internal troubles of the kingdom, caused Canada to be neglected by those in power for half a century; the nascent colony was starved and its control left solely to the Jesuits, who cared nothing for national objects, and aimed only at the establishment of their authority. They were not, however, the first of the religious orders to appear on the scene. That honour fell to the Recollets, who were introduced by Champlain in 1615; they established missions in the Huron country, and discovered Lake Ontario by ascending the Ottawa. During Champlain's lifetime there were no serious Indian difficulties; famine was the enemy most dreaded by him. From a national point of view he constructed a fort at Quebec, that New France might be safe from attack, though the Company who controlled the trade of the place looked on the expenditure as a waste of money. There were difficulties of jurisdiction between Champlain and the Company, and he was unable to prevent the sale of arms by French traders to the Indians. He especially bewails the neglect of agriculture by the association, recording that the first use of the plough was not till 1628. In that same year the half-manned and ill-provisioned fort at Quebec was summoned to surrender by an English privateering expedition under Kirke, who intercepted some supplies sent from France for the relief of the garrison. Champlain held out through the winter; but next summer starvation and lack of ammunition obliged him to surrender, and the flag of England floated over the citadel of Quebec. The loss of a French possession called the attention of Richelieu to the value of it; and in the necessities of Charles I., at that time just beginning the struggle with his Parliament, and in no condition to carry on the war into which he had recklessly plunged with France, the great Cardinal saw his way to re-establishing the prestige of his country in the eyes of Europe. Half the marriage portion of Henrietta Maria remained unpaid; to obtain payment of this money Charles restored Canada to France after three years of English occupation. A century and a quarter was to pass ere the cession was again reversed. Had England retained her conquest, the settlement of the West would undoubtedly have been effected much earlier; for the French achieved little beyond the exploration of the rivers, while the New England colonies were shut in from the West by the Alleghanies. Champlain returned to Canada in 1633 with a commission as governor, the commercial Company undertaking to pay his salary and all the expenses of government, receiving the profits arising from trade. Thus the home Government had no interest in and contributed little or nothing towards the advance of the colony. The Jesuits had sufficient power at Court and with the Pope to prevent the return of the Recollet Fathers. The first Jesuits had arrived in 1625, more came over on the re-cession of the colony, and quietly appropriated the establishments of the Recollets, to whom history has done scant justice for their work in preparing the ground. Champlain scarcely survived two years to discharge the duties of governor, dying at Quebec on Christmas Day, 1635. Mr Kingsford comments on the absence of any monument to his memory founded in the country which he, "to teach the youth of the Dominion what excellence there is in a noble, honest life, marked by devotion to duty and an utter disregard of self."

The twenty-five years which succeeded Champlain's death bear the stamp of failure, owing to the non-observance of his policy. The colony was stationary; the governors were merely the representatives of the Company, whose objects were purely mercantile; while the Jesuits devoted themselves, with incredible fortitude and disregard of personal suffering, to the conversion of the Indians. The Jesuit "Relations" attest the appalling cruelties which the Fathers cheerfully underwent; but history records that the result of their labours was a total failure. At the close of the missions the Huron territory was depopulated by the Iroquois, who regarded the Hurons as the allies of the hated white man, and the very existence of the feeble colony was threatened. Montreal was settled in 1641, but from none of the ordinary motives of colonization; it owed its foundation to religious zeal alone, as an outpost whence missionaries could make their way into the heart of heathendom. The inhabitants, both of Quebec and Montreal, were only safe from Iroquois attack within the palisades of the forts. No aid was given by France; there was little general sympathy and an entire lack of enterprise in the development of the colony. There was no armed force of sufficient strength to retain the respect which the French had at first imposed. Horses were unknown in the colony; for hay could not be grown, as the mowers were always in danger of being killed. The difficulties of government were increased by ecclesiastical disputes, and the pretensions to absolute power for the Church put forward by Bishop de Laval. It was felt at length that, if the country were to continue to be inhabited by white men, some national recognition and aid from France was indispensable, so an agent was despatched to ask the intervention of the King. This awoke attention to the safety of the country; soldiers were sent over in 1663, Canada passed from the control of the Company and was erected into a Royal Province, and a Council under a governor was established at Quebec. These reforms were due to the vigorous administration of Colbert. Their beneficial effect was soon felt. Immigration was encouraged, and a land system developed; trade was fostered, though the traffic with the Indians in liquor led to lengthened disputes with the Church. The river Richelieu and Lake Champlain were fortified, and war was carried into the heart of the Iroquois country by De Tracy, who broke the power of the Mohawks by destroying their villages near the headwaters of the Hudson. Here the French came into contact with the English; for the New Netherlands, which had been settled by the Dutch while England was engaged in domestic troubles, had been ceded to England by the Treaty of Breda in 1667. Hudson's Bay was taken possession of by the French in 1671. Under the governorship of De Frontenac the spirit of discovery awoke afresh, and the limits of the colony were extended to the Great Lakes. Jolliet and Marquette discovered the Mississippi in 1673, and descended it as far as the Arkansas. Mr. Kingsford proves that the claim of priority for La Salle was never made till after his death, though he had discovered the Ohio in 1671, but without knowing whither its waters flowed. In 1679 La Salle and Hennepin built a vessel above the falls of Niagara, and navigated Lakes Erie, Huron, and Michigan. In the following year Hennepin penetrated to the falls of St. Anthony on the Upper Mississippi; and La Salle, after the endurance of great hardships during two years in an unsuccessful attempt to reach its mouth, finally succeeded in descending the river to the sea in 1682. The mouths of the river, with several hundred miles of its lower course, had been known for nearly a century and a half, through the early Spanish expeditions of De Soto and others, though these exploits were imperfectly known to the Canadian explorers; but to La Salle belongs undoubtedly the glory of being the first European who descended from its upper waters to the Gulf of Mexico.

At this point the close of Mr. Kingsford's first volume breaks off the narrative of French enterprise in the New World. It will be a pleasure to his readers to resume it on the appearance of his next volume.

NOVELS.*

FRESHNESS is not exactly what any one can assign to the two first books in our list, though neither is a bad book in its own way. Miss Rosa Carey and the author of Phyllis both write very much up to themselves and never much beyond themselves. The central situation of Only the Governess is not bad; for it really must be a strong sensation to fall in love with your sister's governess, and discover that she is your intimate friend's wife. As this happens by the middle of the second volume, it is not wrong to tell it. Miss Carey has brought in a great many characters, and she bustles them all about in a businesslike and not unamusing way, while the tone of the book is, as is always the case with her, healthy and good. But is a mouche the same as a moue? And can you make a mouche by "pursing up your lips"? We had not thought so. Marvel is another stock book, if we may invent a phrase capable of doing useful work. It is in this respect different from most of its author's books, that we miss the young man, usually of the name of Dicky, who quotes the most recondite authors, always speaks or behaves adverbially ("says Dicky languidly," &c.), and keeps up brisk fires of verbal flirtation with the young woman usually of the name of Dolly, or something like it. Otherwise, there is much sameness. We may, however, submit to the author that it is rather unpatriotic to borrow the central situation of the Roman d'un jeune homme pauvre, and exhibit the English young man as either so much less inventive or so much less brave than M. Feuillet's disguised nobleman that he does not get his lady companion out of the difficulty. As the lady is a married woman, too, there was all the more need of extrication. However, if Mr. Savage had behaved in the proper fashion, and jumped out of the window, it might have been awkward for the story. We don't ourselves quite like the other situation, in which, as our author herself remarks, somebody "loves the mother, and marries the daughter"; but, perhaps, that is only our squeamishness. And, after all, Lord Wriothesley was only Mrs. Scarlett's lover, and not her amant.

Criticisms of different sorts might no doubt be passed upon Robert Elsmere; but there is one which we can hardly imagine any competent critic passing. The picture might have been better—to speak honestly, it might have been very much better, but not if the painter had taken more pains. Of pains Mrs. Ward has been most creditably lavish. Her Westmoreland scenes and her Oxford scenes and her London scenes—West End and East End—are evidently all taken with much labour from the life; some at least of her personages are almost labelled and ticketed "Copy from So-and-so," and we should not be surprised to find that most of the others were equally conscientious studies from the model. Unluckily, this is not enough; unluckily, it is very often fatally more than enough. The constant suggestion of something photographed, something calqué upon the actual, is but an irksome thing in a novel. Neither has Mrs. Ward confined herself to this source of tediousness. Her hero is one of those no doubt well-intentioned persons who are, we venture to think, not, indeed, equally hateful, but equally despicable, to God and to the enemies of God; one of the folk who cannot bear to be without a religion, and for whom the religion which was intellectual enough for St. Paul and St. Augustine and St. Anselm and Butler and Berkeley is too unintellectual, the religion which was spiritual enough for St. John and for Thomas à Kempis and for Jeremy Taylor too unspiritual. It is true that the good man does not come to this conclusion at once, that he has already taken honours and orders and a living and a "fair soul" to wife before some exceedingly commonplace scepticism of the squire of his parish produces the same effect, with the same suddenness, as the immortal query about the queerness of the Pentateuch. Then Robert Elsmere gives up his living and his orders and, though not his wife, his wife's happiness, in order to found a "new brotherhood of Christ. At last he does the most sensible act, as it strikes us, of his whole career, and dies. About that, however, there may be differences of opinion. We do not think that among competent judges there can be any difference on another point—that stuff of this kind is not good stuff, is very bad stuff indeed, for a novel. "Oh! but," Mrs. Ward, who has a just admiration for Kingsley, may say reproachfully, "Yeast? Alton Locke?" Now both these are very charming books; but we think that they are charming, not because but in spite of the feature which they have in common with Robert Elsmere. Moreover, Kingsley has done exactly what Mrs. Ward has not done—he has given a general human interest which would carry even heavier passengers than it has to carry, and he has cut both books short, Yeast very short indeed. Robert Elsmere consists of some eleven or twelve hundred tightly packed pages; Yeast, which has ten times its action, of 350, rather loosely packed. The simple truth is that Mrs. Ward seems to be on quite the wrong track of novel-writing, and to have, by some unlucky knack, got together, for the purpose of following that track out, all the faults of two bad contemporary schools. She is as much a slave of documents and of copying from the life as any French naturalist, though being an English lady, and not a Frenchman, she naturally chooses different models; and she is as much the slave of a weak and beggarly "analysis" as if she were Mr. Howells himself. Of her own motion she has added this unfortunate propensity to a class of theme as uninteresting as Mr. Howells's, and to some tastes, at any rate, not much less unsuitable than M. Zola's. The most careful and scholarly writing—of which there is plenty here—the most excellent intentions, even a certain amount of not ill-expressed observation of fact and character, will not make a readable book in these unlucky conditions.

After Robert Elsmere, A Wily Widow, which is an ordinary novel enough, comes with a certain sense of refreshment. Indeed, one may reverse the criticism exactly, and say that here the picture would, &c. Mr. Cresswell has a not inconsiderable idea of incident and of conducting a story. His poisoning heroine, Maud Gainsborough, behaves very much as a real poisoner would, and tries her second murder so naturally that we should rather like to hear how she actually did her first. The final scene (where a sharp young lady catches the poisoner literally in a trap by smashing down the revolving cover, also sharp, of an escritoire on her hands) is remarkably brutal, bold, and successful, suggesting stage possibilities. There is in the earlier part another audacious and successful situation, in which the same young person, who has spirited her sister up to fly from an unwelcome lover, induces the poor young man to escort them both to the railway-station, and coolly tells him the whole thing under a thin allegory just as the train starts. These and other things are good of their kind; but Mr. Cresswell's dialogue is rather weak and his characters shadowy. Even Essie Chesterfield, the heroine of these two situations, is a young woman of whom we do not quite know what to make. Her sister Violet is only an outline; the victim, or almost victim, of poison, Lily Hardwick, does not live at all; and all the men are sticks. But there is an odd freshness about the book in parts.

Readers of Dr. Heidenhoff's Process, a clever book, should prepare themselves for a severe disappointment in Looking Backward, 2000–1887, which, to put the matter plainly, is a stupid book. The slender frame of fiction is not interesting; and the solid middle of purpose is about as dull as anything can be. There is a little touch of Mr. Bellamy's former talent in the preface, which is an elaborate excuse to the reader, not of to-day, but of the twenty-first century. That person may accept it if he likes; but the present value of an excuse payable a hundred and twelve years hence is both arithmetically and [illegible] small. Mr. Julian West, a young American "[illegible] man" of this or last year (and what punishment could be too great for such a one!) is subjected to an awkward trial. Being subject to insomnia, he has built himself a subterranean sleeping room which, though he is just going to be married, nobody knows of but a mesmerist and his valet. After spending an evening with his betrothed, he goes home and to bed, put to sleep by the mesmerist, who is just starting for New Orleans. The house is burnt in the night and the valet in it; the quack either never hears of the matter or does not care. Mr. Julian West goes on sleeping till 2000, when the present owner of the re-edified house above him accidentally discovers the vault, revivifies his ci-devant landlord, and introduces him to the twenty-first or twentieth (if that old quarrel still survives) century. This is in full swing of State Socialism, no private property, concerts and sermons turned on per phonograph, and all the rest of it. By a daring, but certainly not happy, innovation on the usual story of this kind, Mr. Bellamy makes his hero learn all the glorious gains of the new era, not so much by experience as by recital at his host's mouth. Of actual story there is, as we have said, the merest fringe or frame, and the only interesting part of this is the comforting fact (which we could have guessed) that there will be pretty girls a hundred years hence. As for the kernel of didactics, it is inexpressibly silly. According to the author, people only had to become State Socialists to bring on the millennium. What he does not tell us is how the characteristics of human nature, having remained absolutely unchanged for two thousand five hundred years, or thereabouts, of authentic secular history, happened to change into something quite different in the course of a few decades. We can only suppose that Mr. Bellamy, who has some cleverness, is laughing at Socialism under the guise of being a convert to it. But he has certainly written a wonderfully dull book. One feature we ought perhaps to note, that he has improved on the old and awkward "and behold it was a dream" by making the awakening also a dream and the dream the truth. There is nothing very clever in that; but, such as it is, it shall have celebration.

"These States," as Mr. Whitman and others like to call them, are large, and it is absolutely impossible to foresee the end of a range of titles which begins with "Mr. Barnes of New York," and continues with "Mr. Potter of Texas." Readers of the former book may be prepared for some of the characteristics of this. It is clever in a way, and is full of the most grotesque blunders. It opens with a fight—the rescue by an Australian of an English lady during the bombardment of Alexandria—which is a noble fight, though we fear not very probable; at least, we should not ourselves like to risk our chance of salvation on boring holes through doors, sticking cartridges in them, and tapping the ends with hammers. The barrel of a gun has something to do with its lethal powers, which our author seems to forget. However, it is an excellent fight. After it we plunge into the wildest imbroglio, in which the Australian, the lady whom he has saved, and Mr. Potter of Texas are the chief figures, with plenty of subordinates. The beautiful lady—indifferently called Lady Annerley, Lady Sarah Annerley, Lady Sarah, and Lady Sahara (this last, it appears, is a joke)—is the daughter of somebody who has impartially wronged her saviour's father and Mr. Potter. Mr. Potter is an Englishman by birth, who has G. T. T.; who, when excited, breaks out into those impossible combinations of aspirates and non-aspirates of which American writers have the secret, and who addresses Lord Lincoln, an English judge, as "Peer." There is also a pleasing dude, Mr. Van Cott; and all about the book there are oddities innumerable. "A boy of twelve clothed in characteristic knickerbockers, though he wears an Eton cap." Tell us, O ye who know that our Tower of London is in the vicinity of our parks and our drives, what is an Eton cap? What, too, is "a cowardly Egyptian fellaheen"? how did that cowardly Egyptian become several blackguards at once? But the chiefest thing is to come. Lord Lincoln ("peer" in Mr. Potter's lingo) tells us that "his resignation from the Bench not being as yet accepted, and no successor to the office having been appointed, Lady Annerley's affidavit, taken by him, will be sufficiently binding for the purpose he shall use it, that is to quash the indictment against Samuel Potts, and to make such representation to the Home Secretary as shall obtain the Queen's free pardon for Ralph Errol." Of the greatness of Alfred Davids none but infidels doubt; but we never knew that, even in the hands of a not yet resigned judge, a single one was quite so great as this.

A twelve-year-old critic of Modern Vikings returns it with the unanswerable criticism, "But there are not any Vikings in it." There are not; and it is a pity that Mr. Boyesen should have put a silly and pretentious title to a book which has some merit in it, though it is spoilt by Americanisms. The nearest approach to a Viking that we can find is a young gentleman who, having rather rashly taken his little sister a-fishing with him, and having by chance harpooned a dolphin, is carried out to sea and luckily rescued by his own father. There is a "gnome" story (Mr. Boyesen might have called Norwegian spirits by their own Norwegian name of Troll) which is old but good. There is a fowling story and a snow-shoe story which are fair, and there are two stories of tamed beasts—"Mons," the otter, and "Mikkel," the fox—which are excellent. The silliest thing in the book is putting Yankee dialect into the mouth of Norwegian fishermen. Why should a Norwegian, if he spoke English, which he might or might not, say "thar" for there, and "ef" for if? "Ax" and "bowlder" are trying enough, but this is worse.

GERMAN BIOGRAPHIES.*

THERE was ample room for a new work on Novalis, combining into a whole the various biographical particulars which have gradually accumulated about the meagre sketch at first deemed adequate by his friends. Its imperfection is reflected in what is to this day the chief source of information for English readers, the essay by Carlyle, who had evidently by no means obtained his usual firm grip of a subject when he dealt with the ethereal author of Heinrich von Ofterdingen. By the aid of the contributions of Just, Novalis's guide in the technicalities of his profession as mining engineer, and the interesting little book published some years ago by an anonymous member of the Hardenberg family, the portrait of Novalis has become much more definite; and, as in the parallel case of Shelley, the result has been to do away with much of its seeming vagueness and unearthliness, and to lay bare a stratum of vigorous will and practical efficiency. Novalis must nevertheless remain one of the "problematic natures" that Goethe so delighted to scrutinize, for he never even understood himself. The period of youthful development and intellectual ferment was unusually protracted with him; and when he died at the age of twenty-eight it was still uncertain whether he would become a Neo-Catholic, like Friedrich Schlegel, or a Protestant enthusiast, like Jacob Böhm; or whether, freeing himself from the fascinations of mysticism, Protestant or Catholic, he would prove a great objective delineator, like Goethe. The firmness of outline and vivid pictorial power observable in some parts of Heinrich von Ofterdingen incline us to the latter view. If it is so—if Novalis could have attained to Goethe's knowledge of life and mastery of art without forfeiting his poetry and ideality—German literature lost one who, in Goethe's own words (if they are correctly reported), in course of time might have become "an Imperator." Such a possibility justifies the pains which Dr. Schubart has taken with the biography and the intellectual affinities of his hero. It is but natural that the easier half of his work should be the better done. Some of Novalis's literary work is too obscure and oracular to be usefully criticized; a large and more valuable portion may be compared to fine music, which can be admired and enjoyed while heard, but whose charm eludes analysis after the sounds have died away; while the admirable Hymns are too simple and clear to afford the critic much scope. Dr. Schubart has done his best with these various difficulties, and, if sometimes hazy and verbose, has at all events succeeded in depicting Novalis as the purest representative of the spiritual thirst which broke up the deadness of the eighteenth century.

Friedrich Rochlitz possessed many tastes and accomplishments which qualified him for the friendship of Goethe. For many years he was the editor of an influential musical periodical; he achieved, and deserved, considerable reputation as a composer, dramatist, poet, and novelist. He was an artist of no mean ability, and inherited through his wife a fine collection of pictures. His correspondence with Goethe, turning principally on literary and artistic subjects, though never very animated, continued for thirty-one years (1800-1831), and evidently gave pleasure to both parties. Goethe's share of the correspondence has been already printed, but is benefited by the juxtaposition of Rochlitz's letters, which, as the editor remarks, are models of the art of pleasing and coaxing without any descent to servile flattery. The most remarkable are those containing his denunciations of the young German art-students at Rome, whose pre-Raphaelitism was an abomination unto him. Some passages in Goethe's letters are very characteristic, as when he does not disdain to canvass Rochlitz for a favourable review of The Natural Daughter, inasmuch as encouragement is absolutely necessary to enable him to proceed; and when he expunges some jests at the expense of philosophers in a comedy of his correspondent's, on the ground that people will be laughing at their betters, if they laugh at all.

Abt Vogler, best known to English readers through Mr. Browning, was a highly scientific musical theorist, as well as a prolific composer, and especially renowned in his own day as a teacher of harmony and an organ-builder. He was patronized by crowned heads and persons of distinction, but his latter days were clouded by embarrassments, and since his death he has, most unjustly in his present biographer's opinion, been denounced as a charlatan. His manuscripts, which seem to have been at one time in the hands of his pupil Weber, have mysteriously disappeared. According to Dr. Schafhautl, the best biography, previous to the appearance of his own very comprehensive and painstaking work, is Professor Mee's article in Grove's Dictionary of Music.

It is to be hoped that Lady Blennerhassett's title-page will prepare her readers for a general work on Mme. de Staël's life and times, in which the heroine herself frequently disappears in the crowd of incidents and personages not always in the closest possible connexion with her. A thick volume brings the history only down to 1790, when none of Mme. de Staël's principal works were as yet written, and she was only beginning to distinguish herself as a writer of pamphlets and political articles. Necker, Mme. Necker, and Mirabeau are so far the heroes of the book; and if the same scale is maintained when they have given place to Benjamin Constant, August Schlegel, and Bonaparte, the dimensions of the work will border upon the formidable. At the same time, the reader is not likely to complain. Lady Blennerhassett's style is attractive, her knowledge exhaustive, and her candour exemplary. She seems to have very sound and just conceptions of the persons and events that occupy her pen, and when she finds more to say about the proper subject of her book she probably will not be found deficient in the regard which every right-minded biographer entertains for his hero or heroine. At the same time, her own position as, apparently, a Liberal Catholic, will shield her from the inconsiderate enthusiasm which so gravely detracted from the merits of the last comprehensive biography of Mme. de Staël, an excellent book in other respects.

Count Eckbrecht Durckheim, though a Bavarian by birth, was a French Prefect under Louis Philippe and Napoleon III., and his generally tedious memoirs are redeemed from absolute lack of interest by personal traits of these sovereigns, and illustrations of the course of administration during their reigns. Napoleon is evidently his favourite, and all the glimpses we obtain of the Emperor tend to justify the Count's remark that it is a thousand pities he was not a constitutional sovereign, who had come fairly and honestly by his crown. In 1866 the Count was despatched on a mission to reorganize the telegraph service in Algeria and Tunis, which proved entirely successful, and has afforded material for some agreeable pages. It is vexatious to hear that he might have imparted various excellent stories, which he has withheld under the entirely erroneous impression that his readers would feel more interest in his personal affairs.

The Life of Gottfried Bernhardy is not only that of an eminent classical philologist, but of a literary historian, who, in his biographer's opinion, was the first to teach philologists how literary history should be written. "Bernhardy," he says, "is the creator of a really scientific treatment of Greek and Roman literary history." As an editor, his principal achievement was his Suidas, in which he received valuable aid from Hermann; he projected a library of Latin classics, which came to nothing from the default of his contributors, whom he seems to have treated too much like schoolboys. The main labour of his life, however, was the direction of the philological seminary at Halle, where he educated a large proportion of Germany's future classical schoolmasters. He was always complaining of his pupils, but in the opinion of persons less difficult to please his labour was not in vain, and it certainly lacked nothing that high aims and indomitable industry could contribute to make it so. His life had in general been identified with his studies and his profession; the principal interruptions to the general evenness of its course were the mortifying fiasco of the Bibliotheca Scriptorum Latinorum and his misunderstandings with his colleague Bergk.

A selection from the correspondence of Wagner, many years agent at Rome of the art-loving King Louis of Bavaria, gives an amusing insight into the management of a great sculptor, who is idle, wayward, and mutable, and at the same time indispensable. Thorwaldsen seldom knew exactly what he wanted, and it is to Wagner's credit to have got so much work out of him with, on the whole, so little friction.

Emanuel Geibel's rank as a poet fully entitles him to a biography, but the biography cannot be very interesting, as the life is not very eventful. Nor was Geibel endowed with such intellectual powers as to compensate for the barrenness of external incident by the wealth of his ideas and the charm of his conversation and correspondence. He was a true singer, the merit of whose lyrics consisted in great measure in their melodious simplicity, and one who could not, if he would, have committed the mistake of overweighting them with thought. The principal incident of his life was his visit to Greece in his youth; its most remarkable feature was the continual ill-health which trammelled his poetical faculty without ever extinguishing it. Apart from these, the biographer has little to record but Geibel's early struggles, the patronage of the King of Bavaria, a happy union with a child-wife, soon dissolved by her death, and his generous support of an old friend, reduced to penury by sickness and irregular habits. As Geibel's schoolfellow, Dr. Litzmann has some special qualifications for his task; as a physician, he is excusably tedious in his treatment of the medical details, which unfortunately constitute a large part of Geibel's and his wife's history.

As the best female poet of Germany, Annette von Droste-Hülshoff has even a better claim to a biography than Geibel, but the incidents of her life, closed by consumption in 1848, at the age of fifty-one, are even less numerous and interesting than those of his. Herr Hüffer's memoir is nevertheless redeemed from dulness by [illegible] literary treatment, and the vivacity of the poetess's own letters, which, without especial brilliancy or any very important matter, nevertheless evidently emanate from a bright, active, and intelligent mind. Annette herself was considerably more interesting than her associates in the incidents of her existence, and is always most acceptable in proportion as her pen is occupied with her inner life. The most pleasing part of the book is the account of her early attempts at composition, which afford the same insight into the first ferment of youthful genius as the similar productions of Charlotte Brontë.

It would be a severe satire on German poetry if Anna Luise Karschin had really merited the appellation of German Sappho, and the bestowal of the title upon her by her contemporaries was probably more than half in joke. By so much, however, as she comes short of Annette von Droste in the merit of her verse, by so much does she surpass her in the interest and variety of her history. Of humble origin, she was married to two bad husbands—the first a miser, the second a drunkard. She freed herself from the latter by the spirited measure of procuring him to be forcibly enlisted in the army, and turned a deaf ear to his entreaties to buy him out. "I shall be glad to hear of your reformation," she remarked; "but I have no wish to see it." She turned professional poetess, and supported herself by writing complimentary verses for patrons on all possible occasions, frequently receiving handsome presents, but always in difficulties from her want of management and lavish generosity. She took it into her head that Frederick the Great had promised to build her a house, and upon his successor's accession presented a petition which actually gained the desired object, and enabled her to end her days in comfort. She was essentially an improvisatrice, endowed with a real gift of song and considerable energy of diction, but her houghts are usually commonplace.

STUDIES IN THE TOPOGRAPHY OF GALLOWAY.*

THE divergence of politicians into the paths of literature seems to produce better results than the encroachment of literary men on the domain of politics. We have surely had some recent examples of eminent men who would have done wisely if they had stuck to their books and had burnt gas or oil at midnight anywhere except in the House of Commons. The book before us is a precedent in the other direction. That a Junior Lord of the Treasury should at some period of his career find time to explore philologically two or three Scotch counties might not surprise us. That in a Session marked by prolonged debates, divisions, disturbances and noises of all kinds, he should be able to produce a book remarkable for extensive research and generally sound deductions is as astonishing as the gyrations of Sir William Harcourt and the inconsistencies of Mr. Gladstone. This is no volume of fugitive pieces or defunct essays exhumed from the pages of periodicals. It is a serious attempt, first to catalogue and then to explain the derivation of some four thousand names of places which have hitherto excited a languid curiosity in tourists and perplexed the lovers of antiquarian research.

The province of Galloway, which comprises the county or shire of Wigtown and the Stewartry of Kirkcudbright, according to the best authorities was, in very old times, inhabited by an Iberian race, in all probability akin to the Basque. Then followed one or possibly two invasions of Celts from the Continent. They flooded the southern part of Scotland, and occupied Galloway for some twelve centuries. Sir Herbert Maxwell, in a preface distinguished by temperate and judicious reasoning, slightly touches on the difference between the Gaelic and Brythonic dialects, on Pictish affinities, and on other murky subterraneous questions. But leaving these themes, as to which the best authorities are not always agreed, the following points seem to us to have been fairly established. Hills, plains, rivers, woods, and all other remarkable features of a picturesque district, bear names traceable to the following sources. First, there are fragments of an Iberian language, of which little more is known now than it was when Tacitus hazarded the opinion that the Silures, with their black hair and ruddy faces, had crossed over from Spain to Britain. Next we have names which are clearly Erse or Gaelic, and they can be found in that language as it is still spoken in the Highlands or in Wales. The bulk of the names belong to a tongue which may be heard now in Rossshire and Argyllshire. The Brythonic variety is not dealt with in this book, and it may be left for some "happy future day" when Irishmen cease to trouble us. Then there are a few later importations in the shape of words of Anglo-Saxon or Scandinavian origin, and downright Middle English and Broad Scots. But it is not rash to conclude that by far the greater number of places retain the appellations given them by the Cruithne or Picts of Galloway during a period ranging from the second century down to the sixteenth of our era. Another conclusion may be relied on with even more confidence. Things are not what they seem to be in the nomenclature of Galloway. Abbreviations were easy; consonants were elided; aspirates were dropped; and there has been a mischievous tendency to assimilate words of Celtic origin and meaning to Anglo-Saxon phrases which seemed to have a decided resemblance in sound.

* Studies in the Topography of Galloway; being a List of nearly 4,000 Names of Places, with Remarks on their Origin and Meaning, and an Introductory Essay. By Sir Herbert Eustace Maxwell, Bart., of Monreith, M.P., F.S.A., F.S.A. Scot., F.L.S., &c. Edinburgh: David Douglas.

When this transformation had taken place in the mouths of illiterate farmers and peasants the next thing was to invent a legend to account for the new word. We shall give some notable instances of this curious transliteration. As a rule, hills and mountains, plains and flats, trees and wild and domestic animals claim a very large share in Sir Herbert's research and discovery. The word knock or hill, properly spelt cnoc, occurs as a prefix to two hundred and twenty hills in Galloway. Bar, the top of anything, is similarly a prefix to more than one hundred and fifty names. Kil, which might mean a cell or chapel, a wood, or a corner, or a back part, occurs more than fifty times. Pol, a pool or stream, some twenty times. Then mountains are either red, black, grey, or yellow. They are the habitations of the brock (badger), the sinnach (fox), or the madadh or maddy (the dog or the wolf). Glens are shady with the oak, the willow, the birch. Eminences and corries are places where calves (gowan) were tethered or deer (fiadh) pastured. Streams have the breac or spotted trout; other localities are tenanted by pigs, appropriately in Erse known as muc. In Drom a ridge, with the epithet more or great attached to it, we have Dromore both in Ireland and Scotland; and for the meaning of the Mull, whether of Cantyre or of Galloway, we are referred to Maol, which signifies a bare headland.

But a selection of a few derivations out of the four thousand will give a better idea of the patience and skill with which the author disentangles knots, pursues affinities, and suggests inquiries for other philologists. We have always thought that a proprietor, however hospitable his intent or charming his country-house, might have some hesitation in inviting any one except his most intimate friends to pay him a visit at Shambellie. But in fact this is sean or shan, old, and bhaile or baile, dwelling. If surnames are changed or assumed by Royal licence or at individual option, we think it would be better if this property could be known under the form of the word which elsewhere is spelt Shanvalley. Ass of the gill is another instance of the same kind. This is a compound of three languages. Eas in Gaelic is a cascade; gil is a ravine in Scandinavian; and then the English Philistine inserted our own preposition and the article. Gil or gill, we may observe, is to this day used in Sussex to denote a ravine, generally wooded on both banks, with a muddy streamlet at the bottom. Barnyard has little or nothing to do with a homestead. It is bearna ard, the high pass or gap in the hill. Another term for this kind of feature in a mountain range is nick or nock. Blaw Weary might be thought a phrase taken out of Burns's poems. It is probably Blár iarach, the west field. Buss is busch or bosch, the Latin boscus, a wood or thicket. Of Clawbelly the same may be said as of Shambellie. It is clach bhaile, the stone house, and appears as Cloghvally in Ireland. Pleonasms are not infrequent in the catalogue. An accomplished Persian scholar, deceased not long since, used to object to the expression the Hari Rud River; the Persian rud being the equivalent for a stream or torrent, just as the Usk or Esk means water, and nothing else. Barrhill is one very familiar instance of this, and Knock-Fell is another; the Icelandic fjall being tacked on to the Erse knock. Crook's Hill may be a third example, if the interpretation of the first syllable as cruach can be taken as correct. On the other hand, the first syllable of Kill-hill is not to be resolved into kil or coil or cul, but into kiln, a place for drying grain, and Kil-Hill, the n being dropped, might then mean an elevation where grain is dried. This seems to us a little questionable.

Mount Hilly, again, is not ridiculous tautology; it is moin choille, hill of the coil or wood. Some other places have been named after a noted personage, local hero, warrior, maiden, or saint. This process followed as local history made itself; for obviously names would at first be assigned from some peculiar and striking physical feature. Stoneykirk is the church of St. Stephen; Steenie, Stainie, Staney in pronunciation. Hence an erroneous interpretation of a parish or district full of stones. Kirkmaiden, known from the lines of Burns if from nothing else, as the most southern parish in all Scotland, is not the church of the Virgin, but that of St. Medona, an Irish girl about whose Lucretian chastity we have a curious old legend. Kilmorey, which is found in some fifty townlands in Ireland and from which a well-known peerage takes its title, is Cill muire, St. Mary's Church. Killantringan is the church of St. Ringan, otherwise St. Ninian. Killfillan, similarly, is St. Fillan's Church; Killfeather, the church of Phetir or Pheadair, or St. Peter. Barfadden may be the hill of Phaidin or Paidin, little Patrick; and Rodericks and McClellans and McGhies have, by charter or tradition, lands and hills named after their own selves. Here and there a classical word comes in. Ernespie is Ard an espoic, the hill of the ἐπίσκοπος or bishop. Sir Herbert quotes a Gaelic authority to show that espoic is used for a bishop. Now and then we are told that some Gaelic original, though apparently lost in the modern spelling, survives in the pronunciation in use to this hour. Droicheaid means properly a bridge, and joined to the familiar Barr is explained as Hilltop of the Bridge; but it is now written Bardrochwood, and pronounced Bardrochat by every shepherd. Kildrochat and Drumdrochat may be similarly explained. A trade which began at some particular spot and gave its name to the locality, still maintains its hold there. Challoch is teallach, a hearth or smith's forge. It occurs in Wigtownshire and the Stewartry, and there is still a smith wielding his hammer at one or two places so named. T followed by a diphthong is soon changed to ch. Scott would have been glad to know the correct etymology of several words which he had pressed into his service. Mr. Croftangry would have learnt that his name meant Croft fhainre, the sloping croft, or if he preferred a popular etymology, Croft an righ, the King's Croft. Balfour of Burley when in hiding was known to his intimate friends as Quintin Mackell of Irongray. The place has no connexion with either metal or colour. It is, if we are to credit Sir Herbert, ard an greaich, the height of the mountain flat or the moor. Ellangowan does not actually occur; but Ellergower, very like it, is ail na gobhar, the cliff of the goats. Baldoon, familiar as the locality of the Bride of Lammermoor, is Baile Duine, townland of the fort, and there is the fort to this day as a witness. The inevitable Dryasdust character of such a catalogue or dictionary is relieved by some quotations from ballads and by anecdotes or sayings which fulfil Mr. Weller's characteristic of good letters—they make us wish for more. We do not think the author has anywhere told us the exact meaning which the country folk attach to the word "Lane." By this is understood a reach of a sluggish stream, generally flowing through a peaty bog, deep, and treacherous, and very unlike the usual sparkling, gushing, clear trout-streams of Scotland. We are sorry that he has not been able to find out the etymology of the Merrick, the highest mountain in the south of Scotland. But his general scope, method, and arrangement are excellent. The parish or district of each place is carefully given; the explanations are not priggish or too precise; and, though Gaelic scholars may not accord to every derivation an unhesitating acquiescence, the author has shown sense and discretion in leaving some places without any attempt at explanation. The learned in such matters may fill up the gaps. It is always refreshing to find a prophet who is not "cocksure" about his own prophecies, a priest who has no dogmas, and a Pundit who does not discern light and transparency where others can only see fog and mist.

Better opportunities for the interpretation of doubtful names and designations have been afforded to residents in a very different part of the British Empire. The process by which some names are retained, are partly altered, or are dovetailed into the language of more recent invaders, can be studied in our Indian Empire, with the additional advantage that fewer changes have there been effected by the intolerance of Mohammedan conquerors or the crass ignorance of early Anglo-Saxon residents. A large proportion of the towns, villages, and hamlets of India are Sanskrit or its derivatives. Some of the capitals, bazaars, and crowded marts bear, on the other hand, names taken direct from the Persian. In some we find a hybrid union of both languages. In wild and jungly tracts there are names fearfully distorted from their original shape, or which do not belong to any Aryan or Semitic language. They may be the utterances of the Mlechas, who fled before the Aryan warriors who settled in the plains. As Sir H. Maxwell is not only a classical scholar, but has also looked for analogies in more than one Oriental tongue, he may be thankful for a notice of a few errors, which doubtless were owing to his "incessant Parliamentary and official work." The Persian word signifying a farmer, or "one who sows," is warz-kar, not warz-har, and it is by no means a common term. It is too remote to be connected with wark, werk, or work. Kisht-kar is the usual term in Persian for a peasant or agriculturist. The hand, in Sanskrit, is hasta and not harna. "Dog," in the same language, is kukura, not cuan. When two vowels come together they either coalesce to a diphthong, or else one is turned into a semi-vowel. The root pri means to protect, satisfy, or please, and not to bring over. The root to shine is chadi, and not chand, though the latter word in all dialects of Sanskrit means the moon. Mârga is a path or road rather than a trace. And the ill-omened word Nâna is not Sanskrit at all in the sense given by the author. In pure Sanskrit nâna means "various." In Hindi it is generally used for a maternal grandfather. Darbha is not defined with sufficient accuracy, even by the Rev. W. Skeat, as a kind of grass. It is the sacrificial or kusa grass. These errors or omissions do not impair the solid value of the work. It must be a satisfaction to country gentlemen in the Lowlands, who live very much in the open air and read few books, to know why their farms and hamlets are so named. It will be a guide and landmark to future philologists. And it is proof that a legislator with strong local sympathies and attachments can revive almost extinct memories without setting class against class, dividing the Caledonians against themselves, or speculating on the chances of Home Rule for the Western Lowlands, under which Provost Mucklewhame should certainly be the first President of a new Assembly.

DICTIONARY OF NATIONAL BIOGRAPHY.—VOL. XIII.*

THE most important historical personage in this volume of the Dictionary of National Biography is Oliver Cromwell, of whom Mr. C. H. Firth treats in an article which, as everybody will remember, has given rise to an interchange in the Times of letters between its author and Mr. Reginald F. D. Palgrave, the writer, in the Quarterly Review for April 1886, of "Oliver Cromwell: his Character illustrated by himself." Mr. Palgrave contended, and we think with justice, that his argument, which is founded on "evidence drawn from Cromwell's State papers," was not one to be dismissed as "merely an ingenious paradox"—the term applied to it in the Dictionary. Mr. Firth has since explained that with him the words "an ingenious paradox" merely express his belief that the facts adduced do not warrant the conclusions drawn from them. Into the question whether Mr. Palgrave has proved that Cromwell "manufactured, for his own purposes, a Royalist conspiracy" in 1655, we shall not attempt to enter. Mr. Firth has expressed his intention of hereafter discussing in detail the whole subject, including "the general question of Cromwell's honesty"; and it will also be Professor S. R. Gardiner's duty to deal with it, at, we trust, no very distant day. If Mr. Palgrave's figures are right, the present biographer perhaps puts things rather mildly when he says that "a few of the leaders were executed"—the few, being, it appears, fourteen or more. And it is pushing the biographer's simple faith rather far when he solemnly cites, as if it proved anything, Cromwell's own assertion of the moral and religious advantages of his system of arbitrary government by Puritan major-generals. But the most Royalist of readers may be grateful to Mr. Firth for his services in collecting and weaving together all the facts relative to Cromwell, including much that is not in Carlyle. The history of Cromwell's earlier military career is carefully gone into; the references to foreign works dealing with the relations of the Protectorate with Continental Powers will be found of especial use, and the bibliography of the whole subject is thoroughly and impartially treated. Here and there we notice some verbal discrepancies between Mr. Firth's version of Cromwell's words and that of Carlyle, to whom he refers. It is well known that Carlyle is not implicitly to be trusted for verbal accuracy; but if Mr. Firth has taken his quotations from other sources these should have been distinctly indicated.

Thomas Cromwell is placed in the competent hands of Mr. Gairdner, who, by the aid of the researches which Mr. Phillips has been making into the Wimbledon manor rolls, has thrown considerable light upon the early history of his subject. It seems to be admitted that Thomas Cromwell was identical with the Thomas Smyth of the Wimbledon court rolls (his father appears sometimes as Cromwell and sometimes as Smyth); and, if this be so, though we are still far from possessing clear and full knowledge of his early adventures, the court rolls supply some fixed points to start from. The article upon Cranmer is also Mr. Gairdner's work, and is equally valuable. Among the biographies of later Churchmen we may notice that of Bishop Crew, by Canon Creighton, whose unvarnished account will rather disillusion readers who only know that prelate as a stately figure in Mr. Besant's romance of Dorothy Forster. Yet the worst story against Crew—that of his having paid five or six thousand pounds to Nell Gwyn in order to obtain possession of the see of Durham—is not even alluded to by Canon Creighton, whether through disbelief or through reluctance to stoop to scandal we know not. Of mediæval Churchmen the most important is Saint Cuthbert, whose history is appreciatively told by Mr. Hunt. Interesting biographies of soldiers are those of Lord Craven, by Professor A. W. Ward; of Lord Cutts, the "Salamander," by Mr. Chichester; and of Dalyell or Dalzell, of Covenanter-hunting fame, by Mr. Henderson. Mr. H. Morse Stephens, in his biography of Craufurd, the hero of Ciudad Rodrigo, does not seem to be sufficiently well informed as to his subject's early history. He thus writes of Craufurd:—

> In 1807 he was sent to South America on the staff of General Whitelocke, and took command of a light brigade, consisting of a battalion of the 95th regiment, the Rifle Brigade, and the light companies of all the other regiments. With this brigade he led the advance upon Buenos Ayres, and in the attack upon that city he successfully accomplished the task before him, when he was suddenly checked by the orders of Whitelocke and ordered to surrender with the rest of the army.

The last part of the statement is incorrect. What really happened was that Craufurd, having made his way into the city, threw himself into the convent of Santo Domingo, and there maintained himself for about eight hours, at the end of which, having received neither support nor further orders, he, without having had any communication with Whitelocke, surrendered himself and his brigade as prisoners of war. Another of the attacking columns had already surrendered; but "the rest of the army" was withdrawn upon a treaty concluded two days later. Mr. Stephens cannot have read with much attention his own authority, Cole's memoir of Craufurd; and apparently he has not studied the charges against Whitelocke, or consulted the evidence given on his trial, in the published reports of which Craufurd's own account of the business will be found. He represented himself as having been "abandoned"; while Whitelocke complained of Craufurd's omission to communicate with him. Nor was Craufurd sent out in 1807 on Whitelocke's staff. He was sent out late in 1806 in command of an independent expedition; and it was not till he reached Montevideo that he came under the command of Whitelocke, whose appointment had been an afterthought. Mr. Stephens also seems to be in some confusion, or at least has expressed himself in a confused manner, about the 95th or Rifle Regiment, of which Craufurd had under his command from four to eight companies. It appears from Sir William Cope's history that it was not till 1816 that the 95th became the Rifle Brigade. These are small, and may be thought uninteresting, points; but what is the good of military history, or indeed of any other history, unless it is written with accuracy? In the note at the end, the published reports of Whitelocke's trial should have been included among the authorities; and it would have been well also to give a reference to Croker's notes of Wellington's remarks about Craufurd. Croker himself is the subject of an interesting but over-diffuse biography by Sir Theodore Martin.

Those who care more for literature than for history will turn at once—that is, if they remember to look for "George Eliot" under the letter C—to the editor's account of Mary Anne Cross. In the way of biography there is, of course, little or nothing new to tell; but the article will be read with interest for its criticism. Matter-of-fact readers may perhaps tax Mr. Stephen with a slip of the pen in writing of Tito Melema as "one of her finest feminine characters"; while feminine readers, if they perceive the sarcasm, will be ready to assure him that Tito is one of the most distinctively masculine characters in fiction.

Crichton (the Admirable), and Croke or Crocus, the sixteenth-century Greek scholar and diplomatist, by Mr. S. L. Lee; Cruikshank, by Mr. Austin Dobson; and Dalton, by Miss A. M. Clerke, are all noteworthy articles. And as an example of the good work which the Dictionary is doing in gathering together dispersed fragments of the history of men not in their own day obscure, but now forgotten, we may notice Mr. R. L. Poole's account of the fourteenth-century Franciscan alchemist and prophet, John Cutcliffe, alias Rochetaillade. It is not every one, we admit, who is consumed with desire to know all about Friar Rochetaillade; but if, or when, one thirsts for such knowledge, there will be found in Mr. Poole's article an amount of information which it would cost days of running about the Bodleian and the British Museum to collect for oneself, even if, which is improbable, one knew where to begin to look for it.

ARCHER-HIND'S TIMÆUS.*

THE present school of Platonic studies in Cambridge is certainly the most interesting, if only because by far the most serious, which has existed in this country. The impulse which apparently began, if anything begins, with the late Master of Trinity, and of which Dr. Jackson has been the chief promoter, has now significantly produced what "appears to be the first English edition of the Timæus." By a serious Platonist the Timæus cannot be put aside as a pleasing or a tiresome romance. "What is the world," is its question, "and how did it come to be?" Here, if anywhere in Plato's extant works, must be found his fundamental doctrine. Mr. Archer-Hind's book is really a review, complete and in very important parts original, of Platonic philosophy. As we hold it to be essentially right, we shall not spend words upon the magnitude of the achievement.

The translation (for the whole dialogue is translated) may be briefly dismissed. If the editor cannot construe Plato, no one can. He is often plainly right where all before have been puzzled; and very seldom plainly wrong. We cannot, for instance, accept "first we must assign to all the substances we have mentioned the property of causing sensation" for πρῶτον μὲν οὖν ὑπάρχειν αἴσθησιν δεῖ τοῖς λεγομένοις ἀεί (61 C), where the perversion of αἴσθησις is the least of several objections. The meaning is "In all that we say (about sensibles) sensation (in some sentient) must be presupposed." But we have noticed no error of moment, and will now turn at once to the substance.

The Timæus is in form a strange and fanciful story of creation. The "artificer," desiring that the universe should be good as he is good, and seeing that the best of all things is the "ideal living thing," αὐτὸ ὅ ἐστι ζῷον, made the universe like it, a living thing. And the soul of it he made of Being, Same, and Other. And of the same materials he, or those whom he commissioned, made all separate souls—and so forth. Now the author tells us expressly that these are not things which really took place in time and in historical succession as they are related. What, then, does this pretended story mean? Mr. Archer-Hind answers, It is a parable of absolute idealism. The distinction of the artificer, the model, and the copy is mere machinery of the fable. The true point lies in the statement that the life or soul of the world is like absolute life or soul, taken together with the description of soul. The universe is "the self-evolution of absolute thought." The soul of the world makes the world, and is that which is made. It copies itself off, so to speak, because Soul or Thought is by its nature subject and object, One and Many, "Same" and "Other."

"For since One has meaning only when contrasted with Many, Being, forasmuch as it is One, demands that Many shall be also. But since Being alone exists, Being must itself be that Many. . . Being is the synthesis of every antithesis. The material Universe is Nature manifesting herself in the form of Other; it is the one changeless thought in the form of mutable multitude. Thus does dualism vanish in the final identification of thought and its object; subject and object are but different sides of the same thing. Thought must think; and, since thought alone exists, it can but think itself. . . . The Universal Soul attains plurality by differentiating itself into a number of finite intelligences. . . . But for this independent consciousness every soul has to pay a fixed price. The price is limitation, and the condition of limitation is subjection to the laws of what we know as time and space"; and hence come natural phenomena, which are symbols of the eternal as perceived through the senses by finite souls. But "the only existance outside particular souls is the Universal soul. Mind is the Universe, and beside Mind there is nothing."

We think, as already said, that the editor makes good his case. Sometimes, indeed, he seems to put Plato's thought rather as Plato might have put it if he had read modern philosophy than as he actually did. Thus when "space and time" are grouped together as the two conditions of limitation, we believe that Plato's belief is truly represented in modern terms. But Plato did not consciously so group the two, or he would have brought them together in his fable, which he does not. But to follow the editor in detail is here impossible. We cannot even quote his expositions of Plato's "space" and "time," admirably clear and subtle as they are. If we are to say anything to the purpose we must confine ourselves to some one point, and it shall be the main point. Is Plato's position purely idealist? Is his material universe, as the editor says, a symbol or image of thought? On this we shall offer something which may not be without importance.

The kernel of the Timæus must lie, where the editor would find it, in the mystical statement that "the soul of the world is of Same, Other, and Being." It is clear, from the whole form of the work, that Plato, whatever he meant by this, thought it of supreme importance. It is, in fact, the only thing in his "probable account" which he will affirm to be assuredly true. Now, when he has concluded, in highly impressive language, his treatment of this topic, and is about to speak of the "making of time," when he is passing, that is, from the intrinsic and eternal nature of things to the condition under which they appear, he pauses, as if to mark the importance of the moment, and recommences his tale with a few striking words, biblical in their majesty and harmony, which purport to resume what has been said up to this point (37 C). In these words, then, if anywhere, we may expect to find something precise and definite; if there is anywhere a key to the parable, here is the place to look for it. These are the words:—ὡς δὲ κινηθὲν αὐτὸ καὶ ζῶν ἐνόησε τῶν ἀϊδίων θεῶν γεγονὸς ἄγαλμα ὁ γεννήσας πατὴρ ἠγάσθη τε καὶ εὐφρανθεὶς κ.τ.λ. "And when the father who begat it perceived the created image of the eternal gods that it had motion and life, he rejoiced and was well pleased." So, then, the doctrine so incomparably true and important is this—that the world is an "image of the eternal gods"! Mr. Archer-Hind, conscious of the crisis, is amazed, as indeed are most people; and well they may be. It would be an undeserved compliment to call such language obscure. Of what gods, eternal or other, can the world, according to Plato, be the image? In the preceding exposition not a word has been said of "gods" or any god; and when in the process of the story we hear of gods, it is in a sense which would make nonsense if read into this place.

If Plato [says the editor] wrote θεῶν (which I cannot help regarding as doubtful), I am convinced that he used this strange phrase with some deliberate purpose in view, but what that purpose was, I confess myself unable to divine.

We are offered, that is, the choice, either to reject the text as corrupt or to interpret it as an enigma; and this is the inevitable alternative, if we are to suppose that the Timæus had any serious purpose. But the first alternative, precarious at best, is here not to be thought of. Neither error nor design would bring in words simple in appearance, in reality bewildering. It remains to try the way of enigma. The prima facie meaning is seen upon reflection to be impossible. Do the words admit any other? Certainly they do. The word θεῶν is ambiguous; it is the genitive of θεοί, but it is also the genitive of θέαι. Now θέαι, the plural of θέα (whence θεᾶσθαι, to contemplate), signifies sight, both active and passive, and in philosophical language both contemplation and the object of contemplation. It is used by Plato elsewhere, as Aristotle uses the more prosaic synonym θεωρία, for the operation of pure thought. Thus in the Phædo (84 B) the philosophic soul, when, delivered from the body, it is restored to its true function, is said "to contemplate (θεᾶσθαι) the truth," or, as the same thing is expressed figuratively in the Republic (615 A), "to enjoy a contemplation (θέαι) of marvellous beauty." The words τῶν ἀϊδίων θεῶν ἄγαλμα admit then the meaning "image of eternal thought." But this is just what, if the editor be right, Plato did mean. And the cryptic manner of expression (for, of course, the impossible θεοί, from its familiarity, suggests itself first) is exactly like that of another such phrase, first explained by the editor, which occurs at the end of the dialogue. If the world be self-evolved, the "model" and the "maker" of the allegorical story are but aspects of the same thing. Just as he closes, Plato lets us know this, by suddenly describing the world, for the first time, as εἰκὼν τοῦ ποιητοῦ. If we have wit enough to see that this cannot really mean "the image of that which is made" (which is nonsense), and faith enough not to alter it, as some have done, into εἰκὼν τοῦ νοητοῦ, or anything else, but just to think about it again, we are rewarded by discovering that ποιητοῦ is from ποιητής (not ποιητός), and that the world is thus declared to be the image "of its maker," which is the hint required. Such cryptic expressions are found in Plato elsewhere, and were probably suggested to him, with not a little of his vocabulary and imagery, by the mysteries of Greek religion.

It is an interesting question why Plato should have used parable so much as he does, and why he veiled in allegory doctrines in themselves sufficiently difficult. Poetic taste, and a certain contempt for the vulgar understanding, may be a partial, but not a complete, explanation. We should probably add the simpler motive of prudent apprehension. It is by no means clear that such a theory as the Timæus seems to veil could have been published plainly in Plato's time without exposing the author to discomfort, if not to danger. It must be allowed, however, that the history of Platonism does not encourage such fastidiousness, or, if so it was, such caution. For whether Mr. Archer-Hind has probed the Timæus or no, it is too certain that few have tried to understand it, and very, very few have in any degree succeeded. And this leads us to speak of the only general defect with which Mr. Archer-Hind may be charged. His theory of Platonism will not be complete without a theory of Aristotle, or rather of the alleged Aristotelian writings. The editor rates Aristotle not highly, and in this volume seldom refers to him without an asperity which does not please us. But we may, perhaps, presume that Aristotle was a man of common honesty and average intelligence, and he must have heard Plato explain himself without disguise a hundred times. Yet he is credited with criticism of Plato, which is not merely dull, but transparently false. All that the editor says on this head we by no means accept, but look at the Physica, called "of Aristotle." Plato says that "the artificer" made time as "an eternal image of eternity." A man may say that this phrase, with Plato's explanation, is intelligible, or may say, if he pleases, that it is not. But he will not say, if he has wit or discretion, that "Plato makes time come into being, whereas all others hold it to be everlasting." The literary history of "Aristotle" is in the highest degree suspicious, and it is time that some one, especially if he approaches at all to the views of Mr. Archer-Hind, should say a plain word on the subject. Meanwhile, this book is a valuable and permanent addition to our philosophical literature.

LEAR'S BOOK OF NONSENSE.*

THE presence on our table of a new and complete edition of The Book of Nonsense reminds us that a quarter of a century has just elapsed since the Old Derry-down-Derry first presented this remarkable classic "to the great-grandchildren, grand-nephews, and grand-nieces of Edward, thirteenth Earl of Derby." The pictures—most of them—dated back much further than 1862, and were made for the delectation of the parents of the happy tribe enumerated. When the book was beginning to make its way with the public, but before its real author was widely known, a rumour went abroad that it was Edward, thirteenth Earl of Derby himself, who, in his lighter moments, had thus diverted the world with his pencil. Various passages in the poems themselves seemed to give weight to this idea, and in particular the words at once so modest in deprecation, so irresistibly confidential in allusion, were felt to be all that could be required in evidence. The late Mr. Lear used to tell a story of a journey he once made in a railway carriage with a gentleman who discoursed aloud on this subject, and stated that the authorship of The Book of Nonsense, by Lord Derby, was within his own private experience. Mr. Lear at last was moved to say that it was not so, and that, besides, a real Edward Lear existed. "Ah! no, indeed, my dear sir," was the reply, "you do not perceive our little transparent subterfuge. 'Edward' is his lordship's christian name, and 'Lear,' you will perceive, is simply 'Earl' transposed." Nor even when the author took off his own hat, and showed him his name written in full around the lining, was this rash inductive critic entirely convinced.

There was an old person of Cromer
Who stood on one leg to read Homer,

The sustained popularity of these verses and drawings is remarkable. At no time, so far as we remember, have they been published at a particularly cheap price, and yet their sale has been enormous. The drawings very cunningly combine the clumsy conventions dear to children with types and expressions that display real artistic knowledge and observation. For instance, in the portrait of the Old Person of Leeds, "whose head was infested with beads," the lower extremities of this person, and the artless manner in which she sits, as one who never learned to sit, on the small stool, are puerilely false and silly, while her greedy expression and the fatuous upward glance which tells that the gooseberry fool has just acted upon the nerves of the palate are very fine indeed. So that in all the really successful pictures in this book there is on one hand the concession to childishness which childhood appreciates, combined on the other hand with genuine humour, and sometimes with a mild species of genuine satire. Another lasting charm which breathes through the book is the gallant spirit of so many of the characters, and their noble disregard of any of those inconveniences which ensue upon the indulgence of personal eccentricity. The Old Person of Hurst, who, when they said "You'll grow fatter," for he was very fat to start with, merely answered, "What matter?" the Young Lady of Norway, who, when the door squeezed her flat, just exclaimed, "What of that?" and the Young Lady of Hull, who, when chased by a virulent bull, merely seized on a spade, and called out "Who's afraid?" are instances of a great spirit of independence which breathes through this beautiful, though perhaps sometimes a little quaint, volume. Nor was a temper superior to the moral misfortunes of life ever shown to a more heroic degree than by the Young Lady of Lucca, who, when her lovers completely forsook her, ran up a tree, and said "Fiddle-de-dee!" We can imagine no reproof more stinging, and we shall be very much surprised if we do not find, upon investigation, that this conduct, though entirely disinterested at the time, had the result of bringing her a choice of fresh lovers, much better looking, and with larger balances at their bankers.

We must express a hope that the original text of this classic will not be tampered with. Many of our readers will recollect that the conduct of the Old Person of Philæ was "scroobious and wily." We lament to see this altered to "dubious." There was nothing dubious about the Old Person of Philæ, but he was just scroobious. To ask what "scroobious" means is to show oneself no worthy denizen of the land of Nonsense.

OLIVER GOLDSMITH.*

IT was admirably remarked by Coleridge of Goldsmith's varied work in literature that he did everything happily. The good genius that inspired his pen in all things seems to have presided with not less constancy over the oracles of criticism. Men of the most diverse gifts and humours—De Quincey, Macaulay, Thackeray, to name a few—have written of Goldsmith with the happiest unanimity of judgment. Detraction died with Kendrick, and Northcote, Boswell, and Hawkins have essayed in vain to hint a fault or hesitate dislike. Mr. Austin Dobson's Life of Goldsmith in the "Great Writers" series will strengthen the impression that Goldsmith has been singularly happy in his biographers. Indeed, it is not unnatural to regard Mr. Dobson's undertaking as the most fortunate of all the literary dealings of posterity towards one who must inevitably have ranked in this series of biographies, and might easily, as shuddering experience suggests, have received far different treatment. In the circumstances, the latest of Goldsmith's biographers finds his work both facilitated and embarrassed by the multiform labours of others. A century of investigation has certainly cleared the way. On the other hand, the task of compression and reconstruction, necessary by the limited space at Mr. Dobson's disposal, was beset with peculiar difficulties. The literature of the subject is immense, and research has not been unfruitful in these latter days. Goldsmith's first biographer, Sir James Prior, enjoyed the exceptional advantage of personal intercourse with many who had known the poet. He was also the first to gather and collate the rich results of contemporary reminiscence and anecdote scattered in the pages of Boswell, Hawkins, Percy, the European Magazine, the Annual Register, and so forth. The diligent research and accuracy of Forster's valuable work have withstood the severest tests of subsequent inquirers. The correction of the date of Goldsmith's entrance at Trinity College, Dublin, supplied by Dr. J. F. Waller, is the only emendation of importance adopted by Mr. Dobson in dealing with Forster's biography. As to Washington Irving's charming memoir, the general sentiment is not inaptly expressed by the schoolgirl heroine of an American novel who, when pressed for her opinion by the hero, exclaims, with a gush of conviction, "Oh, sir, how Goldsmith would have loved Mr. Irving!" The artistic triumph implied by this somewhat oblique compliment is not diminished by the most strenuous insistence upon the fact that Goldsmith was one of the most lovable of human beings, as well as an illustrious man of letters. Only a rare accord of fidelity and sympathy could result in so pleasant an apposition of artist and subject.

Mr. Dobson's work is essentially a new Life of Goldsmith. In constructive art, in style, in criticism, it is altogether what was to be expected of a writer so eminently qualified to deal with the subject. Forster thought that Goldsmith lived in times unfavourable to the profession of letters. His was a transitional experience between the old days of patronage and the latter days of a free press. He arrived too late for the patron, too early for the people. De Quincey contested this view with plausible, if not very convincing, rhetoric. He thought it was a great escape for Goldsmith's "intellectual purity," however unfortunate for his "purse," to have missed the "enormous expansion of the reading public" during the present century. This is one of several moot points—such as Goldsmith's propensity to gambling—which Mr. Dobson with admirable good sense leaves to the judicious reader. These questions are extremely interesting to scholars, though their discussion, even if finality were possible, would be quite out of place in a volume designed for an ever-expanding reading public. What manner of man Goldsmith was and how he worked, the nature of his work and its significance, these and other vital matters, material and spiritual, are presented by Mr. Dobson with excellent breadth and force and the happiest discrimination. The judicious tone that characterises this entirely pleasurable book is nowhere better exemplified than in the treatment of the numerous passages in Goldsmith's writings that may be referred to the poet's vagabond years, the happy disengaged days when bookseller Griffiths was undreamed of, or that dark period when the tyranny of Peckham schoolboys was not yet overpast. If not actual autobiography in every instance, there is undoubtedly much genuine self-allusion in these half-serious, half-sportive sketches of hard times and the strange fellowship that penury brings in its train. It is a little surprising, perhaps, that there should have been any room for that extremely unpleasant French teacher at the Peckham school, for Goldsmith was "perfectly acquainted" with French before his voyage to Leyden. Mr. Dobson refers to the old story of a previous experience as usher, in the provinces under an assumed name, though he does not mention that local history in which Douglas Allport dated Goldsmith's sojourn at Dr. Milner's school four years before the date given by Forster. This was "about the beginning of 1757," according to Forster. If this date be correct, Goldsmith's residence at the Peckham school could not have extended to three years, as Miss Milner reported, and "could scarcely," says Mr. Dobson, "have exceeded three months, as it is possible to fix definitely the termination of the engagement." This is a hard matter to solve. If Miss Milner is not an authority here, it is difficult to say who is preferable to her. We cannot think that she spoke of three years and meant three months. If it could be shown that Goldsmith was twice employed at the Peckham school—before the Leyden excursion, as Mr. Allport thought, and afterwards, at the date given by Forster—the difficulty would be considerably lessened. Mr. Dobson devotes a portion of a very interesting chapter on the Vicar of Wakefield to circumstances connected with its sale and publication, which he had previously discussed in the introduction to the facsimile edition published two years since. The discrepant accounts of the purchase of the MS. given by Cooke, Hawkins, Mrs. Piozzi, and others are ingeniously clarified of misconceptions, if not completely harmonized by Mr. Dobson. The delayed publication of the work, however, appears to us to be less mysterious than its unremunerative sale, as revealed by the account books of Collins, the Salisbury printer and part owner of the copyright. Mr. Charles Welsh, who possesses the papers of Collins, declares that "the fourth edition (1770) started with a loss," and Collins sold his share (one-third) for five guineas before the fifth edition appeared in 1774. Although this is explicit enough, there seems to have been a good demand. Four editions in four years, not to mention two pirated reprints in Dublin and London of the first edition (1766), indicate a considerable success. Mr. Dobson, we rejoice to note, is no believer in the "poor Poll" of Garrick's epitaph. The evidence collected on this point is further enforced by his citation of the Rev. Edward Mangin, a witness probably new to Goldsmith's readers. New, also, and very delightful are the letters to Goldsmith's brother-in-law, Daniel Hodson, transcribed by permission of Mr. F. Locker Lampson, the fortunate owner. They are fragrant with the single-hearted generosity and sweet frank nature of the writer. Mr. John P. Anderson's bibliography is an excellent piece of work. All we have to note of it, after much searching, is that the publication date of the Captivity is given in the chronological list as 1836, whereas in Mr. Dobson's book (p. 185) it is said to have been "not published as a whole until 1820."

THERE was a man whose age was thirty-six, and Edmund Thallerton he had to name, and one short year before the story's date he'd been betrothed to Meta, who had died. So now he was betrothed to Violet, a blue-eyed maiden with a shallow soul. Both she and Edmund disbelieved in spooks, though Meta's haunted all the manor-house. She came in many forms, but always was surrounded by a white mysterious light, and waves of hot perfume of jasmine-flower. Sometimes she was a figure robed in black from eight to eight-and-thirty feet in height, with arms and fingers of portentous length, which grabbed with ease across a good-sized room. At other times, for Edmund's benefit, a lotus lily was the spook's disguise, which floated where she wanted him to go, with merry chimes of non-existent bells. Violet had a sister, and her name was Dora, and when Meta first appeared in spookly guise to work her vengeance out, she collared Dora's astral principle, and took it strolling round on other planes and showed it every kind of horrid sight as in a nightmare. Dora pined and drooped, and made a solemn vow to marry Jack. (Jack was an undistinguished, good young man.) One night a ball was given. Edmund sulked because his Violet danced with some one else, so Meta's spook enticed him from the house, made-up this time as what you might have called a long "dark shadow, of" a "tall lean form," with a "small head and one long arm stretched out," and "with white fingers of" most "wondrous length," and took him "where the snow was hardened by the icy pool." He was in evening clothes, and boldly "coming there without a wrap," it is not to be wondered at that "he was cognizant of only blank dismay." He did not know the spook, but there it stood, "without a face, without a word or look, but it stooped down from its gigantic height, bent to the ground, and two white hands appeared, with long-boned fingers" and began to dig. It shovelled up a quantity of worms of most disgusting aspect. Edmund knew that they were those the poet sings about and says that man is food for. Here they were in propriis personis, and the spook lifted "the hideous mass of slimy things" which "made for" Edmund, so he shut his eyes, and when he opened them both spook and worms had disappeared. "He rose and made for home"; which was perhaps the wisest thing to do. So things went on until the day approached when Edmund was to marry Violet. About a week before the happy day Edmund was summoned by the same old spook to a churchyard, and there, to his surprise, it owned to being Meta, and appeared in Meta's likeness. So he asked her what on earth she wanted, and she made reply that he was not to marry Violet, but die, and live on other planes with her. Edmund remarked that he and Violet loved, but Meta told him that was his mistake, and in a fit of spookish jealousy called her "that woman with the wire hair," and asked him "Will you marry for an hour by the Infinite Clock?" and Edmund said he would, not clearly understanding what she meant (no more do we; for surely this is plain that, if a Clock is somehow Infinite, its hours should be infinitely long?) She said "You will not, Edmund; try, and see." He tried, and this is what the reader sees. He married Violet (so the spook was wrong) and was her husband for about an hour by Shrewsbury Clock; the wedding breakfast came, and Violet was about to cut the cake, when Meta swooped on Edmund unawares —which we consider was unsportsmanlike—and scragged him there and then. The wedding guests were horrified to see the bridegroom die. There rose "the wail of women's voices, and," moreover, "that of Violet's, screaming high." It did no good; for Edmund was a spook, and moved thenceforth in spookish circles with the fascinating Meta. Whether, then, Violet lived unmarried till her death we cannot say; but Dora married Jack.

Lady Laurie Dundas, the autobiographical heroine of the Romance of a Black Veil, was never a governess, though she was at different periods of her seventeenth year a schoolgirl and private secretary to the so-called "mother superior" of an amateur Anglican convent. In nearly all other respects she was fitted to be the heroine of a Family Story. She did not get kissed as much as usual—in fact, not by anybody except Lord St. Asaph (who kissed her the moment he saw her)—but perhaps that was because she was not a governess. She was daughter of one Lord St. Asaph and cousin of his successor, whom she married. The latter was the son of the former's sister; and, as he immediately succeeded to the title and estates upon his uncle's death in his mother's lifetime, there must have been something very odd about the patent or writ of summons by which the earldom was originally created. Old Lord St. Asaph was generally known as the Reprobate Earl, on account of his extraordinary wickedness. He had secretly married Laurie's mother, and kept the existence of his wife and daughter a secret from all his relations until he was on the point of death, when he sent for Lady Laurie from school, acknowledged her as his daughter, and left her half his fortune, to the great disgust of his sister and nieces. The mother was not forthcoming, because when, some time after her marriage, her husband had sworn on Sunday morning, when he ought to have been at church, and had followed up this revelation by avowing himself to be no other than the Reprobate Earl, and when, to punish his wife for sulking he had kidnapped the infant Laurie, and pretended that she was dead, she had disappeared from human ken, and had, in fact, set up business as manageress of the convent in which Laurie eventually took refuge from the sorrows of a heartless world. After the old lord's death Laurie determined—very sensibly—to marry her cousin, the young lord. She pursued him with a shameless vigour which would have been hard to excuse in any girl who ought not to have been in the school-room. She was precocious enough, however, to notice with satisfaction, when she put on a certain dress intended to captivate the young nobleman, that "My arms and neck shone marble-white through it, and the crimson pomegranate-blossoms lay like glowing rubies in my hair." The young man's sisters were excusably of opinion that for Lady Laurie to insist on marrying their brother, after having deprived them of half their expected fortunes by falling upon them like a thunderbolt from a clear sky, was a little strong. So they made a clumsy plot, whereby they persuaded her that her adored Earl was going to marry somebody else. She jumped to the desired conclusion with all the credulity of youth, gave up the game, and ran away to die. Before doing so she consulted her solicitor, and, as he was of opinion that girls of seventeen can make valid wills, it is not surprising that his advice was not of much use. So she endeavoured to die in a church, and had nearly succeeded when one of her long-lost mother's nuns picked her up and took her to the convent. Eventually her mother and she discovered the relationship between them, and Lord St. Asaph found her, and took her back, and married her, and has since, on occasion, "held the balance of power in Europe in his own capable hands." The story is written in extremely slipshod English, and betrays little or no acquaintance with the domestic manners of the common earl.

Sir Alan Harlech, Bart. was an elderly prig with nothing to do, so he married the childish, pretty, uneducated, frivolous, and commonplace daughter of a gambler, of whom the only thing he knew was that he had committed suicide at Spa when he, Sir Alan, happened to be in the immediate neighbourhood. He had never told Netta—that was his wife's name—how her father had died, but his friends generally knew it, and the circumstance gave rise to a good deal of discomfort. When Netta's father was alive he and Netta—who knew nothing of his principal occupation—had lived a good deal in the society of a fellow black-leg, who, by the merest chance in the world, inherited an earldom and a castle next door to the house of the Harlechs. So one Lady Eustace, who had wanted to marry Sir Alan herself, plotted that the Earl should compromise the guileless Netta, and sow disunion between her and her husband. The plot would have succeeded but for a priest coming in while a ball was going on, and pointing out that the Earl had a deserted wife somewhere, and was not a person to be trusted. Lady Eustace poisoned herself, and the Harlechs made friends. On the whole, if one were driven to the alternative, there is more entertainment to be got out of this than out of the other Family Story.

If Mr. James's Romance of the Queen's Hounds were a shining example of the pathetic style, or a work of genius in any way, some people would probably call it a prose idyl. As it is, there does not appear to be much reason for its existence. The story is this. Frank was engaged to Blanche, who was an idiot, incapable of speaking of anything except a decrepit drawing-room dog. He was also in love with Diana, a young lady in reduced circumstances, who supported a blind father by riding horses out hunting for a horse-dealer and training them in the school. Blanche was rich; Diana was poor. Bravo, a villain, courted Blanche for her fortune. So he bought from Diana's employer a black mare called Jezebel. It was "certain death to ride that mare to hounds." Therefore Bravo lent her to Frank when the latter was going out hunting with Diana. She knew all about the mare; so, instead of telling Frank it was certain death to ride her to hounds, she asked to be allowed to ride her herself, and accordingly incurred death, as per certainty, selfishly leaving her blind father to shift for himself. Frank looked after him, and they both looked after Diana's grave, the site of which she had chosen in happier days. That's all.

If there is a longer, duller, and generally more stupendous story extant than Mary, the Queen of the House of David, long may we be preserved from the duty of perusing it for the benefit of other people. It tells how a reformed rake called Sir Charleroy de Griffin went crusading in 1290, became acclimatized after the Crusade, and married a Jewess called Rizpah; how to them was born a daughter called Miriamne; how they quarrelled, and Sir Charleroy went back to London and went mad; how Miriamne was converted to Christianity, went to London, cured her father, brought him back to Palestine, and reconciled him and her mother; how they died, and Miriamne married a chaplain called Cornelius Woelfkin; how between them they founded a sisterhood and made a plan to regenerate the world; and how Miriamne died and her plans came to nothing. All the people mentioned prosed and preached to each other in the baldest possible American with a fluency and a self-complacent wearisomeness of reiteration which are simply heart-breaking and maddening. Every incident in the book is mentioned above (except about three trifling ones), and its length is enormous. It is the sort of book to make the reader curse all books, and wish the world had never been made. Procul oh procul este, everybody! Dr. Talmage writes an introduction to say that there never was such a book—thank Heaven, he is right there—and that it has "all the fascinations of romance." Also, that there is nothing like women—which is true —and that "O what a multitude of women in heaven! Mary, Christ's mother, in heaven. Elizabeth Fry in heaven. Charlotte Elizabeth in heaven. The mother of Augustine in heaven. The Countess of Huntingdon is in heaven"—in short, the preface is in the best style of rabid American popular preaching, and the book is worthy of it. "And now," says Dr. Talmage, "I will leave you in the hands of Dr. Walsh." He does. For the moment we rejoice, but it is nothing to our joy when we escape from Dr. Walsh's detestable hands, and proceed instantly to forget all about him and his drivelling story.

FIFTY Years Ago is not a novel, but it is doing it but scant justice to say that it is more amusing than many novels. The author's desire, we learn from his preface, was to "present a picture of society in this country as it was when the Queen ascended the Throne." The keynote of the book is contained in another sentence of the preface:—"Meantime, remember this. As nearly as possible, fifty years ago, the eighteenth century passed away. It died slowly; its end was scarcely marked." Such of our readers as are old-fashioned enough to have read Gibbon's great History may remember the parallel which he draws between the state of modern Europe and that of the Roman Empire under the Antonines. The historian seems scarcely aware of any material difference between the two; Marcus Aurelius could travel post as fast as Gibbon could; if Gibbon undertook a sea voyage he was at the mercy of the wind and tide, just as Marcus Aurelius was seventeen centuries before him. Gunpowder and printing had both, it is true, been invented since the times of the Romans, but neither of these great inventions had been developed. Perhaps Archbishop Whately's theory is true, that paper is the really important invention, for any one could conceive the idea of movable types, but without cheap paper they are valueless. Fifty years ago newspapers had not arisen, and poetry was tottering to its fall. What the newspapers were we can gather from Lamb's essay; poetry, overdone by Scott, Byron, and the Lake school, was pronounced unsaleable by the great bookseller of the period. "If you could write a good cookery-book, now," was the advice to which we owe Miss Acton's work. But few now read L. E. L., and if they are more familiar with the name of Mrs. Norton, this is due more to her piteous story and to George Meredith's novel than to her writings. Both these ladies' portraits appear in the very interesting and complete series of portraits of celebrities with which the book is enriched. In most cases these portraits have autograph signatures attached, and one has an opportunity of observing what shocking hands they wrote fifty years ago. One modern development is far from being an unmixed good; we mean the disappearance of the "delicate Italian hand" affected by ladies fifty years ago, before what George Eliot calls "the present uncial period." Fifty years ago there was a distinct male and female script, just as in Sweden at this day there are men's loaves and women's loaves; nowadays few of us have not received letters which leave us entirely in the dark as to the writer's sex.

Demonstrativeness, if we may coin a word, seems to have been crushed out of us moderns by the hurry amid which our lives are spent. The tear of sensibility seldom bedews our manly cheeks, while our ideas of amusement are utterly opposed to those of fifty years ago. "A picture by Du Maurier in Punch once represented a man singing a comic song at an 'At Home.' Nobody laughed; some few faces expressed wonder; some, pity; some, contempt; a few, indignation; but not one face smiled. Consider the difference; in the year 1837 every face would have been broadened out in a grin." 'Arry, Mr. Besant acutely points out, is a survival; just as the comb in the coster girl's back hair is a survival of the Spanish combs and mantillas which came into vogue during the Peninsular War. Taine remarks of us at the present day, "Les Anglais parlent extrêmement bas," and contrasts the quiet of an English crowd with the noise of Arabs or "meridionals." Walter Scott, in a letter to Joanna Baillie, dated Paris, 1815, remarks, "All our young men (officers) pique themselves on imitating the Duke of Wellington in nonchalance and coolness of manner." This, no doubt, was the thin edge of the wedge, which since that period has broadened until it has swept away the comic song, the practical joker, Bob Sawyer, Mr. Ledbury, and all those boisterous forms of amusement of which we read with wonder in the works of Theodore Hook and Albert Smith, and in a lesser degree in Pickwick, that prose idyl of cockney life, fit swan-song of the "quiet century" which, as Mr. Besant reminds us, really lingered on till the death of William IV. Sam Weller was quite satisfied with the-day-but-one-before-yesterday's paper. In London, too! What a contrast to our feverish fifth editions and special editions! As Lamb says of an old paper, "We resent the stale thing as a sort of affront." Here is a picture of a cabriolet, with the driver perched upon a sort of bracket on the right side. Is this the cause or the effect of the rule of keeping to the left in driving, which obtains in no country except our own? This was the vehicle which, with three people squeezed into it besides the driver, was seen to proceed at a rapid pace up Goswell Street to Mrs. Bardell's door, on the day of the memorable excursion to the "Spaniards"—there is a picture of the "Spaniards" in Mr. Besant's book—and in which Mr. Pickwick talked to the driver as he drove to the "Golden Cross." There is no drawing of a hackney-coach; the ancestor, we presume, from which the modern four-wheeler has been evolved. Speaking of the worship of horseflesh in 1837, our author says of the young Londoner that "to ride was his greatest ambition," but he does not discuss the effect which this ambition had upon the legs of that remote period. That part of the garments of fifty years ago which Miss Griselda Oldbuck observed that "it did not become a leddy to particularize" bore remarkable tribute to the horsey tastes of the time. Mr. Pickwick's gaiters are immortal. Micawber wore a species of compromise. We are surprised to see a portrait of Sir Francis Burdett in trousers. He was one of the last men who habitually wore top-boots. Nowadays, we only see them on the legs of stable helps, travestied as postboys at a wedding.

Much information on the subjects of drink and dress may be obtained from a careful perusal of Jos Sedley's proceedings between Southampton and London. Jos selected "a crimson satin, embroidered with gold butterflies, and a black and red velvet tartan with white stripes and a rolling collar, with which, and a rich blue satin stock and a gold pin, consisting of a five-barred gate and a horseman, in pink enamel, jumping over it. . . ." If we fill up the black and white outline of Count d'Orsay's waistcoat, &c., in the portrait here given with these colours, we can form some idea of the general appearance of that mirror of fashion. As for drinks, Jos, "after a copious breakfast, thought a glass of sherry necessary at Winchester. At Alton he imbibed some of the ales for which the place is famous. At Farnham he partook of a dinner of stewed eels, veal cutlets, French beans, and a bottle of claret. He was cold over Bagshot Heath, and took some brandy and water, and when he drove into town he was as full of wine, beer, meat, pickles, cherry brandy and tobacco, as the steward's cabin of a steam-packet." A toper nowadays—but we blush to compare the man of to-day with such giants. The ideal hero of the Fleet turnkey took "twelve pints of ale a day, and never left off smoking even at his meals." Compare Dean Stanley's funeral sermon on Dickens, and the drinking habits of all the Pickwickians. What would Addison have done nowadays?

"Every fellow with a moustache and a cigar is a low fellow," said Major Pendennis. The moustache has been tolerated since the Crimean War, but many people even in 1888 are secretly of the Major's opinion. Indeed, we believe that many modern smokers have adopted the cigarette, not because they like it, but because they think that no one can blame them for smoking such a thing—"is it not a little one"?—and because they can throw it away without a pang whenever they see their maiden aunts or other unsympathetic persons approaching. Notice the Turkish pipe among the yataghans, &c., in the drawing of the young Disraeli. It required some courage, at the time when that picture was drawn, to avow that one smoked a pipe; but the Eastern pipe carried with it a flavour of great voyages, of houris and bulbuls, and all the picturesque Orientalisms which Lord Byron had made fashionable. "Such a man, my dears," said Miss Wirt of the Duke of Sussex, "but, alas! addicted to smoking." Look at the endless pictures which Leech drew on the subject of smoking in railway carriages, and compare the large toleration of '88 with the "survival" which we read on the walls of our railway stations, menacing any one smoking in any part thereof with 40s. fine and removal from the company's premises. What would be the fate of an "intending traveller" when "removed from the company's premises"? Would he have to buy blue spectacles and pretend to be lame, according to an illustrious precedent, and then return to the station and buy a fresh ticket, making believe to be somebody else? or would he have to bathe in many waters and be unclean until the evening?

Mr. Besant says nothing of the decline and fall of wigs. Though they were fallen from their high estate, an observant man might have found plenty of wigs in 1837. Hair-powder, too—did not Sergeant Snubbin wear hair-powder? What opportunities both must have offered to the practical joker. Instead, however, of blaming him for his omissions, let us be grateful for what we find in his old curiosity shop, and bear in mind the words of his preface:—

In compiling even such a modest work as the present one is constantly attended by a haunting dread of having forgotten something necessary to complete the picture. . . . At this very last moment the Spirit of Memory whispers in my ear, "Did you remember to speak of the high fireplaces, the open chimneys—up which half the heat mounted—the broad hobs, and the high fenders, with the fronts pierced, in front of which people's feet were always cold? Did you remember that the pin of the period had its head composed of a separate piece of wire rolled round? that steel pens were either as yet unknown, or were precious and costly things? that the quill was always wanting a fresh nib? that the wax match did not exist? that in the country they still used the old-fashioned brimstone match? that the nightlight of the period was a rush candle stuck in a tin cylinder full of holes? and that all the ladies' dresses had hooks and eyes behind?"

NOTES ON THE BIRDS OF HEREFORDSHIRE.*

THIS book is brought out under the auspices of the Woolhope Naturalists' Field Club. If Herefordshire bird-life has somewhat suffered from the draining of swamps, it is in other respects greatly favoured by the physical features that still remain.

The whole country forms a pastoral oasis of hill and dale, well wooded and well watered, filled with meadows and orchards, in the midst of a wild waste of hills of considerable height and of great extent. To the south and south-west are the Forest of Dean, the Monmouthshire hills, and the Black Mountains; to the north-west lie the wide range of hills which, beginning in Radnorshire and Breconshire, stretch onwards to the sea; on the north, where the hills within the county are wilder and more desolate, they are contiguous with those of Radnorshire and Shropshire; while the eastern side is bounded by a bleak open country, and the long range of the Malvern Hills.

So runs the introduction to a book that is chiefly built upon the notes of the late Dr. Bull, a local enthusiast. One may forgive the gentle pedantry of an Isaac Walton, of a Gilbert White or a Charles Waterton; but whether the cause of local ornithology gains anything from such a ransacking of the poets for allusions such as we find here is perhaps a matter of opinion—it is a harmless foible at the worst. For the rest, this is a pleasant book, that betrays a wise discretion in all it does or does not do.

Herefordshire lays claim to many British birds of rare occurrence, and to some whose visits are so few and far between as to leave it doubtful whether they are entitled to be considered British birds at all. The Blue-headed Yellow Wagtail (M. flava; the "Yellow Wagtail" of the Continent) "occurs regularly every season at Belmont, and from the length of its stay is almost sure to breed there." We do not doubt it for a moment; and, could it be proved, Herefordshire would have scored a triumph.

Few things in this book please us more than the good case that is made out for the common starling, perhaps our favourite bird. And "the gardeners make no complaints against the starling here," our authors say. Nor should we, if he would not pick off all the blossoms from our primrose and polyanthus plants and lay them in a row. But for all this, we love the starling, who seems the very spirit of the summer day as he sits outside our window with drooping tremulous wings and a song that sounds like rippling water. And everything he does he does adroitly; yes, we love the starling. Alas! his ranks have been sadly thinned these wintry times. This book notices the fact, with which most of us are familiar, that both starlings and wood-pigeons may be divided into two general classes—those which frequent the haunts of man and those which do not; and that these differ remarkably in their habits.

Local uses of words are touched upon throughout the book. "With country folk the crow is used as a symbol of independence. A Herefordshire girl who had a good place and was doing well, sent a message to her companion not to be in too great a hurry to get out, for 'service was not all golden crows.'" The custom of dressing spring corn with strychnine to protect it from disease is singled out for censure, which we heartily endorse. This cruel habit results in the wholesale poisoning of rooks, whereas "carbolic acid" keeps off blight and rooks, and is cheaper than strychnine to boot.

Ravens are, as we should expect to find, fairly abundant still in Herefordshire; building annually in the Black Mountains and elsewhere. One of the most interesting articles—that, at least, which will attract the most notice—is that on the Great Black Woodpecker (Picus martius). The interest of the subject will justify a somewhat long quotation:—

> There can be no doubt, however, of its having been observed on several occasions in Herefordshire [the italics are our own]. Captain Mayne Reid saw two specimens in the woods near his residence at Frogmore, Ross, and noted the occurrence in the Live Stock Journal. The Rev. Clement Ley saw the Great Black Woodpecker at Ruckhall Wood, Eaton Bishop, about the year 1874, and pointed it out to his cousin, Mr. Edward du Buisson, who also saw it there. On writing to Mr. Ley on the subject, he replies that "he has not the least doubt about it," and adds . . . "The last occasion on which I heard it was in 1876, on Mount Edgecombe, in Devonshire, when standing with my daughter close to a thick oak coppice and waiting for a few minutes we got a fine view of the bird." Mr. D. R. Chapman also saw the Great Black Woodpecker at Belmont . . . in the spring of 1879. His attention was called to it by his son, as it flew from a copse to a tree standing in open ground. To make sure of the species, he crawled along the meadow for some sixty or seventy yards, and was rewarded by a clear view of the bird.

Now, coming from independent witnesses, of good credit in their own districts, this deserves every attention. The claims of the Great Black Woodpecker (who inhabits the pine forests of various countries) to be considered a British bird, have never, so far as we know, been formally admitted. The Ibis Catalogue (1883) and the last edition of Yarrell will have nothing to say to it. The Great Black Woodpecker is familiarly called by the Norwegians Gertrude's Bird. The quaint legend, quoted from Thorpe in Fraser's Magazine, is given as follows:—

> Our Lord in His wanderings on earth, accompanied by St. Peter, came to a woman who wore a red hood on her head, who was engaged in baking. The wanderers were weary and hungry; and our Lord begged the woman, whose name was Gertrude, to give Him a cake. She took a little dough, and set it on to bake, but little as it was when it was set on, it soon filled the whole pan. Thinking this too much for alms, she took a smaller quantity, and again began to bake; but this also grew as large as the first. Gertrude then took still less dough, but this cake, too, swelled until it was as large as the others. Then said the woman, "You must go without alms, for all my bakings are too large for you!" Then was Our Lord wroth, and said unto Gertrude, "Because thou gavest me nothing, thou shalt for punishment become a bird. Thou shalt seek thy dry food between the wood and the bark, and drink only when it rains." The words were no sooner spoken than the woman was transformed into the "Gertrude bird," and flew away through the kitchen chimney. And to this day she is seen with a red hood and black body, coloured by the chimney soot.

When we consider how long the Red-leg Partridge has now been acclimatized in England it is certainly singular that it should have only occurred in Herefordshire about five times. We commend the following to some of our neighbours:—"The preservation of game in a country district is an object of much higher importance to the public than it would seem to be at first sight. It is the amusement afforded by game that brings the squire's friends around him; it is the game which keeps mansions occupied in remote districts of the country during the dreary months of winter; it is the game which brings rich strangers into the country, and gives to the district the advantages of resident wealth." And what is true of game is true of fox-hunting also.

The extracts which we have given will show that this is a pleasant book. British ornithology owes a debt to such local societies as the Woolhope Naturalists' Field Club, whose careful observation more than justifies their existence, and whose published records are a labour of love.

NEW PRINTS.

AMONGST new prints we must mention with praise a careful and excellent mezzotint which Mr. T. Wilson, of Edinburgh, has just published. Mr. R. S. Clouston has executed it from a good portrait by Mr. R. Herdman of Dr. John Campbell Shairp, Principal of the United College St. Andrew's, and Professor of Poetry at Oxford. Messrs. George Rowney & Co. are publishing two coloured lithographs by Mr. M. H. Long, after Turner's "Ramsgate" and "Mouth of the Humber" in the National Gallery. To us they appear tormented and fantastic masses of yellow and of purple blue standing in no pleasant relation to each other, and most far-fetched as an expression of storm and gleam. Some of Turner's wonderful invention in arrangement of details is there, and that is the most that can be said for them.

FRENCH LITERATURE.

THE extinction of the liberties of Switzerland by that soi-disant apostle of liberty the French Republic has always been regarded as one of the most important events of the whole revolutionary period. It completely justified the conduct of the other European States towards France, and it converted, as is well known, many amiable and gifted, but not politically-headed, persons who had hailed the dawn of the Revolution itself. Barthélemy, whose papers (1) have just been calendared in the French equivalent of our Rolls Series by M. Kaulek, was French Ambassador in Switzerland from 1792 to 1797, the very eve of the seizure. The reviewer, even if he be responsible and far from indolent, certainly feels, and we think the reader will feel, the want of a brief summary indicating the contents of the most important documents and the general drift of the rest. But it is impossible to read the volume, even partially and cursorily, without perceiving the signs of the wolf-and-lamb procedure usual in all such cases, and perhaps never more usual than when the wolf is a Republic.

M. Bernard Perez's book on the education of infants is not a new book (though it announces itself as entièrement refondue), and therefore we need not give it any very lengthy notice (2). It has received praise, we know, from expert authorities, and there is no doubt that, both in its earlier form and in the present, the best intentions and a considerable knowledge of the subject are visible in every page. But we cannot praise M. Perez for his compliance with the modern fad of "unsectarian" education, of complete neutrality on what he is pleased to call metaphysical questions. Nor do we call it exact "neutrality" to recommend as a sufficient and final explanation of death that "you become bones and smell badly." Moreover, putting this grand question aside, we are obliged to deplore in M. Perez a tendency to the fiddle-faddling, old-woman-plus-man-of-science habit of never letting children alone, of constantly supervising, and directing, and training, and developing, and applying a kind of pedagogic ars topiaria to the hapless human tree. Tight bodily lacing may be, is, a bad thing; but how much worse is tight moral and mental lacing! Punish what you know to be wrong, inculcate (not too boringly) what you know to be right; and, while doing these two things, let the human plant grow as straight and free as it can. That is educational heresy for the day, perhaps; but it is educational orthodoxy for all time.

M. Louis Ulbach has given in La Csardas (3) a collection of lively newspaper articles respecting visits (chiefly as "representative of literature") to most of the capitals of Europe. One of these tells how he was present at the Lord Mayor's dinner to Literature in 1881. He met there a certain "Fl. Burnan, adaptateur acharné," and a certain "P. Gilbert, auteur dramatique populaire original." Who can these be? This is the only English paper; but the others are numerous and readable.

There are some people who become very angry when you praise M. de Pontmartin (4); nevertheless we shall continue to do so when he deserves praise. It is never possible to agree with him during a whole book, a whole essay, or even a whole page; but it is seldom possible to read a page, or an essay, and never possible to read a book, without finding something good. We wish he could leave Sainte-Beuve alone; but, considering the doings of the biographic ghouls, and the former relations of the dead and the living critic, M. de Pontmartin would not be M. de Pontmartin if he did. The best thing in the present volume is a vigorous onslaught on the Russian novel, an onslaught which was greatly wanted.

Another book of critical essays, that of M. Emmanuel des Essarts (5), is much more even, much more trustworthy, and on much more important subjects; but it is not quite so readable. If anybody wants a collection of just and moderate thoughts on Chateaubriand, Lamartine, Vigny, Hugo, Gautier, Sainte-Beuve, Quinet, and half a dozen others, he may find them here. But, as a rule at any rate, justice and moderation merely by themselves are not enticing literary qualities, and M. des Essarts, who writes well, might sometimes with advantage keep himself less severely in hand.

Among books of education we have a Grammaire française devant l'histoire, by M. Delon (Hachette), which is full of mysterious things like this:—

> KA, KI, KWA—qui, que, quoi, quelqu'un, quelque-chose.

After which the reader will be glad to hear that "nous allons voir MA et NA, indicateurs des objets éloignés, dégager de cette idée de lointain celle d'absent." That is very interesting and very kind of MA and NA. Ah, who will deliver us from the Aryans? M. Boielle has continued his school selections from Victor Hugo by a second volume from Notre Dame de Paris (Williams & Norgate). Mr. Granville Sharp has put together a useful little book of Elementary French Exercises (Rivingtons), and M. Belcour a set of English Proverbs with French Equivalents (Hachette). The word proverb is rather widely construed, but the phrases are mostly in common use and the French equivalents good. "By hook and cook" is an odd misprint, though.

In the March Art and Letters (Boussod, Valadon et Cie) the most important articles are continuations. But M. Ernest Chesneau has a good one on Rossetti under the title "Lilith." The illustrations to M. de Maupassant's "Afloat" and to M. Th. Gautier fils' "Red Gendarme" are very pretty. We cannot say quite so much of the plates from M. Mercié's designs and sculptures, which seem to us somewhat lacking in sculpturesque quality.

NEW BOOKS AND REPRINTS.

THE first volume of Dean Church's collected essays—Miscellaneous Essays (Macmillan & Co.)—to be completed in five neat, well-printed volumes, Globe octavo, opens appropriately with an essay on Montaigne, originally published in 1857. The choice must imply honour to the father of essays, as several of the author's essays, including two in the present volume, are earlier compositions. As critic, Dean Church writes in a judicious, if not a genial, spirit of "the old Gascon gentleman who first vindicated for prose the liberty of unscholastic writing"; as moralist, his final estimate of Montaigne, elaborated in a full-length study of the old essayist, is perhaps not altogether supported by the original self-revelation of the Essais. Not every reader who accepts the livre de bonne foy with responsive cordiality will be prepared to regard its grossness of language as indicative of Montaigne's "bestial love of impurity." The conjunction of critic and moralist in Dean Church's essay does not tend to a perfect harmony. There is much in the paper, however, of acute observation, expressed with admirable point, that will delight all readers of Montaigne. The remaining essays comprise an interesting paper on Cassiodorus, the "Letters of Pope Gregory I.," a review of certain well-known books on Brittany—in which Mr. T. A. Trollope and M. Emile Souvestre are quoted—and an article on the Ottoman Turks, suggested by a French translation of Von Hammer's history. It scarcely remains to add that there is excellent reading as well as variety of subject in the volume.

The Serpent of Eden, by the Rev. Dr. J. P. Val d'Eremao (Kegan Paul, Trench, & Co.), is a "philological and critical essay" on the temptation of Eve, which professes to be an interpretation of Gen. iii. "satisfactory to science and human reason." So far as the author's "new theory" involves the identity of the serpent, "more subtle than any beast of the field," with the "old Serpent called the Devil and Satan" in the Apocalypse, it can hardly be said to possess the novelty claimed for it. Taking the Serpent to be one of Satan's appellations, he contends that Satan is meant in Gen. iii., to the exclusion of any visible serpent. He rejects, in a word, the general interpretation that assumes a "merely bestial serpent," or a "possessed" or "apparitional" serpent, and argues that the temptation was consummated by the possession of Eve by the Serpent, otherwise called Satan. "Internally and invariably, yet quite intelligibly, Satan spoke to Eve's mind and soul." Here, if anywhere, is the novelty of Dr. d'Eremao's interpretation, though how it can be said to reconcile science and reason is by no means clear. In support of his thesis the author endeavours to prove that serpent-worship was at no time universal, that it is entirely unconnected with the received interpretation of the temptation in Eden, and that much of it was what he calls indirect worship and mere symbolism. The serpent, he argues, "would very naturally have become the object of detestation and abomination to man rather than the object of his love and worship," if regarded as the instrument of his fall. This view entirely ignores the influence of fear as a potent source of worship.

Scientific literature of a popular kind appears to thrive in America. An excellent handbook for inquiring young people with a taste for mechanics is Mr. O'Conor Sloane's Home Experiments in Science (Sampson Low & Co.) This is a reprint of papers originally published in a New York journal. It is written in a clear, forcible style, and the admirable expository method of the author is reinforced by some hundred engravings of uncommon merit. The most inexpert of young experimentalists can hardly fail to become a practised hand by the study of this capital guide. The object lessons are admirably calculated to train both eye and hand. This book is an indirect but striking proof of the great development of technical education in America, where handbooks for use in laboratory and workshop are remarkably numerous and good.

Astronomers and geologists are impartially drawn upon in the compilation of Mr. W. J. Cassidy's Age of Creation (Toronto: Briggs). The result is not a bad example of a class of books that is already too exuberant. Mr. Cassidy is perhaps needlessly apprehensive of a general opposition to his attempt to reconcile the teachings of science and the literal interpretation of the Mosaic cosmogony. We like his attachment to the earlier geologists, and profess a kind of secret respect for the old faith in cataclysmic energy. Sentiment of this kind may be the inalienable portion of a man's temperament, co-existing with a scientific faith altogether opposed to its logical inferences.

The New Social Order, by John Fordyce, M.A. (Kegan Paul, Trench, & Co.), merits the respect due to all honest endeavour to illuminate the people. It is intended to demonstrate the beneficial influences of Christianity in the social community, contrasted with the condition of the world under the Roman Emperors in the pre-Christian era. We cannot say that the book is one of the most readable of the innumerable antidotes to Gibbon. "Addressed to the People," as it is, let us hope that it will reach the people.

Golden South Africa (Whittingham & Co.) is a comprehensive, and apparently trustworthy, survey of the gold-fields in the Transvaal and Swazieland, compiled by Mr. Edward P. Mathers, whose account of the numerous mines is full of the most useful kind of information. Mr. Mathers is a firm believer in the future of the South African gold-fields. He is also an explorer and investigator, who in person writes of that which he has seen. His book is well illustrated by maps and statistical tables.

We have also received an "authorized" translation of Professor Kirchhoff's Volapük, third edition (Swan Sonnenschein & Co.); Volapük, prepared for the English-speaking public by Klas August Linderfelt (Milwaukee: Caspar); Elocution, Voice and Gesture, by Rupert Garry (Bemrose); Tell us Why! by Gertrude Heath (Sampson Low & Co.); Britain's Early Faith, by W. J. Anderdon, S.J. (Burns & Oates); Derryreel (Hamilton, Adams, & Co.); and The Dawn of the Twentieth Century (Field & Tuer).

THE OFFICIAL YEAR-BOOK OF THE CHURCH OF ENGLAND.

FOR 1888.

In the interest of the National Church the circulation of this Book is of immense importance, as the records it furnishes must greatly tend to remove common prejudices and misconceptions with regard to the position of the Church of England and her relation to the spiritual wants of the people.

"This year's volume in point of matter, style, arrangement, accuracy, and all those other qualities which go to make up excellence in a work of reference, is by far the best of the series."—Times.

THE GOWER ELECTION.

MINISTERS have gone to their Easter holiday with one great measure carried, with two others favourably received, with the procedure of the House of Commons rearranged and expedited, and certainly with no sign of any hostile feeling in the country. The last instance in which they were able to take fresh observations of that feeling was the Gower election. In itself that election could not be expected beforehand to be very interesting. Mr. YEO's majority was so enormous that, if the craven counsels which too often prevail in such cases had been listened to, the seat would undoubtedly have remained unchallenged. The constituency, though named after one of the most out-of-the-way and sparsely populated districts of the whole kingdom, is more of a mining and trading than an agricultural one, and though South Wales, owing to the greater mixture of population and the larger amount of business, is less narrowly sectarian and pseudo-patriotic than North Wales, it is even more Radical and Democratic. It was an advantage, no doubt, to have a pure Welshman and a man of great personal popularity as the Tory candidate, and the very vague but very large programme which Mr. LLEWELLYN put forward was also an advantage, though one of a less legitimate kind. But it could beforehand have been regarded as little less than a miracle that Mr. LLEWELLYN should win, and such a result could not possibly have been obtained except in some sudden and unusual revulsion of popular feeling, or else by the abstention of a very large number of Gladstonian voters, and the transference of not a few. Both these things happened, though not quite to the necessary extent. But the enormous diminution of the Gladstonian majority, which in 1885 was 3,500 (not, as the Daily News, by an awkward blunder, if not an "Irish mistake," puts it, 2,000), and is now only 600 on a very slightly reduced poll, cannot be explained away. All the causes noted above may have worked in Mr. LLEWELLYN's favour; but, inasmuch as he stood, whatever his detailed programme, as an unflinching supporter of the Government, it is quite certain that such a result could not have been reached if a great majority of the Gower electors had been unflinchingly opposed to the Government. A Tory gain of twelve hundred votes, and a Gladstonian loss of sixteen hundred at the same time, are things that Gladstonians may be left to square as they like with their still proclaimed conviction that the tide is steadily flowing in their favour.

The history of the election was, moreover, very curious, and exceedingly instructive to both parties. Fortunately the experience was not gained, as it was in the Spalding Division and elsewhere, at the expense of the Unionists. But it is quite as instructive as if it had been, and is of the very first importance. For it shows that Liberals no less than Tories are slow to read the signs, even the clearest and most unmistakable signs, of the times. The first of these signs followed the strange blunder made by the local wirepullers in putting forward Sir HORACE DAVEY as a candidate. This excellent lawyer, but unlucky as well as misguided politician, appears to be making what Frenchmen call an "Odyssey" only inferior in interest to that through which the present LORD CHANCELLOR went some years ago. There is, indeed, one exception to the parallel, that Sir HARDINGE GIFFARD, living in happier times, had open fights for his defeats, while Sir HORACE DAVEY has the much more ignominious experience of being catechized, rejected or accepted, and then shunted without mercy or ceremony, by Caucuses and committees. It seemed for a brief minute that Sir HORACE, fresh from the pleasure of having Mr. BOTTOMLEY FIRTH preferred to him at Dundee, might, at any rate, be accepted by the Caucus of Gower. Perhaps it was thought that anybody of the name of DAVEY must be acceptable to Welshmen. Alas! these hopes were nipped in the bud just at the same time as the patient snowdrops and crocuses were being similarly nipped by the ethereal mildness of spring. The people of Gower simply would not have Sir HORACE at any price whatever. And they went further than this, "splitting" about other candidates also, and insisting on a labour candidate of the not particularly Welsh name of RANDELL. For a time there was even a chance of two Gladstonians standing, and though this misfortune for the Separatists was averted, the minor misfortune of disgusting a considerable proportion of the party was not. So fierce was the contention, that it was, just before the polling, thought possible that Mr. LLEWELLYN might win, and this expectation, though too sanguine, was, as the result showed, not wholly unjustified. In so far as these matters concern merely local and personal disputes, they of course do not deserve much comment. But there are general principles involved in them, which it is of vital importance to recognize, and which do not appear to be recognized yet by either party.

The great and general principle is that, for county divisions especially, but more or less for all, it is political insanity not to be prepared with a candidate as long beforehand as possible. Indeed, if it were possible, it would be well for even the party which holds the seat to be prepared with a sort of second string or "understudy" in case of sudden removal of the sitting member by death or other cause. Speaking generally, the present constituencies resent nothing so much as the sudden thrusting by any authority—whether Caucus or patron—of an unknown candidate upon them. There are still, we believe, not a few excellent persons who desire to enter Parliament, and who think that, if they are prepared to spend the necessary money, nothing more is, or ought to be, expected of them than to come down and show themselves when the writ is issued, or a little before. This means, as things go nowadays, certain disaster, unless by some mere chance the other side has been equally thoughtless and shiftless. Occasionally, of course, there are good local men, like Mr. LLEWELLYN in this case, who have already stood for the same or neighbouring constituencies, who have canvassed with former candidates, and who are thus known. But, if there is nobody of this kind, it is in nine cases out of ten absolutely necessary that any one who wishes to represent a county constituency should "work" that constituency patiently and steadily beforehand. The towns—though, as we have before now pointed out, work is indispensable even there—are not nearly so difficult as the counties. For the town voter knows his own mind a little better, thinks as a rule less of his vote, neither expects nor cares so much to be personally addressed, and seldom masses himself in little groups such as village life favours, and such as are either most dangerous or most helpful to the cause. But in the counties preparation is almost everything. The silly people who triumph in the supposed "destruction of the political influence of "the squirearchy" by the new Local Government Bill forget or ignore the fact that that influence is practically destroyed already, except where it is a matter of personal energy and merit, in which case it is of course indestructible.

But there is another lesson of the Gower election which is very different from this, and that is, that the last Reform Bill has made things anything but pleasant for one very large class of candidates—the popular lawyers who want seats with a view, let us say, to something else. We do not say that the "labour candidate," who appears to be taking their place, is an improvement; very far from it. For, putting the more personal qualities of the two aside, the lawyer had little interest in not representing all classes of his constituency, while the labour candidate usually seems to understand his commission of representing [illegible] were a commission to represent nothing else. [illegible]r, is matter for argument; the other is matter [illegible] the reasons for it are clear. For, though the [illegible]ng lawyer is, as a rule, a better speaker (by no means always a more popular speaker) than the squire or the merchant, he cannot spare the time for thoroughly working up the constituency as they can, and he is regarded with far more jealousy by a certain class of voter as a man who is simply seeking votes in order to get pay or place. A very unjust thought, no doubt; but an actual thought to a very large extent, and one to which, unluckily, not a little justification has been given by the conduct of Sir HORACE DAVEY himself, and not a few of his brethren, in regard to the question of the hour. This disadvantage for lawyers of repute and standing may in some degree be corrected by the increased facilities given to young men who have not much professional employment, and who can afford to devote themselves to a constituency—a class who, since the disappearance of nomination boroughs, have been rather out in the cold. But we do not think that the Parliamentary prospect is comfortable for the Sir HORACE DAVEYS of the future. And it is certainly as black as it can be for any one, lawyer or layman, who thinks to slip into a seat by merely presenting himself at the last moment to the electors, and being ready to sign a cheque.

THE PENSION-LIST.

MR. BRADLAUGH has been the most fortunate of private members in scoring two preliminary victories during the first six weeks of the Session. He has carried the second reading of the Bill for the abolition of compulsory oaths by a majority of a hundred, and the Government has consented to appoint a Committee on the Pension-list. There is little difference of opinion on the inexpediency of satisfying real or supposed claims on the country by grants of perpetual annuities. It is only surprising that the holders should not long ago have pressed for the commutation of their invidious claims. Some hereditary pensioners have been so fortunate or so prudent as to obtain and accept fixed sums in purchase of their annual incomes. The remainder will, after the late debate, be eager to follow their example. The majority of the House is not yet disposed to borrow from some of the legislators of the French Revolution the doctrine that long-established possession is a ground for confiscation. The agitation against perpetual pensions will die out for want of material when the process of commutation is completed. No future Parliament is likely to revive an anomalous and unpopular form of extravagance. The contributions which are made by the Treasury to the revenue of the Duchy of Cornwall stand on a different footing. When the income of the PRINCE OF WALES was settled at the time of his marriage the pension was taken into consideration. It is probable that if the payment had then been discontinued, an equivalent sum would have been added to the Parliamentary grant. The exceptional tenure of the Duchy seems to explain the continuance of the present arrangement. No heir except the eldest son born to a reigning sovereign can succeed to the Duchy. When there is no such personage the revenue belongs to the Crown, until the condition of inheritance is once more satisfied. On the birth of the present Duke of CORNWALL the Law Officers advised the Government of the day that the infant Prince was absolutely entitled to the whole income of his appanage, including the Parliamentary pension. There is abundant time to introduce any change in the system which may be thought desirable. The eldest son of the present PRINCE OF WALES would not in any contingency succeed to the dukedom, nor will any son who may be born to him before his accession to the throne have a better title.

The concession of a Select Committee on pensions is one among many proofs of the anxiety of the present Government to conciliate popular opinion. It is true that there has been of late no agitation against pensions, except that a few Liberal speakers have sometimes expressed dissatisfaction either with the amount of the total charge or with special allowances which were deemed to be excessive or undeserved. The task of the Commission or Committee on pensions which sat fifty years ago was more delicate and more comprehensive. Many of the pensions which then existed had been granted on grounds of personal favour, and not a few were notoriously instruments of corruption. In the latter half of the last century; and down to the time of the Reform Bill, political combinations and bargains were constantly adjusted with the aid of pecuniary considerations. The great patent sinecures, some of them producing several thousands a year, remunerated Cabinet Ministers and party leaders for the acceptance or surrender of office. Their adherents, or perhaps their troublesome opponents of lower rank, were compensated for their services, or sometimes for their sacrifices, by pensions to themselves or to their relatives. In some instances peers with narrow incomes received perhaps 1,000*l.* a year, with smaller allowances to the cadets and the ladies of their families, on the understanding that they were to vote with the donor of the bounty, whether he was in or out of office. Owners of boroughs, though they were generally themselves possessed of ample fortune, were often enabled to provide at the public expense for their dependents. It is not surprising that reformers and agitators habitually denounced the whole body of pensioners and of their patrons. That the system failed to shock the feelings of ordinary politicians was probably explained by the origin of the practice. There had been a time when the king was thought to have an absolute right to his own revenues, and WALPOLE, or NEWCASTLE, or HENRY FOX distributed in the name of the Crown funds which were at its absolute disposal. GEORGE III. had private pensioners of his own; but after his time, and even in the latter portion of his reign, pensions and gifts were dispensed by the Minister. The recipients might, if they thought it worth while, assert their own dignity by attributing the benefits which they enjoyed to the spontaneous liberality of the sovereign. The Commission recommended the suppression of some of the most questionable pensions, and rules were laid down which effectually prevented the continuance of similar abuses in future. Some of the holders anticipated unfavourable comment by voluntary surrender of their pensions.

The inquiry which is now proposed will neither expose scandalous transactions nor immediately diminish the total amount of pensions. The most discreditable grants are those which have been made by successive heads of departments or by Governments with only the passive concurrence of the fortunate pensioners. Offices have been repeatedly reformed or rearranged by the appointment of new classes of officers, and the retirement, sometimes on full salary, of those whose services were no longer required. Some ludicrous instances of sinecure pensions thus conferred before middle life were quoted in last week's debate. As the former incumbents of suppressed offices were not responsible for wasteful methods of reconstruction, their vested interests will, of course, be respected. The ordinary scale of Civil Service pensions has been deliberately, and not injudiciously, settled. In general it may be said that an applicant for a pension must have served for a considerable number of years, and that he must have passed the age of sixty. The pension is equal to one sixtieth part of his salary at the date of retirement, multiplied by the number of years during which he has served. The maximum pension amounts to two-thirds of the salary. Additional grants are made, with the sanction of the Treasury, in cases of extraordinary merit. Holders of certain offices which are necessarily conferred on persons who have reached middle life are allowed to assume for the purposes of pension that, at the time of their first appointment, they have already served for a certain number of years. The rules are so well known and so simple that there is nothing for a Committee to ascertain. Any proposal for reduction would be a subject for the House, or rather for the Government of the day. As some of the speakers in the late debate justly remarked, the pensions of permanent public servants are a deferred part of their pay. The State has an interest in the maintenance of the system as an additional security for the integrity and good conduct of those whom it employs. It also profits by the forfeiture of the claims of all officers who die before the prescribed age. One or two zealous economists recommended for imitation the American practice of combining a precarious tenure of office with the negation of all claim to pension. The precedent is not recommended by success; for the system has for many years been condemned by all disinterested politicians. The actual PRESIDENT owed his election in great measure to the vigour with which he had, as Governor of New York, endeavoured to make the Civil Service independent and permanent. As long as the spoils were, in the common phrase, distributed among the victors in political contests, the condition of the public offices was generally regarded as scandalous. There is no doubt that the sounder practice which is already sanctioned by law will be universally, though gradually, adopted in the United States. Whether a part of the salaries will be ultimately paid in the form of pensions is a question of detail.

Political pensions, as they have lately been called, which are held by a few ex-Ministers, are insignificant in their total amount. The principle on which a limited number of such pensions is calculated was settled so long ago as in the Duke of WELLINGTON's first Administration; and certain reductions of amount or extensions of time of service were made by an Act passed ten or twelve years ago. In an application for one of these pensions it must be stated that, having held one of the offices enumerated in the Act for the requisite time, the proposed pensioner has not sufficient property to enable him to live in a manner suited to his station. The Minister, after satisfying himself that the conditions of the grant are satisfied, allows it as a matter of course if there is a vacancy, though the applicant is, for the most part, opposed to himself in politics. Claims for pensions of this class have always been preferred with moderation and delicacy. Among those who have held them within recent memory may be mentioned Lord BEACONSFIELD, Sir GEORGE GREY, and Mr. MILNER GIBSON. The country has never grudged a modest provision for statesmen who might otherwise not have been able to devote themselves to public life. Among the present recipients are two or three members of the late Government. They were perhaps surprised to learn from their late chief that he entertained doubts as to the propriety of the pensions which they had earned as his colleagues. The only remaining class of pensioners consists of the objects of the limited bounty of the Crown. The Prime Minister, as representing the QUEEN, disposes of the modest sum of 1,200*l.* a year in gifts and annuities to persons distinguished in literature, science, and art, or of special merit in other departments. Some members of the House of Commons expressed dissatisfaction with the manner in which the discretion of successive Ministers has been exercised. The grant of 500*l.* a year out of the fund to the widow of an eminent public servant was naturally regarded as a strange application of the fund. It would have been better to provide a well-deserved annuity from some other source. Prime Ministers are not always competent judges of literary or scientific merit, but they have always the opportunity of consulting skilled advisers. A preference may be fairly given to students of unremunerative branches of knowledge. There is no reason to believe that the fund has not been, for the most part, honestly administered; and its total amount can scarcely be deemed excessive. On the whole, it would seem that there is little need of a Committee to discover facts which are known to all who take an interest in the subject. If the Government meditates any reduction of the total amount of pensions, there is no need of reference to an external authority.

CONFUSION IN PARTRIDGIBUS.

OF course a police magistrate, like anybody else, ought to be conscious of the existence of public opinion, and, particularly in cases where he has discretion, ought to some extent to take it into account. It does not follow that a magistrate should lend himself, in his judicial capacity, to every passing agitation of the general mind, and there can be no excuse for his displaying even the appearance of sympathy with the disgraceful assaults of disgraceful people with disgraceful motives upon the police force, of which he is himself a complementary part. These general truths are commended to the notice of Mr. PARTRIDGE, who a week ago was either badly misreported or grievously left to himself.

A certain WALTER FRY was charged with obstructing policeman PALK in the execution of his duty. It appeared that PALK had taken a black man—or, at all events, a man who was not white—into custody on a charge of assaulting a child. The worthy black, who was in fact wholly guiltless of the charge, "at first showed no disinclination to go "to the station." FRY appears to have considered this conduct pusillanimous; for he not only pushed PALK "against the railings of a workhouse," and compelled him temporarily to drop his swarthy prey, but said to the latter, "Don't you go; he has no authority whatever to take you." Eventually, however, the gallant constable succeeded in carrying both his original victim and the would-be rescuer to the police-station, where a satyric interlude was provided. It was thought well that the son of Afric should be immediately confronted with his accuser, for the purpose of identification. It is properly contrary to the habits of the police to ask the victim of crime whether a specified person is or is not the criminal, and it is, therefore, the practice to surround the accused with any policemen in plain clothes who happen to be handy, and any casual passers-by of fairly similar general aspect who can be induced to render the public this not particularly agreeable service. This procedure was clearly inapplicable in the case of a prisoner who chanced to be black. We all know that the blackness of a black does not always extend to his soul, and never to his rights as a man and a brother; but it does make him easy to identify. So two men were found heroic enough to black their faces and stand one on each side of him. Whether they blacked their hands or put them in their pockets history saith not. (Perhaps neither was necessary.) The assaulted child—who, we hope, thought it almost as good fun as St. James's Hall—promptly failed to identify anybody, and the genuine negro was forthwith discharged, FRY being detained to answer for his contempt of the majesty of the law.

Mr. PARTRIDGE, in order to ascertain whether or not FRY had obstructed the constable in the execution of his duty, entered into the consideration of the question whether or not the constable's mistake in arresting the blameless Ethiop was excusable, and came to the conclusion that it was not. This was chiefly because the description of the suspected person, though apparently corresponding in every respect to the appearance of the person arrested, corresponded equally to that of every other middle-aged and middle-sized "man "of colour" in this great city, or, indeed, out of it. Mr. PARTRIDGE, therefore, held that the constable "had no "authority to arrest," and discharged FRY. Yet it does not appear that FRY was in any way aware of the looseness of the description of the man whom the police "wanted." It cannot be, and indeed is not, the law that any person seeing another taken into custody by the police, ostensibly with propriety, is entitled to push the policeman about and incite the prisoner to escape, if it should turn out ex post facto that the prisoner was being arrested by mistake. If this were the law, or even if magistrates behaved as if it were, the police would soon have to leave off arresting anybody under any circumstances except when they were actually engaged in the commission of crime. If it had been proved that FRY knew that the wrong man was being arrested, and that the policeman ought to have known it, the case would be different; but, as nothing of the kind is reported, it is difficult to avoid the conclusion that Mr. PARTRIDGE forgot that, as an officer of the law, he is especially bound to protect other officers of the law against forcible interference when they are trying to carry out their orders. Coming so soon after the same magistrate's curious conduct of the examination of Major BORROWES concerning the assault for which he was afterwards fined, the episode seems to show that Mr. PARTRIDGE's soul is not of that heroic mould which would enable him to treat the enemies of all law with the moral contempt they so richly merit.

RUSSIA AND THE BALKAN STATES.

NOW that the change of sovereigns in Germany has run its full nine days and more of wonder, and that the French Government has all but completed the necessary steps for effecting the much more astonishing change of BOULANGER into BONAPARTE, the attention of students of foreign politics returns almost untravelled to Bulgaria. We might almost say Bulgaria and Roumania; for, though it may be too much the wont of some, especially of Austrian, critics to see Russia everywhere, Bucharest has too long enjoyed the presence of the notorious M. HITROVO not to render suspicion of Russian complicity in the recent disturbances inevitable. It seems nearly impossible that that much-talked-of and infinitely unhappy person the historian of the future should ever study the daily papers of our day; but, if he does, his wonder at the state and condition of international ethics in the year 1888 is likely to be as intense as the wonder of KATERFELTO, and more sincere. The whole of Europe has been kept for months, and almost years, in a state of armed preparation by day and broken sleep by night because of the relations of Russia to Bulgaria. And what are the relations of Russia to Bulgaria? They are those of any member of a set of six trustees to the subject of [illegible]. We may pass over, though the facts are sufficiently notorious, the way in which it became necessary for the trustees to exercise one of the functions of their trust two years ago. A vacancy had been created—Russia herself best knows how—in the government of the Principality. Every tolerable and possible proposition for the filling up of that vacancy was rejected, again by Russia. At last the Bulgarians, having no Court of International Bench to apply to for a mandamus, elected a Prince who would have been acceptable enough to five of the six trustees, and who was and is only objected to by the sixth for reasons obvious to a tolerably intelligent schoolboy. Russia, having a certain influence over another Power whose nominal concern with Bulgaria is great, prevails upon that Power to issue a declaratory, and strictly declaratory, document, stating what everybody knows about the election and status, from the technical point of view, of the present Prince of Bulgaria—Prince de facto, and, to the extent of at least eighty-three and a fraction per cent., also de jure. And there, as far as legal proceedings go, the facts remain. What Russians and Russophiles would like to be the next step has been learnt by any one who has looked at the daily papers during the past week. It is said, and it is certain that the description answers to the wishes, whether it answers or not to the intentions, of the Russian Government, to ask the Powers whether the conduct of the Bulgarian Government in officially ignoring the Grand Vizier's recent Note is not contumacious, and whether the maintenance of the Prince on the throne is not revolutionary. It is said further—this being evidently more matter of gossip—that the Czar has shown great irritation at the failure of the step taken against Prince Ferdinand; that M. de Giers has declared that the Czar's dignity cannot allow the matter to rest where it stands; that M. Karaveloff has received "instructions" from St. Petersburg directing him to propose a plan for the removal of Prince Ferdinand, with the promise of "means" to put that plan into execution; that Russian public opinion is convinced that Germany will let Russia do exactly what she likes; and, lastly, and most serious of all, if true, that the Bulgarians are thinking, in their present badgered condition, of taking the bull by the horns (or, to be accurate in metaphor, the terrier by the throat), and proclaiming the independence of Bulgaria.

Some of these items of intelligence or of guesswork are serious in themselves; others, because of the facts and tendencies which they indicate more or less indirectly. To begin with, it is perfectly clear what the reply of any Power which spoke honestly would be if any such representations were made by Russia. It would be, first, Whose fault is it that Prince Ferdinand's situation is not regularised? and, secondly, It is contumacious to resist the order of a superior; but how can it be contumacious to receive silently a declaration of opinion not enforced by any command? To the second representation only one reply in the same spirit could be given—to wit, that the only revolutionary proceedings which have taken place in Bulgaria, to the knowledge of the Powers, took place in Sofia two years ago in Rustchuk and certain other places more recently, and in the neighbourhood of Bourgas the other day. In reference to the reported Karaveloff incident, no official language could very well be used. It is very much as if Russia were to send instructions to Sir William Harcourt or Mr. O'Brien to prepare a measure for removing Lord Salisbury (not to mention any one higher), and were to promise means for carrying the project out. A good deal of all this is, no doubt, mere canard; but it is not a canard at all that the state of things which serves as incubator to these canards is allowed to go on, that the right of Russia to torment Bulgaria and disturb Europe in this fashion is, at least in words, admitted by Prince Bismarck, and in deeds winked at by Europe. The concert of Europe is a modern invention, presumably intended to prevent such proceedings as this. It cannot be said that its operation is conspicuously successful. Compared to the bullying of Bulgaria, the partition of Poland was a quite respectable and reasonable action. To begin with, Poland notoriously could not govern itself, while Bulgaria is considerably better governed than the dominions of the Power which threatens her. Also, Poland was a nominally independent State, which might be compelled to make its hands keep its head or succumb, while Bulgaria has been created by, and is under the safeguard of, the Powers of Europe jointly.

[illegible] may be the result of these proceedings, it [illegible] hoped that the Bulgarians will not [illegible] which in more than one [illegible] is offered to them. The declaration of independence is a conceivable last ditch into which to retire; but it is only that. It would at once give Russia a real, instead of an imaginary, ground of action. At present the imaginariness of the ground almost passes imagination. In the first place, whether Bulgaria is or is not contumacious to Turkey is a matter with which Russia is not in the least concerned, and, in the second place, it can be demonstrated that Bulgaria is not contumacious. No such demonstration would be possible if the Bulgarians threw off the Sultan's yoke; and Russia, in such a case, would have what she has been striving for in vain for months and years—a solid pretext for interference as a signatory of the Treaty of Berlin. But there is more than this. The Bulgarians have no real or serious complaint to make of their Suzerain's conduct towards them. In some small matters, such as that of the extradition of some of the Bourgas raiders and the retention of others, the action of Turkey has not been wholly friendly, but it has done Bulgaria no serious harm. The form of the late communication from the Grand Vizier, on the other hand, could hardly have been better calculated, if it had been drawn up by the Bulgarians themselves, to justify Bulgaria in the course of action which she is actually pursuing. It might, of course, be conceivable that the line of Turkey's conduct should change, and especially in the case of actual war, or a threatened Russian occupation, without nominal war, a declaration of independence might be the ultima ratio. But assuredly the time for such a declaration is not yet, and the making of it would play into the hands of the enemies of Bulgaria. That, some day or other, and in some way or other, the Bulgarians will escape from their present state of tutelage is very likely. But it depends upon themselves whether they escape from it into real independence, or exchange the frying-pan of vassalage to Turkey for the infinitely hotter fire of Russian slavery. The course which they have hitherto pursued makes for the former and happier termination; the course which some would have them pursue would certainly make for the latter and unhappier. Neither Austria nor England could well take their part if they put themselves as openly and manifestly in the wrong as they have hitherto kept themselves openly and manifestly in the right.

THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BILL.

THERE is thus far no sign of opposition to the Local Government Bill on the part of any section of the Conservative party. That it should be received coldly by country gentlemen and the class to which they belong was natural and inevitable. They are probably indifferent to the taunts of their habitual opponents, some of whom declare that the squires are not only disestablished but disendowed. As their services have for several centuries been rendered gratuitously, they can scarcely incur personal loss; but they will regret both the withdrawal of honourable employment and the diminution of their social importance. They will, nevertheless, show their good sense and their self-respect by acquiescing in an unwelcome change. Almost all of them have at different times pledged themselves in some form to a reconstruction of local government, and their special representatives began for political reasons the agitation which has culminated in Mr. Ritchie's proposals. During Mr. Gladstone's first administration Sir Massey Lopes induced the House of Commons to pledge itself by a large majority to the readjustment of local and general taxation. A similar resolution carried by Sir Michael Hicks-Beach in 1885 caused the overthrow of Mr. Gladstone's second Ministry with all the unexpected consequences which have ensued. The stock answer to demands for relief of ratepayers has always been to the effect that fiscal concession must necessarily be associated with the creation of an elected, or partially elected, governing body. About 1875 Mr. Cross, then Home Secretary, introduced a Bill for associating with the justices in their administrative capacity a certain number of ratepayers to be chosen by secondary election. The proposal, which was renewed with some alterations in the following year, received no support from either party; but the Conservative leaders had weakened their defensive position. It was generally understood that reconstruction of county government was impending, and some supporters of the existing organization thought it prudent to effect the change while their own friends were in office. The indispensable conditions of a transfer of powers from the Justices of the Peace were generally overlooked. When Lord SALISBURY announced the intention of the Government to introduce a Local Government Bill, many of his followers probably thought that the future governing body would include a proportion of justices or of Crown nominees.

The Ministers have formed a sounder judgment, at the risk of being accused by some partisans of making a revolutionary proposal. It might have been possible to prolong for a time the authority of Quarter Sessions, especially as the prospect of an elected government seemed to be received with general indifference. An old house may stand for a time, although its stability has been impaired; but it would be unwise deliberately to erect a new building on an insecure foundation. There are many objections to popular government; but the principle has been irrevocably conceded. With a household Parliamentary franchise, and a similar municipal franchise in towns which even admits women to vote, it was impossible to establish county government on any narrower basis. The result of an imperfect concession would have been an agitation which, after doing more or less mischief, would have been ultimately successful. It would have been impossible to draw an intelligible distinction between urban and rural municipalities; and the Government plan is more conformable to precedent than any mixed government which could have been devised. Mr. RITCHIE or the draftsman of his Bill has judiciously begun his labours by enacting that County Councils shall be elected in accordance with the provisions of the Municipal Reform Act. The extension of a law or custom requires less explanation than an attempt at original or novel legislation. The first sub-section of the second clause is at the same time comprehensive and simple:—"The Council of a county and the members thereof shall "be constituted, and elected, and conduct their proceed- "ings, in like manner and be in the like position in all "respects as the Council of a borough divided into wards." The exceptions and limitations which follow are consistent with the general enactment. It matters little that the Chairman and the selected councillors and the districts are called by different names from the mayor, the aldermen, and the wards of municipal boroughs. Legislation by reference is for the most part objectionable on grounds of convenience; but there is an advantage in connecting new machinery with old. A different practice would have constituted a paradox which would not have admitted of plausible explanation. Uniformity is not always desirable when institutions have in course of time diverged from a common course; but deliberate variety is seldom permissible.

The only agitation against the Bill which has hitherto been commenced proceeds, as might have been expected, from the total abstinence party. The provisions of the Bill on the licensing question appear, on the whole, to be expedient and just, if any change was required. A few years ago the new scheme would have been summarily rejected as unfair to those who had embarked their capital in a lawful business. The publicans, who have for some time past been threatened with ruin, will probably not be obstinate in rejecting a reasonable compromise. The justices have until lately believed that they had no discretion to refuse renewal of a licence, except when the holder has offended against the law. Some recent decisions in the High Court seem to show that the justices have a wider discretion. The Local Government Bill, while it transfers the control of licences to the County Boards, gives them absolute power to refuse renewals without assigning any reason. The Council will appoint a Licensing Committee, consisting of its own members, for each licensing district. A certain proportion of the Committee will consist of selected members. When the holder of a licence has not been guilty of any offence, he will be compensated at the expense of the county. Complaints against publicans are to be heard before justices in Petty Sessions, with an appeal to Quarter Sessions. If the charge is established, the licence will be withdrawn, and the holder will not be entitled to compensation. The temperance agitators contend that the claim of an innocent holder to compensation creates for the first time a valuable property, which the owner will be enabled to sell. When it is thought necessary for the public good to take away valuable property, compensation is the only mode of reconciling expediency with justice. The fanatical party is perhaps as eager to punish the unfortunate publicans as to diminish the consumption of alcoholic drinks. The whole subject excites so much keener an interest than local government that there is reason to doubt whether the elections may not turn rather on opinions for or against prohibition than on administrative capacity. If contests for seats in the Council are determined by the pledges of candidates on the question of licences, the general community will run the risk of being misgoverned for the encouragement of a collateral agitation; but it is useless to protest against one among many inconveniences of the sovereignty of the multitude. The struggle may perhaps come to an end or diminish in violence when the contending parties have learned to measure their own forces and those of their adversaries. It may be hoped that Parliament will approve of the proposals embodied in the Bill.

The complicated character of the measure, and the probable length of the debates, will probably compel the Government to postpone some considerable part of the Bill. They may both simplify their task and save themselves opportunities of reconsidering a questionable proposal by throwing overboard the clauses which relate to London. It might well have been deemed impossible to include in a Bill for establishing county government a scheme for the administration of a province which will soon contain five millions of inhabitants. The clauses which degrade the municipality to the rank of a county differ little from Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT's wild scheme three or four years ago. The measure in one sense establishes Home Rule, and at the same time its practical result will be extreme centralization. The ratepayers of Southwark or of Hampstead will be deprived of the control of their own affairs, and yet they will share in legislation for those parts of the metropolis which they could perhaps scarcely find on a map. In troubled times the Council of London might become formidable as a political power, especially if it acquired, by the exertion of its political influence, the command of the police. The framers of the Bill seem, like Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT, to hesitate whether they should place under the orders of a popular Assembly the army which maintains order in London, and which, among other duties, is charged with the protection of the Government and the Legislature. The Lord Mayor may at some time be a demagogue and a dangerous rival to the constituted national authorities. In the last century WILKES used the privileges of the City to defy the Government, and he had not fourteen or fifteen thousand disciplined men at his disposal. The French Republic, though it has sacrificed the Church and the judicial Bench to popular clamour, has thus far steadily refused the appointment of a Mayor of Paris. London is twice as large as Paris, and it also may at some future time be represented by a disaffected faction. The London clauses of the Bill stand so completely apart from the rest that they may be amputated without danger or inconvenience. It is not at present known whether they will provoke opposition on the Ministerial side of the House. The County Councils, with their administrative and financial functions, will furnish sufficient occupation for Parliament during the remainder of the Session.

UNLICENSED HAWKING.

AMONG the minor proposals of Mr. GOSCHEN's new Budget, that which would establish the liberty of unlicensed hawking is by far the most objectionable. This is one of the small questions that are fraught with consequences of great public interest. It is already noteworthy that the gathering voice of protest does not proceed from those immediately affected by the proposal. Genuine hawkers have, indeed, small opportunity of protesting against the abolition of licences, even if they have yet realized all that is implied by the proposal. Their silence is no more to be construed as cheerful consent than the outcries of those who are to be subjected to new or increased imposts are necessarily the utterance of aggrieved virtue. The connexion between hawking and mendicancy is sufficiently notorious to justify the note of warning sounded by certain correspondents in the Times and Standard. Mr. GOSCHEN can scarcely imagine that he is opening a new field for the industrious in search of employment. The hawker could easily prove over-competition in his calling. To make that calling the general resource of professional mendicants and sturdy vagabonds would be a public calamity, and anything but an act of true philanthropy towards hawkers who now hold licences. Perhaps the CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER is too well aware of the extensive evasion of the law, and in an unwonted moment of despair has preferred unlicensed liberty to restriction that is avowedly inadequate. The result will be to stimulate to immeasurable growth the small existing evil which, after all, is perfectly controllable, and ought not to exist at all, unless we are prepared to countenance a new order of Bluegowns.

There are hawkers and hawkers. It is highly undesirable that all alike should be massed together with the nondescript multitude of beggars. Everybody is familiar with the hawker who does not hawk, in the trader's sense of the word; who stands stationary by the road-kerb in city and suburb. There is another sort of hawker, equally common; fellows whose profession is more desultory and quite compatible with intervals of idle loafing, aimless tramping, hop-picking, and picking of a less legitimate kind. The enterprise of such soars far above the sale of pencils and collar-studs. In the congenial quiet of side streets, and in new neighbourhoods where a policeman is as rare as a ptarmigan, they deal in something more terrifying to the timid and defenceless than penny novelettes. Begging, not hawking, is their pursuit, and begging that is enforced at times with abuse and threats. Only the most guileless of mankind can believe that these rogues are genuine hawkers, licensed under the Act. If Mr. GOSCHEN's proposal becomes law, the inordinate increase of resolute "askers," armed with the flimsy pretext of hawking, must follow, as surely as night follows day. Country roads and town streets will become intolerable to a large section of the public. The decay of beggars will no longer be a vain lamentation with the sentimental, and a Society for the Encouragement of Mendicity would lack subscribers even among the most fantastically humorous. There is a more serious aspect of the question that concerns the veritable hawker who travels from place to place, and follows his ancient calling with more or less fidelity to its picturesque traditions. It was once a profitable pursuit, and is so still in many districts. Unlicensed, it will be irretrievably gone. The hawker of these degenerate days is shorn of much of his bravery. Very little of the romance of the road attaches to him. The itinerant chapman, with eloquent tongue, whose stock of laces and other fal-lals interested AMY ROBSART almost as much as it bewitched her maid, has few representatives. Like the loud-voiced dealer in illustrated "broadsides" and "last dying speeches and confessions," he is disappearing rapidly before the regular trader. Hawkers, however, are sufficiently numerous to engage the attention of the CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER. They are by no means unwelcome visitors in rural districts, and they continue to angle, with very pretty bait, in the areas of town houses. From a fiscal point of view they may not be important. They may not be necessary even, in the eyes of small tradesmen. But it is incontestable that the licensed hawker, as we now have him, is infinitely preferable to the irruption of legalized mendicity with which the Budget proposal threatens to flood the country.

FRANCE.

THE last week has, if signs which have never proved fallacious before are to be trusted, brought France very appreciably nearer that outbreak of galloping consumption which destroys most French Governments at the fatal age of eighteen. The finishing touch has been put to financial and judicial scandal, and large bodies of voters, in widely distant parts of the country, have voted that they have had enough of the men now at the head of affairs. It would be an extreme piece of impertinence on the part of any foreigner to question the legality of the decision of the Court of Appeal in the case of M. WILSON and his fellow-intriguers. Beyond all doubt, the judges of the Supreme Court have rightly quashed the sentence of the inferior tribunal. But the fact that they are in the right does not make the scandal less disgraceful for the country. It may be considered as settled that M. WILSON was condemned for an offence which he had never committed. The Court of first instance condemned him to two years' imprisonment and a fine for not obtaining the cross of the Legion of Honour for M. CRESPIN (DE LA JEANNIÈRE) in return for a sum of money. The judge was of opinion that M. WILSON's promise to sell the cross was fraudulent. The Supreme Court has decided that, as no time was fixed, M. WILSON's failure to keep his word was no proof of fraud, and so it quashes the sentence. Both Courts decide that it is no legal offence to sell the coveted decoration. This decision, and all the proceedings which led up to it, cannot fail to discredit the Government. It may not be logical that it should do so, but the periodical and violent changes of French politics are not controlled by logic. All the feeling of contempt which was directed against M. GRÉVY will now be turned against the Government of which he was the chief. Like him, it is discredited by small meanness. It administers very badly, it is weak, and has absolutely no quality which strikes the imagination. That it is the best Government France has been able to give itself in these years will assuredly not save it from reform by extinction.

The result of the present elections is, or ought to be, a sufficiently clear warning to the Chamber. By-elections may not be a very safe guide; but, when five voters out of six support avowed enemies of the form of government, they have a very distinct meaning. This is what has happened. No doubt can possibly attach to the election of M. FÉLIX PYAT at Marseilles. It means that, in the second town of France, it is no disqualification for a candidate to have been a member of the Commune, to have shared the responsibility for the murder of the hostages, and to have helped to fire Paris. The votes given for M. HERVÉ mean something less criminal, but equally dangerous for the Republic. M. HERVÉ is not only a Royalist, but is the ablest of the writers of his party. He and M. PYAT gained between them six times as many votes as the moderate Republican candidate. The return of General BOULANGER at the head of the poll in the Aisne was an even more severe blow for the Government. On the very day before the result was known observers who had learnt nothing from experience were exulting in the withdrawal of the General's candidature for Marseilles. They asserted that, if he dare not stand for a Southern constituency, there was an end of him; whereupon a town in the North of France, supposed to be the steadiest part of the country, casts over 40,000 votes for the candidate who was judged to be too much even for Marseilles. This lesson does seem to have taught the moderate Republicans something. They have now discovered that nothing has been gained by expelling the General from the army. He has been so little crushed that he is able to decline to profit by the votes of Laon. He can afford to decline to stand, to the prejudice of Radicals, in the Aude and Dordogne, and can present himself with confidence in the Department of the Nord. This has at last put a stop to the foolish talk about the approaching extinction of General BOULANGER. The Moderate Republicans, to use the most convenient term for the confused cliques which happen to be at the head of affairs, have received something like notice to quit. They are, in consequence, seriously frightened; but their fright is bringing none of them to greater wisdom. Intelligent critics of politics, of whom there is never a want at Paris, can point out that the popularity of General BOULANGER is entirely due to the general disgust caused by the bad government of the Chamber. It is also easy for them to add that the General could be made perfectly harmless by a little consistency, intelligence, and vigour on the part of the majority of the Chamber. This may be very true, but then, unfortunately for the third Republic, it would not be in its present condition if the men at the head of it were capable of displaying any of these qualities. The present crisis has been reached because they are conspicuously deficient in every one of them, and there is no reason to suppose that the deficiency will either be amended at the eleventh hour or will cease to produce its natural effects. Radicals of the stamp of M. CLÉMENCEAU—who have not created a Frankenstein, as the Times' correspondent puts it, but have themselves played the part of that rash man of science—are also well scared by the General. Their one idea of a defence against him is another Ministerial crisis, and another revision of the Constitution which will, of course, intensify the confusion which is his best opportunity. The incompetence of the talkative politicians of the Chamber has made the game very easy for General BOULANGER up to now, and will doubtless continue to serve him. Some of these gentlemen are apparently consoling themselves by reflecting that the General has shown no rhetorical faculty, and they seem to hope that he will be crushed by their remarkable eloquence. This belief in the power of talk is natural on the part of gentlemen who can do nothing else, but they may possibly find that the General prefers to fight with his own weapons. He may conceivably try to make himself ruler in France, not by talking to them in the Chamber, but by talking at them in the country. He has hitherto won every round even when he seemed for a time to be getting much the worst of the fight. In the next match he may show himself equally clever. Certainly the history of the recent elections rather goes to show that the General is quite a match for the political gentlemen who have been trained to the business of electioneering. The Government has removed every restraint imposed on him by his profession. It has given him his freedom, and he himself seems to be full of fight and of confidence. With their recent failures to instruct them the Opportunist deputies must listen to their enemy with some considerable discomfort.

The lamentations very common in Paris, and audible even in London, over this revival of popularity of the sabre, are no doubt natural, but are withal a trifle silly. There would seem to be a belief in the mind of a good many politicians and journalists that financial extravagance, bad administration, weakness, and instability are much smaller evils than the vigorous government of a soldier. At least, if this belief does not exist in their minds, it is not easy to account for the horror expressed in many quarters at the prospect of General BOULANGER'S advent to power. He certainly cannot come there unless some very considerable part of the population of France believe that he will govern better than the present possessors of office—it would be absurd to call them rulers. The complaint that his victory would mean war with Germany is almost absurd. It is notorious that France will make war on Germany whenever she can with a reasonable prospect of success. If the country really wishes to remain at peace, and to convince its neighbours that it is peaceful, it has only to cease lavishing money on its army and playing for the Russian alliance. It has only to give up launching out into enterprises such as the intervention in the New Hebrides which has just come to an end. It would also inspire some confidence by ceasing to be captious and provocative in its dealings with Italy. But France will do none of these things; it acts as aggressively as of old, and expects that a few phrases will be accepted by its neighbours as a proof that it wishes to remain at peace. If, as is almost certainly the case, the desire for a war of revenge is genuine, then General BOULANGER is helped when he is accused of being likely to bring it about. In any case, whether it wishes to remain at peace or to go to war, France may naturally desire to be governed with some degree of vigour. If General BOULANGER does not fulfil its wish, which is very possible, he has at least this in his favour as a candidate, that he has not yet failed, and all other politicians have.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN AT BIRMINGHAM.

ONLY a very few ill-conditioned critics have ventured to hint that the honour which Mr. CHAMBERLAIN has just received from the town of his political birth has been prematurely bestowed. It is true that the Fisheries Treaty has not yet been ratified by the American Senate, and that it is possible—though we hope improbable—that it never will be. Even if it were to be ultimately rejected, the services of the British Commissioner in negotiating it would be none the less worthy of recognition. The temporary modus vivendi between the United States and Canada which has been agreed upon by the Treaty is, in itself, a substantial gain to the cause of international goodwill; and there is, moreover, good ground for the claim put forward by Mr. CHAMBERLAIN that, even if this particular attempt at an arrangement should fall through, it will make the way easier for a subsequent understanding. "We have at "least succeeded," to quote his words, "in putting on "record in the most formal and authoritative way the "opinion of three Governments—of the Executives of three "nations—as to what constitutes a just and honourable, a fair "and reasonable, settlement of the differences that have "arisen between them." And we are disposed to agree with him that that fact "must influence, and in the end must "govern, the final disposal of the question." To have left the matter on this footing is undoubtedly to have rendered valuable service to the nation; and since Mr. CHAMBERLAIN has for the present declined any official recognition of that service, it is eminently fitting that, at whatever shock to the susceptibilities of those good Gladstonian patriots whose love for their country attempts so nobly, but so vainly, to make head against their hatred for Mr. CHAMBERLAIN, the town of Birmingham should undertake the discharge of, at least, a portion of the debt.

The speech in which Mr. CHAMBERLAIN returned thanks for the toast of his health at the dinner which followed the presentation to him of the honorary freedom of the borough was one in the highest degree creditable not only to his oratorical powers, which have been amply illustrated in other fields, but also to his tact and judgment. An English politician of his distinction who has just returned from an important mission to the United States, and who undertakes to give his impressions of the character and institutions of the American people, has a task of extreme delicacy to perform. He had himself remarked with justice on the sensitiveness of Americans to English opinion; and this, moreover, is a characteristic which no longer means—if, indeed, it ever did mean—merely that "our "people must be cracked up." Americans are quite keen enough critics of themselves and of other people to be able to distinguish between the real and the spurious article in the matter of compliments. They are as impatient as we ourselves should be in like circumstances of the insincere gush, or only half-sincere gush, which rises so readily to the lips of some Englishmen in speaking of America and its people, and which to a sensible American must be even more offensive, because less excused by ignorance, than that unflattering estimate of his countrymen which used to find expression in the "stage Yankee." Mr. CHAMBERLAIN'S observations on the United States were in tone and substance admirable. The praise bestowed in them has all that sincerity which is guaranteed by measure and discrimination, and the confidence expressed by him that no future difficulty incapable of friendly settlement can ever hereafter arise between the two nations was carefully dissociated from that extravagance of language which too often disposes sober-minded people to estimate the basis of the belief in question at something less than its real strength. The place and circumstances being what they were, it would be unreasonable to complain that Mr. CHAMBERLAIN left the other side of the question unstated; which is, that the excessive "sensitiveness" above referred to may itself become a source of danger to the good understanding of the British and American peoples. Those who most highly value each other's good opinion are usually at the same time the most exigent in their demands upon each other for the strict observance of the obligations of friendship. A certain amount of healthy indifference is between nations, as individuals, the best security against quarrel, and too ardent international attachments are therefore not always unmixed blessings. England and America are not far at present from hitting the happy mean between the two extremes of feeling; but, so far as they show a tendency to deviate from it, it is certainly in the opposite direction to that which Mr. CHAMBERLAIN appears to contemplate.

THE CASE OF THE ERA.

THE case against the Era has gone beyond a mere action of libel, and blossomed or developed into an application to commit the defendant for contempt of court, as well as into an action for conspiracy, from which it appears that there are people not above making a good thing out of public sentiment. The judgment of the Queen's Bench Division on the point of contempt is even more important than the verdict of the jury on the first, because it settles authoritatively an interesting question of law. It is a well-recognized, and we may add a most wholesome, rule that neither a journalist nor anybody else may comment upon legal proceedings while they are in progress. To do so is an offence which the law calls, and justly calls, contempt of court. This principle was vindicated the other day against the St. Stephen's Review; there can be no doubt of its validity, and it is based upon common sense and practical convenience. The application made to a Divisional Court last Monday by Mr. MURPHY, as counsel for Miss DALLAS, sought to extend this doctrine in a very considerable degree. The judges were asked to punish Mr. LEDGER, the proprietor of the Era, for publishing an article upon the trial in which he had been defendant the week before. The ground on which Mr. MURPHY applied was that the defendant had given notice of his intention to move for a new trial, and that, therefore, the case was still pending. The learned counsel, who is not the sort of man to give up a tenable argument, frankly admitted that, but for this notice of the defendant's, he would have been out of court. It is the undoubted right, not only of every journalist, but of every citizen, to express himself with perfect candour upon any civil or criminal trial, so soon as that trial is over. He may criticize the verdict, he may censure the judge, he may, if he thinks it witty, call the jury "twelve SOLONS." The Court held, in accordance with reason and propriety, that the action, having been tried out, was a legitimate subject of comment from Mr. LEDGER, or from any other person whatsoever. The consequences of an opposite decision would have been practically to destroy the freedom of the press where judicial proceedings are concerned. In any case there may be an application for a new trial, an appeal to the Lords Justices, a final appeal to the House of Lords. The result of all this might be a new trial, and it is conceivable that, if the contest were between a millionaire and a railway Company, the whole process might be repeated with the same issue. Could any man out of a lunatic asylum contend that no discussion of the questions involved was permissible until it was absolutely certain that no further litigation would take place? To state such a proposition is to refute it; and, so soon as Mr. MURPHY was confronted with it, his case doubled up like a naval cutlass or a military bayonet.

The judges who refused to commit Mr. LEDGER were Mr. Justice FIELD and Mr. Justice STEPHEN, neither of whom would be in the least disposed to underrate the powers of the Bench. Moreover, Mr. LEDGER was commenting on his own case, and directly intimated in the article that he meant to move for a new trial. Much of his language was in very questionable taste, and his references to the plaintiff had far better have been omitted. These considerations enhance the effect of the judgment as a precedent, and it is now quite clear, if indeed it were ever doubtful, that when a verdict has been found one way or the other, the case is, for purposes of comment, at an end. As for the action itself, out of which the alleged "contempt" arose, we should have thought, but for the decision of the jury, that there could not be two opinions about it. Miss DALLAS employed very small children on the stage, and Mr. LEDGER regarded the system as an improper one. Holding that view, in which most humane and rational people agree with him, he had, we should have supposed, a right to express it in plain and even strong terms, though it must be inferred from the success of Miss DALLAS in her action for conspiracy that she treated the children kindly. There was not a particle of evidence that he had any spite against Miss DALLAS, or that his motives were otherwise than what he avowed them to be. The LORD CHIEF JUSTICE summed up as strongly in favour of the defendant as any judge could, and the jury promptly found for the plaintiff, damages forty shillings. Lord COLERIDGE made, indeed, if he is correctly reported, the curious blunder of confounding "privilege" with the right of fair comment on matters of public interest. "No "doubt," he said, "as has been admitted, this was a privi-"leged occasion, on which what was defamatory might be "published if it was within the limit of fair comment, and "did not go beyond or abuse the occasion, to do injury to "another." Now the essence of a "privileged occasion," of which a lady giving a servant a character is perhaps the most familiar instance, is that false statements made upon it are not actionable unless they can be proved to have been malicious also. The LORD CHIEF JUSTICE of England can scarcely, we presume, have intended to declare that a newspaper may publish with impunity false statements concerning public men provided the writer honestly believes them to be true. There are partisans quite capable of honestly believing that Mr. GLADSTONE or Mr. GOSCHEN dabbled in the public funds. But, if they said so, and if either of these eminent men condescended to sue them, they would not find their honest belief of much avail. The discussion of public affairs is unfettered. Allegations of fact are subject to the liability of proving them, and to put a newspaper article in the same category as a confidential communication from one interested party to another is calculated to mislead the unwary.

IRELAND.

THE conviction of HAYES and MORIARTY at the Wicklow Assizes for the murder of FITZMAURICE is a satisfactory evidence of the improved state of things in Ireland. It would, of course, have been still more significant if the trial had taken place in the district in which the crime was committed, instead of in a distant county; but such a transfer of the proceedings, after all, relieved nobody but the jury of intimidation. The witnesses—or rather the chief witness—whose testimony was necessary to their verdict had to come from the scene of the murder to give evidence, and to return to it after the trial; and it argues some return of public confidence that NORAH FITZMAURICE should have felt herself at liberty to speak out as boldly and to adhere as firmly to her identification of the prisoners as she did. Her home is, or at any rate was, at a centre of National League activity of the most sinister kind. Her father's murder was beyond doubt directly due to a denunciation published in the newspaper of that eminently constitutional politician and friend of English Radicals, Mr. HARRINGTON, and holding up FITZMAURICE to popular execration; and boycotting in the neighbourhood of Listowel was in such force at the date of the crime that, when the wounded man was carried into a house hard by the spot where he had been shot, no inmate of it dared to go for a doctor, and his daughter had to leave her dying father to go herself. It is to be hoped that when the two miscreants who have done this unhappy man to death have been punctually hanged, a better state of feeling may arise. There is reason to believe, at any rate, that the life of this fearless witness will be safe enough, and that the law as at present administered in Ireland will be sufficiently strong to prevent any repetition of the CURTIN persecution in the case of NORAH FITZMAURICE. That the two men whom the Wicklow jury found guilty after a short deliberation are really guilty we see no ground for doubting. Her original identification of MORIARTY was made under circumstances most favourable to accuracy—namely, within so short a time after the commission of the murder that his features must have been quite fresh in her memory; while, as to HAYES, she stated immediately after the murder that she knew him, and she mentioned his name, and the attempt of the defence to impair the value of this testimony was signally unsuccessful. The parish priest, who was called as a witness for the prisoners, succeeded only in showing that he gravely misconceives his duties as a spiritual adviser. There was no evidence to show of any trustworthy kind that NORAH FITZMAURICE had ever materially varied in her story as to HAYES, and she had further picked both him and MORIARTY out of a group of nine or ten men who had been brought to her. The witnesses for the alibi were evidently regarded by the jury as unworthy of credit. Mr. Justice O'BRIEN summed up at great length and with complete impartiality, and no reasonable mind can doubt that the jury returned the right verdict. There has since been a report that MORIARTY offered to turn approver, but that the Crown prosecutor declined his services, and it seems not at all improbable that one or both men may confess before the sentence is carried out.

Agrarian crime, however, and its punishment have not the only, or at present perhaps the most pressing, claim on the attention of the Irish Executive. They should keep a watchful eye on the proceedings of the one or two agitators who have still heart enough left in them to attempt to fan into flame the fast expiring embers of disorder. Mr. O'BRIEN seems resolved to prove himself the most determined of his party, and is at his old work again. In the proceedings at Youghal last Sunday he was somewhat favoured by circumstances perhaps, and might have been balked in his attempt to get up a scuffle with the police if the dispositions of the authorities had been a little more prudently conceived. But, as it is, the attempt in question succeeded, and its success is one of those incidents which ought not to be overlooked. It is not enough that Mr. O'BRIEN's meeting at Youghal was dispersed before he could address it, and that he has had to content himself with a harmless indoor conference on the affairs of the Ponsonby estate, held in the Town Hall at five o'clock in the morning. The fact remains that, in preventing him holding his prohibited open-air meeting in the Park in the afternoon, a collision took place between the police and the mob, that Captain PLUNKETT was thrown down, and savagely beaten with bludgeons, and that several police constables were brutally assaulted in the same manner. This, it must be remembered, is to Mr. O'BRIEN the next best thing to holding a forbidden meeting. If he cannot successfully defy the prohibitions of authority, he is almost as well pleased if he can compel authority to assert itself by forcible means. And what is more, the effect upon the temper of the people is only one degree less mischievous than would be produced by a successful defiance of an Executive prohibition. We see no reason whatever why Mr. O'BRIEN should be allowed to score even these second-class successes, so to speak, and we see abundant reason why, in the interest of the now prospering work of restoring order in Ireland, such toleration should be withdrawn from him. Nothing in the present instance, at any rate, could have been clearer than that. Mr. O'Brien went down to the Ponsonby estate—an estate to the good management of which, and to the amity which ought to subsist there between landlord and tenant, Mr. Balfour the other night bore testimony—with the avowed object of encouraging the party of resistance and disorder who are attempting to get up another "Woodford." The meeting which he proposed to hold in the Green Park at Youghal had been for good cause proclaimed by Mr. Redmond, the Resident Magistrate, and Mr. O'Brien had nothing to allege against the validity of this proclamation, except a criticism of the flimsiest description on the form of its signature. He was from the first a mere deliberate wrongdoer who ought to have been dealt with as such at the earliest possible opportunity. As a matter of fact, his appearance in the town and his threatened intervention compelled the assembling of a considerable force of military and police, and led directly to the affray of which we have spoken above. It is just possible that Captain Plunkett might, by the adoption of somewhat different tactics, have avoided this encounter, and yet have substantially attained his end. But there is a tendency just at present to lay a great deal too much stress on observations of this kind. We entirely deny that any agitator who pleases ought to be allowed with impunity to array a mob against the police under such conditions that, by the highest tactical skill and judgment, the officer in charge of the Constabulary may just manage to disperse them without breaking of heads, and, by a display of a somewhat lower degree of skill and judgment, with such breakage. If the second best course should be adopted, and heads happen to be broken, it is not the officers in charge who should be blamed, but the agitator who should be punished.

It will be the more disappointing if the Government allow any revival of agrarian agitation, because the game in Ireland, unless they throw it away almost at the last card, is now as good as won. Those who are the best able to judge of the state of the country—resident magistrates, judges of assize, even candid Nationalists themselves—agree in the opinion that the back of the party of disorder is broken. Profound as is the discouragement of the Parnellites in the House of Commons, that of their faction in Ireland is deeper still. It is not that they have but just discovered that the Government is in earnest; it is that they have only lately satisfied themselves that the country is in earnest too. The Government, to do them justice, have ever since Mr. Balfour's accession to his present office shown no sign of wavering in their determination to restore the authority of the law in Ireland; but it has taken a good deal to convince Irish lawlessness that the "English democracy" would allow them to do so. The partisans of disorder in Ireland have been so often and so loudly assured through the mouths of their self-appointed spokesmen that this mysterious "de-"mocracy" would "rise" against "coercion," and the belief in Mr. Gladstone's power of swaying democratic passion has been so difficult to dislodge, that the first results of the re-imposition of a firm and steady hand upon Irish anarchy were necessarily somewhat disappointing. It has been difficult to convince the men who saw Mr. Gladstone lead the English people captive in 1880, and Mr. Parnell chain Mr. Gladstone to his own car in 1886, that the two conquerors would not in conjunction be irresistible. The furious Parliamentary opposition of their combined parties to the Crimes Act gave fresh life to these hopes, and the desperate struggle of last autumn was the result. It failed; but it was renewed later on and persevered in up to the very eve of the present Session, in the desperate hope that the promised rising of the "democracy" would at last take place. Mr. Parnell's announcement of intended capitulation, made in the winter of last year, was hardly taken as serious, and Mr. Gladstone's speech on the opening night of the debate on the Address was virtually the first intimation made to the party of disorder that their leader had given up the game. Ever since that moment their spirit of resistance has declined at the rate of the barometer before a storm; and it will be the fault of the Government if it is ever allowed to rise again.

SAVING AND DESTROYING LIFE AT SEA.

THE short Bill with a somewhat long-winded title which the Earl of Onslow has introduced in the Lords does not seem much to be the total outcome of the labours so strenuously undertaken by the Royal Commission on "Loss of Life at Sea." It is entitled "An Act to "Amend the Law with respect to the Appliances to be "carried by British Merchant Ships for Saving Life at "Sea," and is not much longer—when the merely formal parts are suppressed—than its title. Neither is there any need that it should be longer; for it provides for nothing more complicated than the appointment of a mixed Committee, which is to help the President of the Board of Trade to invent rules as to the number and nature of life-saving appliances to be carried by various classes of ships in future. The result of much inquiry, therefore, would seem to be only that other persons must be appointed to inquire further. The rest of the Bill provides only that shipowners and shipmasters shall be held bound to obey the law, which obligation was, we imagine, already incumbent upon them. If legislation can increase the chances of escape for passengers and crews, it ought to be employed at once; for at present their risks are unquestionably considerable. The figures quoted by Lord Onslow, who was rather anxious to show how much is done already in the way of supplying appliances, prove that only about half the people in danger of drowning in shipwrecks within these last nine years were saved by boats actually belonging to the ship they were in. This does not seem a large proportion. Lord Onslow gave us another proof of the careful equipment of modern ships—the evidence of a packet captain—who stated that, while he usually carried a thousand passengers, he had boats for eight hundred, and life-belts for all. This is creditable as far as it goes, but it might mean that a balance of two hundred passengers would be left to die of cold hanging on to life-belts. The excuse for the very modest scope of this Bill is, however, just the extreme difficulty of providing that any ship should be able to carry appliances to save such a number of passengers—that is, to save them not only from instant drowning, but from immersion and ultimate drowning. It would be very difficult to stow boats enough on a ship's deck to carry away a thousand passengers and a crew of some two hundred sailors, firemen, and stewards. If the boats could be put there, it is quite certain that no modern merchant ship carries a crew large enough to clear them away, and man them. What possible alternative appliances there are is a doubtful question. The Committee to be appointed by this Bill, if it can be squeezed through when such big fellows are blocking the way, will justify its own existence, and prove the real importance of the measure, by discovering some means of escape from a sinking ship, more capacious and more easily handled than a boat. Perhaps the Committee will do as much good by recommending that the number of passengers to be carried should be limited as by insisting on an increase in the number of appliances for saving life.

Unfortunately, or perhaps fortunately, there is much less doubt as to the supply of appliances for the destruction of life at sea. Lord Brassey's Naval Annual, which is now in its second year, is not much, if at all, more bulky than the Blue-books (there are three of various size) compiled by the Royal Commission, but it certainly represents a much greater amount of solid work done in that respect. The Annual is not quite complete. It misses a few things—the naval manœuvres of last year, among them—which we should like to have found in it; but it gives an immense amount of information, clearly arranged, well indexed, and well illustrated by maps much more pleasing to the eye than most pictures. Lord Brassey gives the results of his own observations of the state of the coaling stations and colonial ports. On more purely technical matters he has had the help of competent authorities. The authors of the Annual have among them produced a volume which will not only be useful to the naval officer, who can profit by the scientific instruction, but to the "general "reader," whom we take to be a person anxious to have results stated for him in an intelligible way, but neither willing nor able to work them out for himself. A large part of the volume is given to a survey of the doings of foreign navies, so complete that it contains notices of Spanish battle-ships or cruisers not yet finished, and an account of the late Admiral Courbet's bombardment of Foochow in 1884. It is a book for continual use and reference. A great confidence in the efficacy of information to produce wisdom would be required to persuade any one that disputants will be brought to an agreement as to the strength of the navy by Lord Brassey's help. Lord Charles Beresford and Mr. Forwood, Captain Colomb and Lord George Hamilton, will unquestionably continue to differ.

Lord Charles very rightly insists that the sufficiency of our navy can only be ascertained by comparing it with the work it has to do. Nothing can be truer; but then how are we to learn what the work is? Lord Charles would employ his leisure to excellent purpose by thinking it out and stating the results. At present he, like his enemies the official gentlemen, is a little too fond of flashing comparisons before the British taxpayer—to use his own phrase. We are not much the wiser for continual assertions that the navy will not be in a satisfactory state until Lord Charles's own scheme of organization is adopted. There are really quite enough gentlemen in public life each with his own earthquake pill to recommend. Captain Colomb has a suggestion for a practical experiment which has some merit. It is that he should be let loose with a quick steamer and a large pot of paint to see how many merchant ships he could touch before he was stopped. In this way, he thinks, he could show how the Closure could be applied to our commerce. This would be excellent fun, but to make the experiment complete, it would be necessary to commission cruisers to hunt for the rover, also to warn merchant ships, and indemnify them for loss of time in running away from the Captain and his pot of paint.

The launch of the Nile makes a distinct addition to the strength of the navy, and is a gain without peradventure or need for experiment. Every prophecy made about the new battle-ship, except one, ought to be fulfilled. The exception is the prediction that she is to be the last of the great fighting ships. It is by no means certain that other people will let us cease building this class of vessel, and we are as it is very far indeed from having so wide a margin of reserve strength that we can afford to stand contentedly where we are. Captain Penrose Fitzgerald, whom "we shall not "call an alarmist, or any other name," because we are far too fond of him, says that naval officers are universally of opinion that much remains to be done. The Captain's arguments and figures are not above criticism; but he is an authority, and has shown that he does not lean to the side of the panic-mongers. Until the test of actual warfare has been applied there must always be a doubt as to the value of modern line-of-battle ships; but, unless science is utterly wrong in its shipbuilding (and that is conceivably possible), the Nile must be a very powerful vessel. Experts are at present the only judges of the question; but "the British "taxpayer" can see for himself that she has been built quickly and cheaply, as cheapness goes in these days when millions are spent on a single craft. At present she is about half done; but, if the rest of the work required to fit her for service is pushed on with equal energy, she will be ready in a space which compares very favourably with the speed formerly attained in our own yards, or even now reached by most foreign navies. It is even very possible that she may be ready for her guns before they are ready for her. As science grows and becomes more complicated, it takes more and more time to get anything ready for science. A big gun takes as long to make as a big ship, and is more liable to burst. Perhaps it is their liability to this form of accident which makes the Admiralty anxious to have as few of them as it can help. Perhaps the department has another reason; but, whether or no, it is acquiring guns even more slowly than ships at present.

MR. LONG ON THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BILL.

Mr. Walter Long, who has just addressed his constituents at Devizes on the subject of the Local Government Bill, possesses the twofold authority which belongs to a country gentleman and to an important official of the department from which the legislation issues. His chief, indeed, in introducing the Bill in the House of Commons, showed a very natural tendency to interpose the Parliamentary Secretary to the Board as a buffer between himself and the Conservative county members. Mr. Long, he declared with truth, was a country gentleman of the best type; and, if Mr. Long approved of the Local Government Bill, then surely, &c. &c. It would not be well to examine the implied sequence too minutely, or it might occur to us that there has never been a legislative project, however ill judged, the promoters of which could not have contrived to produce the testimony of their "Mr. Long" in support of it. Lord Spencer, for instance, was the "Mr. Long" of the Separation Bill and its accompanying Irish policy, and very energetic was the use made of him in this capacity. Far be it from us to say, however, that Mr. Ritchie's witness has no better evidence to give for the side which has called him than Lord Spencer had. We will admit, indeed, that, if you concede him his premisses, he makes his way very successfully to the conclusion that the Local Government Bill is an excellent measure and worthy of all support from Conservatives as well as Liberals. It being granted that the Government are right in dealing with the question of county administration at all, we unreservedly agree with Mr. Long that they could not wisely, or even rationally, legislate on any other general plan than that which they have adopted. It would have been the merest trifling with the question to have brought in a measure "based upon a fancy franchise," or extending protection to what were known as the "privileged classes." Rather than take a course which would have satisfied no one and irritated everybody, they should have declined to touch the question at all, and have fallen back on the eminently tenable proposition that our present form of county government is fairly efficient, reasonably economical, and absolutely pure, and that there is no ground for believing, and some ground in experience for doubting, that elective county government would possess the second and third of these qualities in a proportion at all adequate to justify the effort to attain a slightly enhanced efficiency by means of such an alteration of the system.

On the question of economy Mr. Long had much to say that deserves consideration. He pointed out, for instance, that the large expenditure of School Boards and of urban authorities ought not to be taken as measuring the probable outlay of County Councils; in the case of the first because the School Boards are, to a great extent, compelled to incur expense under pressure from the Education Department; and, in the second case, because it is principally their undertakings in the matter of urban sanitation—a function which will press equally heavily on the County Councils—whic' have imposed such heavy charges on the ratepayers. These, no doubt, are considerations which have not yet been sufficiently weighed, and Mr. Long has done well to draw attention to them. But, of course, it is one thing to show that a public body need not, and another to show that they will not, spend large sums of money; and it is in considering this latter point that the question of purity, which is, doubtless, too delicate a matter to be discussed before a popular audience, comes prominently to the front. On the proposed reform of the licensing system Mr. Long's observations are also worthy of study. The proviso for compensation on the extinction of licences needs no defence; and there is reason to hope that, if and when it becomes law, it will of itself exercise a sufficient check on the fussy activity of local optionists. But we should like to have heard from Mr. Long a somewhat fuller exposition of the anticipated effect of the Bill on this head. He contented himself with citing the provision of the measure by giving an appeal to the County Council against the refusal of a licence for "any cause other than that for "which magistrates can now refuse it"; and, of course, it is conceivable that this clause might be so worked as to make the County Council, in fact as well as in name, the tribunal of final adjudication in the case of any attempt to put the "moderate drinker" minority under the yoke of the teetotal fanatic and his intemperate pets and protégés. But, on the other hand, this might not be the case. The County Council might turn out to be the tribunal of adjudication in name only and not in fact; and a local licensing committee of teetotallers might be able to domineer over a district unchecked. As the appeal to the County Council is, in fact, the only thing which would stand between it and the "permissive prohibitory principle," we should like to feel sure that the provision will work.

DER SCHINDER.

The Schinder has no English name, because his office is unknown among us, and he is hardly a figure that it would be worth while to introduce into English society if it were not for the part he once played in the fiction of the German Romantic School. He is an official, and has his recognized rights and duties, though neither are of a dignified character. He has a right to the hides of all the animals that die a natural death in his district, and is bound to bury the carcases in a way that will prevent them becoming injurious to public health. In the days when the difficulty of travelling and the number of capital punishments rendered it convenient for each province to keep its own executioner, the office, with its perquisites, belonged to him; and it is generally believed, on what grounds we cannot say, that in case of need the Schinder is still legally bound to assist at executions, a case which of course never occurs.

The man who fills such an office and all his family are naturally regarded with disgust and horror. A considerable fine is imposed upon every one who does not give due and immediate notice of any death that may have taken place in his live stock, and if he wishes to keep the skin of a favourite dog or cat, he has to purchase it from the official, who is now its legal proprietor. This seems hard, though of course the arrangement has its sanitary advantages. It is not a due appreciation of these, however, but quite a different feeling that secures the Schinder his strange position in the village where he lives. There seems to be a tendency in the imagination to invest the outcasts of society with supernatural powers. The gipsy, who is considered hardly human, can foresee the future and work irresistible love-charms; the Jew, who is regarded with an irrational repugnance, possesses strange medical secrets; and the Schinder is encircled by a glamour which secures him the same kind of shuddering respect with which the South Italians regard their witches.

He is at once a doctor and a sorcerer—indeed, the common people rarely make a distinction between the two professions. The doctor's skill, if it proves successful, is magic to them. They dose their children with simples because their grandmothers made use of the same herbs. Gruesome stories about the dissecting schools circulate, and lead them to believe that there the outrage against God and nature is performed by which alone a higher knowledge, and therefore a higher power, can be attained. In a word, anatomy is a branch of the Black Art. For the peasant, a medical man is simply a conjurer with ecclesiastical permission and a governmental guarantee. Neither priest nor policeman forbids his being consulted; but, after all, there is something inexplicable, and therefore not quite right, in his cures. May not the Schinder, whose whole life is far more uncanny, know more of the secrets of nature after all? No one thinks exactly thus. It lies in the very nature of superstition to be unclear and illogical; but this conception of the world seems to underlie many popular superstitions. You must renounce God before he allows you to know how to thwart him, at least apparently and for a time; you must violate nature before she will tell you the things best worth knowing. The doctor has done so in his youth to a certain degree, but the very fact that he is recognized by the authorities shows that his power is limited. The Schinder, who would be fined if any one knew that he had given medical advice, is probably a sorcerer of far greater power.

Theory apart, it is a fact that a peasant woman will always go to him rather than to the doctor when there is illness in her family, and that his wife enjoys the same rather weird reputation, and in difficult cases commands a greater confidence than the certified nurse. But this is far from being the chief source of his private profit. Above all men he is able to discover and to thwart witchcraft. This may seem a comparatively harmless branch of his art, but it is not always so. Here, for instance, is a case, all the principal actors in which were living three months ago, and are, as we hope and believe, still alive. In a small village in Carniola, about fifteen years ago, a peasant woman found that the butter "would not come," and took it into her head that the churn was bewitched. She therefore sent her husband more than twenty English miles into Carinthia to a Schinder who was celebrated for his knowledge. The wise man after due consideration declared that it was certainly a case of witchcraft, and that the first woman who came to borrow anything after the peasant's return was the witch. In order to break the spell the churn must be plentifully washed out with fresh spring water three times in the name of the Holy Trinity whenever it had been used, and once with an Ave Maria before it was used again. The villager had hardly returned home before a near relation of his came in to borrow some simple household utensil. It was refused, and she was declared to be the witch. The churn was duly washed, and the butter came. Since then the bitterest enmity exists between the two families, and this is said to have influenced several municipal, and at least one political election, because for a time it split the village into two parties. If this were an isolated case, it would hardly be worth mentioning; but it is one among the many which make even the most ardent lovers of old beliefs and customs sometimes doubt whether, after all, it is not better that the schoolmaster is abroad. It is possible to pay too high a price even for gold and antiquities.

The more one learns of the popular traditions and customs of Germany, the more one admires the extent and exactitude of Clemens Brentano's acquaintance with them and the literary skill with which he used his knowledge. In one of the most powerful of his tales there is a scene in which the mother of the heroine takes her while she is still a child to the house of the executioner, to which she herself is obliged to go in search of medicaments. As soon as the girl enters the room where the sword hangs, it moves itself in the sheath, and the executioner entreats the mother to allow him to scratch her daughter's neck with it, in order that it may taste the blood it demands, and the evil omen be averted; but the mother rejects the proposal with horror. The occurrence is brought so vividly before the reader, and woven with such art into the tissue of the story, that almost every one who recognizes the delicate art with which the plot is constructed would suppose it to be an invention of the author's. Yet in Brentano's time the superstition must have been at least a living memory; for in Carinthia and Carniola there are still old men that can remember a Schinder, the son of an executioner, who possessed his father's sword. When children showed such evil tendencies as to awaken their parents' anxiety, they were brought to him and placed before it. If the sword remained still, no danger was to be apprehended; if it moved it was a fatal sign. They know nothing, however, of the means of averting the future evil which Brentano either invented or preserved. It may be worth while noting, however, that the poorer Neapolitans believe that a knife which has once taken a man's life constantly thirsts for human blood.

After one more literary reminiscence we may allow the Schinder to depart in peace. It is not likely that many Englishmen should know that Maximilian Heine, who was a doctor of medicine, and who possessed a number of other titles, once wrote a small book about his celebrated brother. They have no great reason to regret their ignorance, as the volume is both dull and untrustworthy, though not intentionally untruthful. The most amusing thing about it is the evident difficulty the author feels in deciding whether his uncle Solomon, the wealthy banker of Hamburg, or his brother the poet, who for three generations determined the character of the literature of Germany and strongly influenced that of Europe, was, in fact, the greater man. The uncle would not have had any doubts on the matter if it is true that he once said, with a sigh, on being congratulated upon one of his nephew's greatest successes:—"If the stupid fellow had only stuck to business, as I wished, he wouldn't have to be writing books now." Yet in this tiresome, frivolous, and ill-written book there is one passage not unworthy of attention, and in it a Schinder plays at least a secondary part. The story is demonstrably false, but Maximilian did not possess imagination enough to invent it. He himself says, doubtlessly with perfect truth, that his brother told it him while lying on his long deathbed in Paris; but it must be remembered that Heine delighted in mystifying even his nearest friends.

While he was still a child, so the story runs, the poet made the acquaintance of the Schinder's daughter and fell in love with her. The two children used to meet and wander about in solitary places together. Both were ashamed of their loves, she because he was a Jew, and he on account of her father's calling, but this only made them cling all the more closely to each other. Here we have evidently the first idea of some such sketch as those which were executed in the Reisebilder, and if the poet had carried out his conception the Schinder's daughter might have taken her place beside the little Veronica and the dead Maria. Even in Maximilian's dreary prose there is something strangely pathetic in the picture of the two outcast children sitting in woody hollows, with their arms round each other's neck, and then parting and going home by different paths in the dread that any one might suspect the love which each knew to be a shame.

It must be confessed that whatever poetry the Schinder may possess is due to his position rather than his character, and that any tourist whom curiosity may prompt to pay him a visit will, in all probability, find it well to drop his acquaintance as soon as he conveniently can.

BLUNT v. BALFOUR, BRETT INTERVENING.

THE pleasingly oracular tone of Mr. Balfour's reference at Stalybridge to a time when, like the young ladies in the poems and novels of a former day, he will be "all Mr. Blunt's" has produced different effects on different persons. Some of his friends have asked him whether Mr. Blunt is really worth first upsetting in an aside, and then dancing upon at leisure on the future occasion to which this hyperborean fiend refers with "considerable satisfaction." As for his enemies, abyssus abyssum vocat, as indeed is natural. An Irish Gladstonian across the Channel of St. George pronounces Mr. Balfour an "effeminate runaway," and an English ditto on the hither side sadly answers that the Chief Secretary's apparent sentiments and principles are "obviously bestial." Meanwhile Mr. Balfour makes inhuman fun of Mr. O'Brien, Mr. Blunt, and all the rest of those great men, and promises himself an ogreish and considerable satisfaction in making more hereafter. It may be said that, in another sense from that referred to above, this proceeding, though not unnatural, is unnecessary. With Mr. O'Brien we have nought to do at present; but Mr. Blunt has been so busily engaged in making a consumer of flapdoodle of himself—if the language of another, and ah! how different an O'Brien may be borrowed for a polite circumlocution—that nothing can be better than simply to give him his head. But those who argue in this way cannot comprehend the real fiendishness of Mr. Balfour's character. If, when the first absurdity came from Ireland, he had composed a grave and regular refutation, with historical statements, dates, corroborative testimony, and all the rest of it, Mr. Blunt would have been, not squelched (for there are some things that will always wriggle out, however hard you set your boot on them), but disposed of. By his actual course of dealing Mr. Balfour ("Alan, there is something terrible about this man," as Darsie Latimer and the Daily News would remark) has got Mr. Blunt to consume flapdoodle with a most unbounded stomach. And then, as if the comedy were not sufficient, we have Mr. Reginald Baliol Brett intervening, as a sort of self-constituted Queen's Proctor, to say that the petitioner's conduct is really too bad for the Court to give him relief, whatever the wickedness of the respondent may be. Whenever Mr.

Brett writes, there is (as we think Mr. Thackeray remarked about another character) an air of chivalry about him which is intensely interesting. In the name of "we" of the Home Rule party—we do not exactly know where Mr. Brett got the power of attorney from that not very creditable client, but that is his and the client's affair—Mr. Brett protests against Mr. Blunt's shocking violations of propriety. He weeps for the host and relative of Mr. Blunt, whose privacy has been so roughly violated. "Dead are Ogier and Charlemagne," says this preux chevalier in effect. Mr. Blunt is not careful of the character and reputation of Mr. Brett's party. And so on, and so on. This sensitiveness to a stain as to a wound is most edifying, and in itself could not be too highly praised. But—but—what does such a very sensitive gentleman in such a party?

However, Mr. Brett, added to Mr. Balfour, gave Mr. Blunt a fresh opportunity for the now familiar display of himself, thereby making what otherwise would be hardly worth notice good fun. As for the actual charge against Mr. Balfour, it is perfectly absurd by Mr. Blunt's own showing, even if, with most enormous good-nature, we take Mr. Blunt's word for gospel. What was at first an accusation of deliberate intention to try at murder under judicial forms becomes now, by Mr. Blunt's own detailed testimony, nothing but a statement that the speaker intended to do his simple official duty, coupled with a warning that it would not be a pleasant duty for Mr. Blunt's friends, and an anticipation (which has turned out to be perfectly judicious) that some of them at least would make, as one notorious person has boasted of making, discretion the better part of valour. If the once famous invisible reporter of the Noctes Ambrosianæ had been present on the occasion, and if every word of his report had been found to tally with Mr. Blunt's reminiscences, there would be nothing to be said by way of rebuke to Mr. Balfour, except something like Lieutenant Tappleton's famous remark to Mr. Pickwick, "Allow me to observe that the best way of preventing such consequences in future will be to be more careful in your choice of company." The substance of the charge thus dwindles away to nothing on the very showing of the accuser.

But the manner of it and the manner of the accuser's rejoinders afterwards are full of the richest delight and satisfaction to faithful souls. Mr. Blunt's whole tone and attitude all through are only to be expressed by a verb which might just as well be English as French, the verb pontifier, "to pontify." He is as deadly serious as his namesake and fellow Home Ruler, the other Wilfrid, is deadly lively. "The party to which I had been invited [a party which was clearly not "all silent," and of which we trust that not all will be damned] was a family one, devoid of all political complexion and intention," adds Mr. Blunt, thinking doubtless of the celebrated political gatherings which the late leader of his own late party used to delight to portray in words. This peaceful taboo on politics was broken into by the splenetic and rash Balfour, who dragged the subject in for the special benefit of Mr. Wilfrid Blunt. There is a soul of goodness even in things evil, and even the Mephistopheles of East Lothian felt that such a political light as Mr. Blunt not only ought not to be bushelled, but must be unbushelled at any hazard. Then follows the great dialogue which occupied some unknown period of the peaceful Sabbath of September last what time Shrewsbury, or rather Salisbury, clock was striking the hour of five. And once more Mr. Blunt challenges Mr. Balfour to say "whether they met at Clouds"—the bricks of which mansion are no doubt alive at this day to testify it, as on another celebrated occasion.

But, from the mere repetition of this Nephelococcygian conversation or cuckoo-cry about a visit at Clouds, Mr. Blunt was recalled by the girds of the brutal Balfour at Stalybridge and by the insinuations of the faitour Reginald Baliol against his own gentility and honour. Ye should have seen how the good knight, the terror of the Saracens, who, in the wilds of Araby, peacefully sat down while a whole Ghazu charged him with threatening lances, and spared not to damn the base policeman at the Worry of Woodford, did tackle these two assailants. (A good knight never minds two at once.) With regard to the further expansions and variations on the Tale of Clouds, we must be excused for saying that they are even more of a Tale of a Tub than the original, if there ever was an original, of the story which Mr. Blunt has told in so many ways. There is the same edifying insistance on details—the sea-coal fire and the parcel-gilt goblet and the prawns, if we may take a new simile from the same unfailing source—and the same absence of anything important. It seems to come to this, that "only one version" of many was "at all authentic." But this insufficient food becomes rich pasture when Mr. Blunt turns to Mr. Brett. In the disgusting lingo of a half-civilized foreign people, Mr. Blunt may be said to see Mr. Brett and go several better in the matter of chivalry. Mr. Brett, as "a Censor of honour in the fashionable world," will understand that 'in another age the matter would have been settled neither on the platform nor in the columns of the Times." Yes, after sending a bullet through the heel of his enemy's boot then Mr. Blunt would have been, ye see; and when he had polished up Mr. Balfour, very likely he would have had a shot at Mr. Brett, too, for making insinuations. But, alas! it could not be. So Mr. Blunt diverges. "It"—the Nephelococcygian conversation—"was not postprandial." We have heard of "It was after dinner" being given as an excuse, but never before of "It was not after dinner." It was not Mr. Blunt who began, but Mr. Balfour, the abominable, who uninvited came [but no, invited sure he must have been] into the fair Nephelian banquet hall, and cast the name of Dillon on the board. Also there was a great deal more of "it." Three parts of the conversation are yet anecdota, "to be continued." Mr. Blunt's object was to save lives, though he seems to have been a little slow about that. And then Mr. Blunt, dropping his politeness to Mr. Brett as a "Censor of honour," the "holder of a high social point of view," &c., suddenly calls him a "pedant." Thus, in another class of society, do ladies begin by addressing each other with "Pray, Ma'am," and "Oh, indeed, Ma'am," till all of a sudden it becomes "You nasty" something! And then, having reached the real Billingsgate level, Mr. Blunt gives it to Mr. Brett. "Common drawing-room view," "flutterings in London drawing-rooms," "sham battles," "unpolished democracy," "the poor know well," and all the rest of the rottenest rant of the lowest Radical spouter of the platform flows from the mouth of this "serious Liberal politician." For Mr. Blunt himself has said that he is that; and who should know better?

So Mr. Blunt is very angry with all of us, from the Balfour upon the mountains to the Brett upon the wall. But none of us, not even the chivalrous Mr. Brett himself, will do well to be angry with Mr. Blunt. For, in the first place, his pontifying is immense fun, and, in the second, he makes several very pretty little admissions in his anger. Perhaps it is true that "gentlemen," whether Whig or Tory, have nothing to do with him and his party; we can only say again that he has said it. When he talks of "the coming fight without gloves," that is a useful warning, and we may ask, Will they also in the coming time take their wives with them into that fight? Moreover, with still greater interest we may ask when the much more interesting three other parts of the Tale of Clouds are coming out. To tantalize even "gentlemen" and "drawing-rooms" is wrong.

THE VICEROY'S FAREWELL TO CALCUTTA.

ON the principle that no man should be called happy till the close of his career has excluded the possibility of further mishap, it is, perhaps, premature to congratulate Lord Dufferin on the agreeable manifestations of respect and affection which enlivened the closing hours of his residence in Calcutta. Yet there can be no doubt that one of the most difficult of the many arduous tasks which awaited the new Viceroy on his arrival in India four years ago has been now successfully achieved. The public of Calcutta, native and European, has been won from a mood of excitement, restlessness, and angry antagonism into an harmonious and friendly recognition of a rational and statesmanlike régime. The historical leaders of native society presided over the vast assembly which, a week ago, gathered to do honour to the departing Viceroy and formulated the valedictory utterances in which his claims to the gratitude of all good citizens were enunciated. Making all due allowance for the conventional courtesy of a polite ceremony, there is good reason for believing that the language of the valedictory address spoke the sincere conviction of the sober, estimable, and intelligent sections of native society no less than of the European community. Such expressions are of more than merely ceremonial importance, because when Lord Dufferin ascended the viceregal throne no such conviction existed, either among the European or native subjects of the Crown. Neither class considered that it had been well and wisely ruled. The English community was thoroughly alarmed, and had been fretted into an angry mood, whose manifestations interfered seriously with the respect due to the Queen's representative. As far as unofficial Englishmen were concerned, Lord Ripon was socially ostracized. Not a merchant in Calcutta would attend his levées or accept the hospitality of Government House. Calcutta is the focus of a widespread European sentiment, because all the commercial enterprises of the provinces, for hundreds of miles around in every direction, have their head-quarters or their agencies at the capital. The indigo manufacturers of Behar, the tea-planters of Darjeeling and Assam, impress with great acuteness their opinions and wishes on the Calcutta firms with whom their business is transacted. These classes, rightly or wrongly, were impressed with the belief that their interests were being unduly subordinated to a policy which made popularity with the natives its exclusive aim, and which was prepared to purchase that popularity by rash and ill-considered concessions to native restlessness and ambition. In particular they resented a change in the law which would have placed them at the mercy of an order of native magistrates of whom they had no experience and in whom they felt no confidence. In this belief they were confirmed by the opinion of those who watched Lord Ripon's administration from the vantage ground of an independent position, and who spoke presumably without personal interest or class bias. The highest judicial tribunal in India expressed in emphatic terms its grave disapproval of the proposed legislation as unnecessary, inexpedient, and dangerous. The prevailing dissatisfaction gave rise to much violent language, several unseemly demonstrations, and to bitter class feelings, such as had been unknown in India since the dark hours of the Mutiny. After a period of resistance and vacillation, marked at each stage by increased animosity, the Government escaped from an impossible position by an expedient, the futility of which both parties to the controversy thoroughly appreciated, but which both accepted as the only available escape from a dangerous dispute. The feelings which such contests provoke unhappily survive them, and the European community retained, for the rest of Lord Ripon's term of office, a profound distrust of his policy and a keen resentment at his indifference to his countrymen's interests. Native society, meanwhile, had been deeply stirred by the vague prospects of change which English Radicalism, with Lord Ripon for its mouthpiece, had held before the eyes of the aspiring, the restless, the dissatisfied. Thousands of young Hindus have received a smattering of education sufficient to unfit them for manual toil and to render them the ready victims of political illusion. Nature has supplied them with an eager intelligence, a fluent tongue, an aptitude for rhetoric, a keen sense of rhetorical effect. The British schoolmaster did the rest, and furnished the village Hampdens of Bengal with apposite precedent and congenial phrase. The Viceroy set an impressive example of stump-oratory. Young India promptly took the hint. A structure such as the Indian Government necessarily abounds in materials for rousing political passion or appealing to latent animosity. Bengal was soon ringing with noisy champions of a downtrodden race, whose cup of misery was full, and for whom the hour of emancipation was about to strike. Lord Ripon took his leave amidst plaudits, which impliedly hailed him as the inaugurator of an epoch of revolution.

Lord Dufferin's task, on arrival, was to conciliate the angry, to reassure the alarmed, and to restore the reign of common sense in classes which were half delirious with nonsensical visions of a political millennium. His temperament, his gifts, his official training rendered him exceptionally well qualified to deal with a critical situation, the difficulties of which might be fatally enhanced by any want of tact, judgment, or determination. The accomplished ex-diplomat outmatched Oriental astuteness itself in the delicate arts of reserve, which wears an air of genial frankness and a resolute will veiled under an exquisite urbanity. Equally qualified "to dominate a Senate or to dine with the Graces," the new Viceroy brought the accomplishments of European salons to bear upon the problems of Indian statecraft. The genial host or accomplished raconteur of one hour was transformed, in the next, into the patient investigator of facts, the calm arbiter of conflicting interests or rival theories, the subtle perceiver of nice distinctions, the careful weigher of remote results, the discriminating judge of personal character. Behind all lay a fixity of purpose which it was impossible to shake. Lord Dufferin's qualities speedily made themselves apparent. The eager exponents of the wishes of Young India were conscious, not, indeed, of a rebuff—for the new Viceroy was courtesy itself—but of a reminder that the aspirations of educated Bengalis were not the only, or indeed the chief, topic with which the ruler of India has to deal. The landlords of Bengal, stretched on the rack of a distasteful Land Act, found that they had to do with one who had thoroughly mastered the controversy, and whose calm and impartial judgment had already decided on its solution. It is no small testimony to Lord Dufferin's force of character that these Bengal Zemindars are now among his warmest admirers. Before long a far graver topic, of true Oriental magnitude, threw all others into abeyance. One of the "incidents," which so often herald war, occurred on the Cabul frontier, and for some weeks a war with Russia was deemed to be inevitable and imminent. Lord Dufferin, we may be certain, claims no more than his due when he asserts that the circumstance of the Amir being at the moment in his camp, and open to his counsels, was mainly instrumental in warding off this calamity. The anxieties of that moment have borne valuable fruit in the strenuous exertions which, in the face of grave financial difficulties, the Indian Government has since made to strengthen its strategic frontier and its internal military resources. All parties are now agreed as to the expediency of this tardy precaution; its adoption, in disregard of the evil precedent of his predecessor, will remain among Lord Dufferin's strongest claims to his countrymen's regard.

The moment has scarcely arrived for forming a final opinion on the merits of Lord Dufferin's other great undertaking, the annexation of Burmah. It has proved disappointingly costly in money and lives; but this circumstance has no bearing on the question of the necessity of the step, and of this Lord Dufferin declares himself—and he is certainly the person in the world most qualified to form a correct opinion—more than ever satisfied. The fact that the annexation has, at any rate, put an end to embarrassments with France is, primâ facie, a sufficient justification. It would be simply intolerable to have, on the North-Eastern frontier of India, a sore spot, such as already exists, to the infinite discomfiture of the Indian finances, on the North-West. Still the cost has been enormously in excess of all anticipation, and will, for several years to come, it is to be feared, add materially to the embarrassments of the Indian Exchequer.

Those embarrassments constitute the dark side of Lord Dufferin's Viceroyalty; they have been, throughout, serious, and each year has added to their gravity. At present the position is gloomy in the extreme. Such details of the Indian Budget for 1888 as have reached this country suffice to show how enormous are the vicissitudes to which Indian finance is liable, and how little reliance can be placed on forecasts, however careful, which are liable to be tossed to the winds by extraneous circumstances beyond prevision or control. The Budget Estimate for the financial year, which has just ended, showed a bare equilibrium. We explained, on a recent occasion, that this equilibrium was obtained only by the provision of 4¾ millions of additional revenue to meet 4¾ millions of additional expenditure, which the course of events has necessitated since 1884. It was achieved at the cost of absorbing the normal surplus of 2 millions, which it had been the settled policy of the Government to provide for famine and other contingencies; by direct taxation to the extent of 900,000*l.*; by curtailments of the resources of the Provincial Governments to the extent of half a million; by automatic improvement of revenue to the extent of a million. The strain was obviously excessive; still an equilibrium was attained. As matters have turned out, however, this equilibrium has been converted into a deficit of nearly 2½ millions. Of this excess, expenditure in Burmah accounts for 830,000*l.*; the fall of exchange below the Budget Estimate for 710,000*l.*; while the operations connected with a conversion of a portion of the sterling debt have involved the expenditure of a million. Opium and railways, which, between them, are 700,000*l.* worse than the Estimates, have been counterbalanced by improvements in other branches of revenue, and may be left out of the account. But it is obvious that a position, which was distressing enough at the outset, has been materially aggravated in the course of the year, and in particular that exchange has fallen more heavily, and the pacification of Burmah proceeded less easily, than the framers of the Budget hoped. With such a series of misfortunes staring them in the face, the Indian financiers can hardly venture to put forward their Budget Estimate as more than a rough guess at the probable financial result of the opening year, supposing that no one of various, scarcely improbable, contingencies occurs. Exchange has been taken at its present rate—namely, 1*s.* 4·9*d.* to the rupee—but there is no valid ground for supposing that its downward course during the last three years has been permanently arrested. The revenue from opium has received a blow, the effects of which will certainly be permanent, and may become still more serious; the Burmah Dacoits may easily outrun the allotment provided for their subjugation. Then there is the possibility, never remote, of famine, and the chance that we may have to do something more than prepare for war on the North-West Frontier. In the face of these alarming possibilities, the Indian Government continues its policy of railway development with sublime composure. It has spent more than 9½ millions during each of the last three years; 8 millions sterling more will be spent from borrowed capital during 1888; while three crores of rupees will be borrowed in India for various local undertakings. Such determination might be admired if the railways were a source of increasing income; but, owing to the fall in exchange, this prospect is remoter than ever. The following figures are given in the Secretary of State's memorandum as the result of the last few years:—

Net Charge 1884-5.	Net Charge 1885-6.	Net Charge 1886-7.	Estimate 1887-8.
£1,051,000	£731,000	£1,458,000	£1,589,000

As railways are worse than the estimate for 1887-8 by 400,000*l.*, it appears that their net charge in that year to the State was over 2 millions. A Government which, despite such a result and with the silver market in its present condition, resolves on borrowing 8 millions more for expenditure on railways in the coming year, does not certainly err on the side of over-caution.

THE UNIVERSITY BOAT-RACE.

EVERYTHING combined to make the race of Saturday last as dull as any contest of the kind could be. The weather before and during the contest was gloomy and dispiriting in the extreme, the attendance was far below the average, and it was perfectly well known that, in the absence of accident, there was scarcely any chance of the Dark Blues winning. Their shortcomings and the marked superiority of their antagonists had been fully recognized, and though on one famous occasion the betting altogether failed to indicate the result of the race, it was felt that there was little chance of such a mistake being repeated, and that 4 to 1 meant conclusively that Cambridge must win. It is only fair to those who had to contend with them to say that they seemed anxious to save the spectators from trying suspense, and to remove all doubt about the race at the earliest possible moment. After a very fairly even start the Cambridge crew, pulling much better together than their rivals, shot ahead, whereupon the Oxford crew, sinning against all the traditions of Oxford rowing over the University course, put on a feverish spurt, and, rowing very quickly but short and badly, very slightly headed their antagonists for a brief space. The latter, after the flurry which is almost inseparable from a start, settled quietly and steadily down to their work, soon brought their boat up level with the other craft, headed her, passed her, and went away from her with scarcely more trouble than if they had been contending with a scratch crew. Long before Hammersmith Bridge was reached the race was decided, and in one respect it was fortunate that this was so. The mist, which was thick enough at Putney, was thicker still above Hammersmith; the steamers, owing to their machinery not having been used for some time, or to some other cause, went slowly, and could not keep up with the boats; and, during the latter portion of the race—if race it can be called—the Cambridge boat was absolutely invisible, and at one time it was excessively difficult to make out the boat of the Dark Blues, who were wearily toiling after their conquerors. Those writers who have described the whole match have spoken from the fulness of their imaginations, as did their predecessors some years ago, when copious accounts appeared of a race great part of which had not Already all British industrial securities are taxed, and there is no reason in equity why the holders of foreign securities should be more favoured than the holders of British secutities. It is argued, however, that the duty will seriously damage what is called arbitrage business—that is, the buying of foreign securities abroad to sell them in London, and the buying in this country to sell abroad. THE REV. H. N. OXENHAM.

THE death of the Rev. Henry Nutcombe Oxenham has somewhat suddenly deprived literary and theological London of a characteristic figure. His spare frame, though slightly bent, did not seem to feel the weight of years; though he was a contemporary of Canon Liddon, he did not look it; and even among his friends there will be many to feel surprise that he had reached the age of fifty-eight. After a course at Harrow—where his father, the Rev. W. Oxenham, was second master—he became a Scholar of Balliol, and took his degree (in 1850) as Bachelor of Arts, with a Second Class in literis humanioribus. His ripe scholarship was the more remarkable inasmuch as his first thoughts were for theology even then, when he had already become a fervent Tractarian. At the Union he won, as a fluently persuasive speaker, a reputation he maintained in after life at meetings held to oppose the practice of vivisection or to promote the reunion of Christendom, once making an excursion into politics during the election for a Leicestershire division which returned to Parliament his attached friend, Mr. Edwin de Lisle. Ordained by Bishop Wilberforce in 1854, Mr. Oxenham had held two curacies, when, in 1857, he joined the Church of Rome. At first his thoughts turned towards the priesthood; he spent some time at the London Oratory, and afterwards he held the post of professor at St. Edmund's College, Ware, and later that of a master in Cardinal Newman's school at Birmingham. A prolonged visit to Germany, where he studied the language and literature, and where he began his intimacy with Dr. Dollinger, formed what may be called a sort of middle period in his life.

For the last thirty years he devoted himself to literary work, in some departments of which he was a master. Of the articles contributed to our own columns by his pen, some have been collected into two separate volumes, and others, too fugitive in subject for subsequent republication, will linger in many memories as examples of his bright, incisive style. Even those who differed with him could not but admire the ingenuity of his advocacy, his ready repartee, and his transparent sincerity. If his style was lucid, it was otherwise with his penmanship, which, for illegibility, could be ranked with Dean Stanley's. He had at least this much in common with Dr. Ward of the Dublin Review, whose handwriting was once described by Lord Tennyson as looking like "walking-sticks gone mad" That Mr Oxenham thought his own hieroglyphics plain as pikestaffs—to continue the Tennysonian comparison—was clear from the indignation with which he contemplated the crowd of misprints occurring whenever an unwary editor printed his MS. without first sending him proofs. His work for the press continued till within a few days of his death. On his table, beside his bed, were Mr. Augustus Trollope's Roman volumes, from which he had been refreshing his memory of the antecedents of Monsignor Campello. In last week's Guardian he had a long letter of protest against another correspondent's identification of Dr. Dollinger's principles with those of the Old Catholic Movement in its latest developments; and he wrote it, he said, as one who, with the single exception of Lord Acton, was perhaps more intimate than any other Englishman with the isolated theologian of Munich. Years ago Mr. Oxenham translated Dr. Döllinger's First Age of the Christian Church, dedicating it to Cardinal Newman, as one "whose illustrious name is alone a passport to the hearts, and a secure claim on the intellectual respect, of his countrymen." He translated also Bishop Hefele's History of the Councils. Beside these may well be placed his own books, The Catholic Doctrine of the Atonement and Catholic Eschatology and Universalism, both of them recognized as standards by English Churchmen and by Roman Catholics. In 1886 he appealed to a more general body of readers by his Memoir of Lieutenant Rudolph de Lisle, who was killed the previous year while fighting with the Royal Naval Brigade on the Upper Nile.

Mr. Oxenham's illness was of short duration. THE EXETER MAGISTRATES AND THE EXETER FIRE.

THIS reply is about what might be expected from a body of local magistrates who could seriously issue a licence for a theatre built in open defiance of their own instructions. The most careful perusal of it does not enable us to discover a single point to justify their course of proceeding, and it is not too much to say that the attempts in that direction are as feeble and aimless as their inspection of the building. They say that "the Act 6 & 7 Vic. cap. 68, under which the licence is granted, contains no indication whatever that the magistrates are to consider the structural condition of the building," although it was made quite clear by evidence that, under that very Act, they had considered the structural condition of the building, had passed resolutions, given orders, made inspections, and, by means of the licence, accorded their approval. They then go on to say:—"It is obvious, even if they are to do so, that they must be governed mainly by the opinion of experts, and it is quite unreasonable to suppose that they are to be responsible for the experts' mistakes or errors in judgment." But all this is mere evasion, as public bodies, when dealing with technical subjects, invariably employ experts, and it would be difficult to imagine any case coming before a bench of magistrates in which the assistance of some one with skilled knowledge was more imperatively required. Indeed, we go so far as to say that, in a case of this kind, it is the duty of local authorities to employ skilled aid, and that they incur a very heavy responsibility to their fellow-citizens when they neglect to do so.

But in the case of Exeter it is to be observed that the magistrates made what they themselves called an inspection for the purpose of ascertaining whether their orders had been carried out, and that on that occasion they either saw or did not see that the stipulations which they had formally made had not been complied with. If they saw this, it was a most improper act to issue a licence, and so deceive the public; if they did not see it, we may well ask what manner of men they are who could walk over wooden floors, wooden stairs, wooden corridors and passages, look at partitions of lath and plaster or match-boarding, and believe that they are "all constructed of fire-resisting materials"; who could inspect a proscenium-wall which they had ordered to be "not less than 13 inches in thickness throughout, and to have only one opening into the orchestra," and to pass it as satisfactory, although it was only 9 inches in thickness at some parts and had two openings under the stage; who could examine the dressing-room partitions in the mezzanine floor, which were of light wood, and pass them as being of "brick and fireproof construction"; who could inspect the scene-dock, which had no separation whatever from the stage, and pass it as "separated by brick and fireproof construction"? But it is a mere wearisome repetition to go on with the details.

Will any one in his senses say that these are technical matters or difficult subjects requiring the assistance of experts? It is certain that there are technical points concerning the safety of theatres, and that in connexion with such points it is the duty of the licensing authority to obtain the advice of experts; but the matters we have mentioned can hardly be considered to rank under this category, and we cannot but feel that the local magistrates place themselves on a very low level when they claim exemption from responsibility on the ground that they did not understand the difference between a wooden floor and one of concrete, or between a matchboard partition and one of brick and fire-resisting materials, and on a still lower level if they mean to convey to the public that, with such an enormous responsibility on their shoulders, they hesitated to employ an expert. Indeed, it is only just to say that the evidence of their own surveyor made it abundantly clear that they had at their disposal at least one official who could have spared them all the odium they have incurred, and it must still remain for the bench of magistrates to explain to their fellow-citizens why they ventured in such a case to license the theatre without employing this official to examine the building and report to them about it. We have no hesitation in saying that, if they had done this, 127 lives would have been saved. When it is remembered that the Exeter magistrates are gentlemen of good local standing and position, a question naturally arises as to the way in which inspections are carried on and licences issued in other large cities perhaps less favourably situated with regard to the magisterial bench.

The next part of the local magistrates' reply is so interesting that we prefer to give it in their own words:—

The magistrates, however, are very strongly of opinion that they have no such responsibility cast upon them in regard to the structural condition of the building as is indicated by the Report, and in support of this opinion they would refer to p. 32 of the treatise by Mr. W. N. M. Geary, Barrister-at-Law, on the law relating to theatres, &c., published in 1885 by Messrs. Stevens & Sons of Chancery Lane.

London, who had designed more than 42 theatres, 11 of them in London, under the sanction of the Lord Chamberlain and Metropolitan Board of Works, and who had special knowledge in this particular line, and the magistrates are informed that in no instance connected with theatres erected by him have the licensing authority deemed it necessary to require a further opinion as to the structural safety of the building before granting a licence.

This is delicious in its simplicity, and furnishes a key to the whole proceeding and its appalling results. If it had not been put in such plain words by the magistrates themselves, we should not have dared to impute to them a complete and absolute abdication of all the functions specially imposed on them by law in connexion with the licensing of theatres. The following extract is also in their own words:—

It may be contended that they placed too much reliance on others; but under the circumstances they would have taken a most unusual course had they insisted on being supplied with the opinion of some other experienced architect on the structure, &c., of the building before granting the licence. They had no reason to doubt in the slightest degree Mr. Phipps's competency, judgment, or bona fides.

Here is an instance of pure faith to which it would be difficult to find a parallel; but let us see what the Commissioner sent down by the Home Office has to say on the point. These are his words:—

It appears to me that the licensing magistrates either deceived themselves or were deceived, and that with the most ordinary care they ought to have discovered that, according to the rules which they themselves had adopted, the building was unfit to be licensed as a theatre.

The magistrates say that they "most deeply deplore the awful loss of life occasioned by the fire, but they submit that they cannot be held responsible for the defective state of the law with regard to the erection and supervision of theatres in the provinces," and they go on to ask that what they call "the provinces" may be brought under the provisions of certain Acts of Parliament, the very same which they made compulsory in their orders to the architect, but neglected to see carried out. The Commissioner on that occasion sent down by the Home Office has always stated in his writings and his evidence that, in his judgment, there was no need for a change in the law, and that what was wanted was simply knowledge and a sense of duty on the part of the licensing authority, and the reply recently given by Mr. Matthews to a question in the House of Commons appears to indicate that he holds a similar view.

We commend to the serious attention of all licensing authorities the concluding sentence of the Commissioner's Report, which is as follows:—

The saddest part of this matter is that no lesson of any kind has been taught by the event, as every one who has studied the subject, either theoretically or practically, knew beyond any possibility of a doubt what the whole action of the fire and smoke would be under such circumstances; and, moreover, the lessons and warnings of recent years had prepared all concerned for the terrible catastrophe precisely as it actually occurred.

We entirely agree with this, as far as it goes; but, for ourselves, we are inclined to go a little further now, and add that a still sadder picture is presented by the abnegation of responsibility and feebleness of argument on the part of the magistrates, and that no laws, however good, can be carried out on the principles, or want of principles, which form the basis of this reply. The Home Secretary has solemnly pronounced in his place in Parliament that there is no need for a change in the law—an opinion in which he is strongly supported by the Commissioner whom he sent to Exeter, by ourselves, and by many others—and, consequently, from this time forward licensing authorities will do well to realize their position with regard to theatres, and to make every effort in their power to prevent such severe censure as that passed by the Coroner's jury on the magistrates of Exeter.

In conclusion, we desire to say that theatres can be made safe, and ought to be made safe, and that those persons on whom the laws cast the responsibility of inspecting and licensing them will fail conspicuously in their duty, and deserve the severest reprehension, if they do not take the proper steps to have them made safe before allowing them to be opened for the reception of an audience.

THE BUDGET.

MR. GOSCHEN'S financial statement was less ambitious and sensational than the world made up its mind that it was to be; but it was exceedingly able and lucid, and showed a grasp of the intricate and complicated subjects dealt with as well as a mastery of detail seldom equalled. Before we proceed to the more interesting part of the speech, we may state briefly that the revenue for the year ending to-night was estimated at 89,589,000*l.*, being 1,454,000*l.* more than the Budget Estimates of twelve months ago. The increase is mainly due to the extraordinary productiveness of the Stamp-duties, which is a consequence chiefly of the death of three great capitalists within the year; but the business Stamp-duties also gave a larger yield, indicating a better condition the winner of the Derby. Handicappers seem to have a high opinion of Gallinule, considering that he did not win a single race last year, as they place him within from 7 to 11 lbs. of the winner of the Derby, and from 3 to 8 lbs. above The Baron, who won more than 1,700*l.* in stakes in the course of the season. At Lincoln, too, he was put on even terms with Eiridspord, the winner of the Epsom Grand Prize, and with Gloriation, the winner of the Cambridgeshire. At Kempton Park he is esteemed 3 lbs. better than Timothy, who won nearly 4,000*l.* in stakes last season, and nearly 5,000*l.* the year before, and was bought for 4,000 guineas last autumn by so excellent a judge as Captain compared with the closing year. There is thus an estimated surplus of 2,377,000*l.* on the basis of existing taxation. As Mr. Ritchie stated last week, it is proposed in the new year to increase the grants in aid of local taxation by somewhat over a million. Next year, when the Local Government Bill comes into operation, the grants in aid are to be entirely withdrawn; licence duties are to be handed over to the local authorities; new licence duties are to be imposed, and there is to be a contribution of about a million and a half from personalty. But in the coming year these complete changes are not to be made; the grants in aid are to be continued, and only a portion of the contribution from personalty is to be given to the local authorities, amounting to 1,136,000*l.* Deducting this contribution from personalty from the surplus of 2,377,000*l.* estimated above, there remains a surplus of only 1,241,000*l.* Further, the Chancellor of the Exchequer remodels the Carriage-tax, by lightening the tax on the cheaper classes of carriages, which will involve a loss to the Exchequer of 30,000*l.* annually; he exempts from the Income-tax owners of land who farm their lands without profit, which will involve a loss of about 20,000*l.*, and he abolishes hawkers' licences, involving a loss of about 25,000*l.*, the three exemptions involving a loss to the Exchequer of 75,000*l.* The surplus is thus brought down to 1,166,000*l.* On the other hand, the Succession-duty is increased in the case of lineals from 1 per cent. to 1½ per cent., which will be a gain to the Exchequer of 50,000*l.*, whereby the surplus is once more raised to 1,216,000*l.*, and one or two other slight changes bring it up to 1,227,000*l.* A certain portion of this surplus, however, is clearly necessary to provide against contingencies during the year, and the real amount which the Chancellor of the Exchequer can dispose of is only about a million. To take a penny off the Income-tax, which Mr. Goschen proposes, it is necessary, therefore, to find new taxes amounting to about 550,000*l.*, as the loss to the Exchequer in the year by a reduction of a penny in the Income-tax is estimated at about 1,550,000*l.* By making the Stamp-law more stringent he expects to get 50,000*l.* a year more from the existing Stamp-duties. Then he imposes a duty of one pound per thousand on the issue of new Companies, and on new issues of existing Companies, which is expected to yield 110,000*l.*; next he proposes a tax of five shillings per dozen on all bottled wine, which is expected to yield 125,000*l.*; further he raises the Stamp-duty upon contract notes from a penny to sixpence, which is expected to give 50,000*l.*; and, lastly, he proposes a duty of one shilling per annum on the nominal value of all securities "to bearer," which are now circulated without having paid the stamp of ten shillings per cent. The effect would be that such stocks would not pass as good delivery unless they bore the ad valorem stamp. This is calculated to yield 200,000*l.* The whole of these new taxes are thus estimated to give 535,000*l.* a year. The surplus is thereby raised to 1,762,000*l.*, which enables the Chancellor of the Exchequer to take a penny from the Income-tax, involving a loss of 1,550,000*l.*, and there is left a final estimated surplus of 212,000*l.*

There will be little difference of opinion as to the propriety of most of these changes. With a surplus of over two millions to dispose of, it is clear that Income-taxpayers have a right to demand relief. The Income-tax falls with very great severity, as Mr. Goschen justly observed, upon the lower middle classes, and especially upon professional men, whose incomes die with them—indeed, whose incomes in many cases are dependent upon their health. It is not just that a high rate of Income-tax should, under those circumstances, be kept up unless some great reform in our fiscal system is to be carried out, or unless the country is engaged in war. The Income-tax properly ought to be reserved for cases of emergency. In ordinary times its rate ought to be low. Every one will agree, therefore, that a remission of a penny in the Income-tax is right, and few will dispute also that the costlier and choicer wines are fit subjects for taxation. No doubt the wine-growers abroad and their Governments will remonstrate; but, as Mr. Goschen pertinently observed on Monday evening, our remonstrances with foreign Governments in matters of taxation are not attended to so courteously as to make us very regardful of foreign remonstrance in such a matter. So, again, preventing evasion of existing Stamp-duties is decidedly right; as is the moderate tax that is placed upon new issues. There will be more discussion, probably, regarding the proposed stamp of a shilling per thousand pounds upon Stock Exchange securities "to bearer." In principle the duty is open to no objection. Already all British industrial securities are taxed, and there is no reason in equity why the holders of foreign securities should be more favoured than the holders of British securities. It is argued, however, that the duty will seriously damage what is called arbitrage business—that is, the buying of foreign securities abroad to sell them in London, and the buying in this country to sell abroad. Unless the price in this country is higher than abroad, it is contended it will not be profitable to buy abroad for the purpose of selling here, and, if the price is higher, it will not be profitable to buy at home for the purpose of selling abroad. This would be a perfectly good argument if the tax proposed were a high one; but one shilling per cent. is so very small a duty that it cannot have a very material effect. It does, however, seem unfair to impose a uniform tax upon cheap and dear securities alike. For the sake of illustration, let us take New York Central and Erie shares. The former is quoted about 108, the latter about 24. If the same amount of tax is to be paid by the holder of Eries as by the holder of New York Centrals, the former practically pays more than four times as much as the latter in proportion to the actual selling value of the property. We would respectfully ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, therefore, to consider whether the duty should not be upon the consideration money, and not upon the nominal value. No doubt there would be more difficulty in collecting the tax, and probably it would involve greater cost, but it would remove the only real argument that can be brought against the proposal. In itself the principle of taxing foreign securities equally with home securities is right; but a right principle may be made odious if the tax falls more heavily upon some taxpayers than upon others. To a certain extent the same objection applies to the uniform duty of sixpence upon contract-notes; but it may further be pointed out that, unless brokers are required to furnish a separate contract-note for each transaction, the raising of the duty is not likely to bring the gain to the Exchequer which Mr. Goschen anticipates. Probably, however, when the text of the proposal is made public, it will be found that this matter has been provided for.

So far we have been dealing with national finance alone; but Mr. Goschen devoted a large part of his statement to local finance. It was incumbent on him, of course, to make provision for the new local authorities about to be called into existence, and for the changes which are to be made by the Local Government Bill, and in doing this he was obliged to discuss the whole question. It will be in the recollection of our readers that, when the County Councils come into existence, it is proposed to withdraw 2,600,000*l.* of grants in aid which are now made. On the other hand, it is proposed to hand over nearly three millions of existing licences, chiefly publicans' licences, but also what Mr. Goschen calls "establishment licences," and dog, gun, and game licences, and the Carriage-tax. The local revenues will gain by the change nearly 400,000*l.* a year; but the increased expenditure of the local authorities is estimated at about three millions, so that it is necessary to find an additional revenue of about 2,600,000*l.* This is done, firstly, by handing over one-half the Probate-duties of England and Wales—roughly about a million and a half. This is a tax imposed upon realized personal property, and it is the form which Mr. Goschen considers to be the best for carrying out the demand that personal property should contribute to the rates. Then new licences are to be imposed, amounting altogether to 840,000*l.* We need not remind our readers that in the coming year only one-third of the Probate-duty is handed over. We are now dealing, however, with local finance, not with the Imperial Budget, and with local finance as it will be affected in April 1889, when the Local Government Bill comes into operation. Then one-half of the Probate-duty will be handed over to the local authorities. In addition, as we have said, new licences, amounting to 840,000*l.*, are immediately to be imposed. In the first place, a duty of 1*l.* upon every vehicle exceeding 10 cwt. in weight is proposed, agricultural carts used for husbandry purposes being excepted. Secondly, a duty upon wheels is imposed of five shillings for two-wheeled carts and ten shillings for four-wheeled carts. These two duties together are expected to yield 300,000*l.* per annum. Then, the Horse-duty is revived, amounting to 1*l.* on pleasure horses, brood mares and colts being exempted, while racehorses will have to pay 5*l.*, and horse-dealers will pay a composition duty of 15*l.* per annum. The Horse-duty is estimated to yield 540,000*l.*, which, with the Wheel and the Cart duties, raises the whole of these new licences to 840,000*l.* It is to be understood that no part of the proceeds of these licences goes into the national Exchequer; they will be handed over to the local authorities, even in the new year. It is a question that interests ratepayers, therefore, and not taxpayers. It seems manifestly fair that those who use the roads should contribute to their maintenance, and heavy vehicles, such as brewers' drays and railway vans, do cut up the roads very seriously, while even owners of light carts ought in all equity to contribute more than mere pedestrians. So far the new proposals will hardly be contested, but there will probably be more opposition raised by the proposal to revive the Horse-duty. It is a duty, however, on pleasure horses alone, and it is one of the ways by which the demands of the agricultural community that personalty should contribute to the rates can be best satisfied. There is no question that farmers grumble very seriously when a great capitalist from London takes a fine mansion and keeps horses and carriages, and yet contributes to the rates only according to the rateable value of his house, and doubtless it is to meet the complaint upon this head that the proposal of the Chancellor of the Exchequer is made. Nor can it be seriously disputed that the complaint is justified. In these days of grievous agricultural depression it is not possible to go on throwing the whole burden of local government in the rural districts upon land. Within the last twenty years, Mr. Goschen showed, rates have risen about 60 per cent. In the future they are not likely to grow more slowly. But, on the face of it, it is inequitable that the whole of this growing burden should be borne by one kind of property. Agriculture is still the greatest of English industries, and as such has a claim to the greatest consideration from Parliament. But there is something more at stake. The vast immigration from the rural districts to the towns is becoming a serious national danger. Everything which tends to check it is to be welcomed. And fiscal changes which relieve the agricultural employer and impose upon personal property, if not a full, at least a material, share of the cost of local government, do tend to check it.

RACING AND STEEPLECHASING.

THICK indeed must have been the greatcoat that kept out the cutting wind on the Monday at Lincoln, and to make matters worse, the majority of backers lost their money on the Batthyany Stakes, as Mr. Naylor's Fulmen, who won the race by two lengths, was only fourth favourite. The old horse must have a strong partiality for this course, since he has won races on no others for six years. Last year he ran nine times and was unplaced on every occasion. It was no wonder, therefore, that he now started at 12 to 1; the marvel was that he should win, and under a respectable weight, too. On the second day, the Brocklesby Stakes, of 1,034*l.*, the first important two-year-old race of the season, was won easily by the Duke of Portland's good-looking and heavily engaged colt, Donovan, who, like Fulmen, the hero of the previous day, is by Galopin. The bulk of the field was generally considered very second-rate, so we shall want to see Donovan beat a better class of opponents before we can venture to call him a first-rate colt. It was rather curious that on the day of the Brocklesby Stakes two races should have been won by Parga, who was lame. Instances of races having been won by lame horses, however, have not been so rare as might be supposed. Theodore was so lame on the day on which he won the St. Leger that when he came on the course his jockey is said to have cried at the prospect of riding such a cripple. Nevertheless, a lame filly's winning two races in one day was extraordinary.

There was a great improvement in the weather on the third day at Lincoln, but it was so unexpected that the attendance was by no means large. Oberon, the winner of the Lincolnshire Handicap of last year, was now made first favourite. He is a well-bred little horse, being by Galopin out of Wheel of Fortune. As a yearling he was bought for 2,500 guineas at Lord Falmouth's famous sale, and he was sold last autumn by "Mr. Manton" to "Mr. Wardour" (how weary we are of these stupid assumed names) for 1,700 guineas. He is a neat, well-shaped horse, with a great deal of quality, but some people object to him on the ground that he turns his toes in a little. "Mr. Childwick's" Harpenden, who was carrying the heaviest weight in the race, was also much fancied, as many people still cling to the idea that he is one of the best horses in training. On public form there was much to be said for the chance of Gloriation, who had a splendid record last season, when he was the first to pass the winning-post in nine races out of ten, his winnings amounting to but little short of 6,000*l.* His only conqueror of last year, Lady Muncaster, who was now meeting him on 3 lbs. better terms, also seemed to have some right to favouritism, although it was said that she was scarcely fit. Tommy Tittlemouse, a hard-working and useful old plater, was considered favourably treated at 6 st. 6 lbs., as well he might be, since he was receiving no less than 2 st. 5 lbs. from Harpenden. But it would be weary work to go through the long list of horses (many of them but half-trained) that found their way into the betting. The handicap gave rise to a great deal of gambling, and it was what is generally known as a good betting race, which means a race in which professional bookmakers are able to make large profits at the expense of amateurs. Many horses were backed when their owners had not the least intention of starting them; and there were rather more than less of the usual fictitious stories of private trials and "owners' intentions." After Fulmen's unlooked-for victory on the Monday, there was a rush to back his owner's horse, Royal Rose, for the Lincolnshire Handicap; he at once sprang from 100 to 1 to 16 to 1, and at the post he was backed at 10 to 1. He had run half a dozen times without winning last year; but he was a five-year-old carrying only 6 st. 3 lbs., and Fulmen also had lost all his races last season, so backers made up their minds that he was a "good thing," and plunged accordingly. As soon as the field had started, Tyrone, an outsider, made the running to within a hundred yards of the judge's box. Oberon, it is said, was nearly knocked down by Hugo, and he never took a prominent part in the race. Harpenden, who had been almost an equal favourite with Oberon, was beaten very early; so, too, were Gloriation and the much-vaunted Royal Rose. Isobar ran well throughout the greater part of the race; but he gave way at the critical moment. Thunderstorm, who had gone back in the betting on the strength of a report that he had lately broken a bloodvessel, did better, being in the struggle almost to the end. The winner was Mr. W. J. Legh's Veracity, a horse that had run ten times unsuccessfully last season, and started at 50 to 1. It is but fair to say that he had been a very fair two-year-old, winning eight races out of ten at that age, when he is said to have been purchased for 2,000 guineas. In the Lincolnshire Handicap he reached Tyrone's quarters below the distance, and a good race followed between the pair, Veracity staying the longest and winning by half a length. It is probable that Thunderstorm might have been third if his jockey had not eased him when he found he could not be second. As it was, Lobster beat him by a head. Backers and Turf prophets were terribly out of it, for odds varying from 25 to 50 to 1 had been laid at the start against each of the first four horses that passed the winning post.

The next day, the first of the Liverpool Spring Meeting, Veracity came out again for the Prince of Wales's Plate, and as he had a stone extra to carry, he was overweighted; but he might have been third if he had been persevered with. When, however, his jockey found he could not win, he gave up pressing him, and Tommy Tittlemouse, who had been fifth to him at Lincoln, passed him. Nevertheless, his performance under his extra weight was sufficient to show that his victory in the Lincolnshire Handicap was no fluke. The race was won by Lisbon, who had been purchased in the winter for 1,000 guineas, a considerable part of which was now repaid by the stakes. Veracity's running with Tommy Tittlemouse in this race, with 3 lbs. the worst of the weights, looked as if the owner of the last-named horse would have lost the match which he was anxious to make between the pair for 1,000*l.* a side. This was confirmed on Tuesday last by Veracity's easy victory over Tommy Tittlemouse in the Nottingham Spring Handicap. Mr. J. Houldsworth's Gazelle, a two-year-old filly by Springfield, that had run a bad fourth two days earlier for the Brocklesby Stakes, now beat a field of nine for the Molyneux Stakes, a race worth 949*l.* The result of this race was a terrible blow to those who place their faith in private trials, as two of the competitors were understood to have been tried at home to be superior to the second and third in the Brocklesby Stakes, in which race Gazelle was unplaced; yet now Gazelle beat the reputed conquerors of her own conquerors by several lengths. On the day of the Grand National, the Sefton Park Plate for two-year-olds, a race worth about 500 guineas, was won in a canter by Lord Rodney's chestnut filly Spoleta, by Hermit out of Villafranca. She had lately been purchased from Captain Machell, who bought her last year at the Blankney sale for 350 guineas.

It was pretty generally admitted that the field of twenty horses that went to the post for the Liverpool Grand National Steeplechase was a poor one, and it was voted a dull and uninteresting affair. Mr. Gubbins's Usna, who had never been beaten, and "Mr. E. Wardour's" Chancellor were the leading favourites. There were no false starts, and the field went away at a strong pace, clearing the two first fences without difficulty. At the open ditch Lord Cholmondeley's The Fawn fell, and Kinfauns, as well as a horse belonging to the owner of Usna, refused. The rest got safely over Beecher's Brook; but Cork dropped his hind legs into Valentine's Brook and came down. Usna held the lead when they got on the racecourse. At the first of the new thorn fences on the flat, Bellona rolled over; and, after leaving the racecourse the second time for "the country," Trap fell heavily, and either broke or dislocated his rider's collar-bone. Half a mile further on, Chancellor, one of the first favourites, was hopelessly beaten; and just before reaching Valentine's Brook, Usna, the other favourite, wrenched his shoulder, and not only lost his own chance, but, in swerving from the course, pushed Frigate considerably out of her line. The Prince of Wales's representative, Magic, was going well in the front rank as the horses entered the racecourse for the last time; but he was beaten in the long gallop over the flat. When they came to the two last fences, Baron Schroder's Savoyard had taken the lead, and the race seemed to be in his hands. In jumping the thorn fence, however, he solemnly toppled over and came down on his head. Lord Rodney's Ringlet was now left in command—an empty honour, as she was utterly pumped out, and tiring at every stride. There was more strength left in Frigate, in spite of the ground she had lost through Usna's running her out of the course, and she soon overhauled Ringlet. She had already run second twice for the Grand National, and now victory seemed at last within her grasp; but her effort in making up lost ground had taken a great deal out of her, and Mr. E. W. Baird's black gelding, Playfair, crept up as she went at the last fence. There was a struggle for a few strides on the run in, and then two or three cuts of the whip put Playfair in front, and the 40 to 1 outsider won by ten lengths.

A thorough study of the Spring handicaps is almost essential to a racing man, for they may be said to present a summary of the form of the preceding year. They ought to be examined in full, apart from the question of acceptances, although the latter should receive a careful scrutiny in due course. The handicapper at Kempton Park paid the winner of last year's Derby no compliment in considering him 10 lbs. below Minting, in addition to weight for age, and this estimate is quite supported by popular opinion; for few people think that Merry Hampton could have won a Derby in a good year. In relation to his old opponent, The Baron, he was placed at an interval of 10 lbs. at Lincoln, 14 lbs. at Epsom, and as much as 18 lbs. both at Kempton Park and Leicester, which shows that racing authorities differ in their opinions as to the respective merits of the two horses. Kilwarlin, the winner of the St. Leger, is handicapped on about equal terms with the winner of the Derby. Handicappers seem to have a high opinion of Gallinule, considering that he did not win a single race last year, as they place him within from 7 to 11 lbs. of the winner of the Derby, and from 3 to 8 lbs. above The Baron, who won more than 1,700*l.* in stakes in the course of the season. At Lincoln, too, he was put on even terms with Eiridspord, the winner of the Epsom Grand Prize, and with Gloriation, the winner of the Cambridgeshire. At Kempton Park he is esteemed 3 lbs. better than Timothy, who won nearly 4,000*l.* in stakes last season, and nearly 5,000*l.* the year before, and was bought for 4,000 guineas last autumn by so excellent a judge as Captain Machell. Gallinule, it will be remembered, belonged formerly to Lord Ailesbury, and was sold last autumn for 5,100 guineas, at the same time that the notorious Everitt and the rest of the stud went to the hammer. The well-known five-year-olds, Harpenden and Gay Hermit, were thought to be, at weight for age, some 4 or 5 lbs. inferior to the Derby and St. Leger winners of last year; but handicappers differed as to their relative merits, those at Lincoln and Kempton Park considering Harpenden and those at Epsom Gay Hermit slightly the best of the pair. Thunderstorm showed such unexpected form last November by beating fields of sixteen both at Derby and Manchester that he was treated as a good horse in the Spring handicaps; yet the compilers were not quite agreed about him, as he was made to give Gallinule 4 lbs. at Epsom, whereas he was to receive 3 lbs. from that horse at Newmarket and Kempton Park. For the long Metropolitan course, Humewood, the winner of last year's Cesarewitch, was very properly given the post of honour at the top of the handicap, 5 lbs. above The Cob. Then came Quilp, as to whose merits the handicappers at Epsom and Chester differ to the extent of 11 lbs., as he was placed 8 lbs. below The Cob at the former meeting and 3 lbs. above him for the Cup at the latter. It only remains to be said that, if any of the Spring handicaps should prove failures, the blame ought to be laid on the weather, which has interfered so much with trainers, rather than on the handicappers.

THE CRYSTAL PALACE CONCERTS.

A BEETHOVEN Symphony, wherever it may come in the programme, is always the kernel of an orchestral entertainment. The No. 4 in B flat, placed at the end of the last Crystal Palace concert, was given, not only without any signs of impatience or weariness on the part of the musicians, but with a brio and vigour which, in the last movement at any rate, surpassed all their efforts in the previous numbers. Most people consider this Finale the important division of the Symphony, and it is unquestionably difficult to render it with a fitting effect of enthusiasm. It was firmly and incisively played, however, without dragging of the time or confusion in the utterance of the rapid and brilliant passages. The intelligent breadth of phrasing necessary to give point and unity to the performance was by no means lacking on Saturday. As in the last so in the first movement, a broad marked style of melody seems to draw the mind through all sorts of beauties and details from one main point of rest and contrast to another. In fact, in this work Beethoven had fallen into his favourite style of composing in phrases of wide and even flight—a style he interrupted at times, as in the C minor Symphony, by shorter and more abrupt kinds of utterance. Though the "Allegro Vivace" of the Fourth Symphony swings, so to speak, on a long pendulum, the connexion of its parts should be very clearly discerned in a good performance, for its melodies are large, simple, kindred in character, and suitably instrumented. Thanks to Mr. Manns's good offices, and to the intelligence and energy of his orchestra, the unity and beauty of the work were not likely to be lost to any one. The first and last movements were the best done, and if there was a fault, it lay in an occasional tendency to an even and heavy hammering in the fortes. The slow movement seemed a little too smart in expression, perhaps somewhat hurried, and scarcely graceful and pathetic enough. The "Trauermarsch" (Siegfried's Death), from the Götterdämmerung, is one of the selections from Wagner's works most welcome at a concert. Fairly comprehended, and played with spirit, it produced its usual effect of rich picturesqueness and bold and stirring contrast both of theme and of orchestration. An imposing grandeur of sentiment, fortunately simple and easily felt, is given by the admirable distribution of the orchestra to the subjects treated. Of course Mr. Wingham's Overture No. 4 in F cannot take rank with works of such colossal mould and deep science as the foregoing; but, placed as it was at the beginning of the concert, its bright tunefulness and sympathetic use of old forms were by no means unacceptable. More is promised at the outset, perhaps, than is carried out; for the themes, though melodious, are treated in a vein of hardly original invention.

The part of the concert devoted to soloists was made interesting by the playing of a lady whom, considering her sex, it might be rude to call a veteran of the violin. Mme. Norman-Neruda's performance possesses a moving quality, a perfectly unaffected simplicity, and a rich satisfying tone, which makes one forget many a good violinist of later arrival. She is a player who exhibits what is called charm in a higher degree than musicians with a broader and more masculine style. What she played on Saturday suited her manner to a nicety. Viotti's Concerto (No. 22) in A minor is music of an old sort, quiet in emotion. The passionate emotions are those most in fashion since Beethoven, and players of to-day generally render them more satisfactorily than classic grace, quaint stateliness, or quiet dignity. Mme. Norman-Neruda fully proved that there is no need to be cold because you are not treating the wild and fervid, and that other sentiments than passion and mystery find a touching and legitimate expression in art. She played the Adagio, in particular, with a simplicity and justness of expression and a beauty and purity of tone that are seldom surpassed. Later on she gave Nardini's "Larghetto" with exquisite sweetness, and Paganini's "Perpetuo Mobile" with admirable clearness and steadiness of technique which did not exclude a method of phrasing full of intelligence and meaning. Miss Anna Russell—a pupil, we believe, of the Royal College of Music—made her first appearance as a singer at these concerts. She sang a little timidly in Weber's "Although a Cloud," from Der Freischütz, but she gave proof of a nice sentiment and a pleasantly refined method. Without the orchestra her voice produced more effect, and her rendering of Mendelssohn's songs, "Greeting" and "A Maiden's Thought," was full of tenderness and delicacy.

SOCIAL SULKING AND SOCIAL BOYCOTTING.

PERSONS who move in the dim and unoccupied spaces of what used to be society have discovered that society has ceased to exist. There are factions mutually intolerant and exclusive, but society properly there is none. It has gone to that limbo filled by the serpents of Iceland and the manners of the barbarous tribe which possessed only customs. Political alienations have cooled personal friendships and dissolved acquaintanceships, converting a benevolent neutrality into a malignant partisanship. Good temper was once the characteristic of English politics, but it has been soured. There used in former days to be Whig houses and Tory houses. There were Lady Hollands and Lady Jerseys. But Whigs were found in Tory houses and Tories were found in Whig houses, not disguised nor liable to expulsion if detected, but in their true character. Now very little of this is to be seen. Even the common or neutral ground on which people once met is left void. It is deserted, barren as the sacred field of a heathen temple. People who once were glad to greet each other now stay away from their old haunts lest by chance they should encounter. The fall of the French Empire, in deposing Paris from its rank as a capital of pleasure, had helped to make London a centre of European society. But this state of things has been changed by the events of the past three years. No guest can be comfortable in a house in which the hosts are quarrelling, in which they occupy separate apartments, in which they do not speak if they meet, and do not meet if they can help it. This for the moment is the condition of society in the English capital.

People who have known London for more than half a century testify that the social alienation produced by political divisions is profounder and more general than they have before witnessed. At the time of the repeal of the Corn-laws there were heart-burnings and estrangements. The intimate friends of yesterday were the distant acquaintances of to-day and the complete strangers of to-morrow. Sir George Lewis somewhere expresses the opinion that a state of things had arrived, a slight aggravation of which might have produced in the English House of Commons something like the Sumner outrage of the United States Senate; and the champion of the agricultural interest would have been found, not in Mr. Disraeli, but in some protectionist Brooks. A century ago Burke renounced on political grounds the friendship of Fox, and angrily desired to be set down when he found that the Parliamentary colleague who had given him a lift in his carriage homewards from the House was "one of those people"—that is to say, took the Fox view of the French Revolution. But Burke's temper was as unique and as dominating as his genius, and the two were so fused together that it was not always as easy as in the case just recited to say when his temper spoke and when his genius. In the House of Commons, which lacks a Burke, matters have not reached this length. The old and the new Liberals—Hartingtonians and Gladstonians—exhibit a decorum which was not always displayed by the old and new Whigs. The rival chiefs do not attack each other as Walpole and Pulteney did; but it may be doubted whether they exchange the mutual chaff and the bets with which the orthodox and the dissentient Liberal of the eighteenth century relieved their public encounters. Walpole's false concord—his nulli pallescere culpa—is nearly as celebrated as Burke's false quantity; but, though Mr. Gladstone occasionally quotes Latin, he is not a betting man, and, if he were, Lord Hartington is scarcely the person to challenge his grammar, nor Mr. Reginald Palgrave the authority to whom the dispute might be referred. There is more decorum—when Sir William Harcourt and Mr. Tim Healy keep their seats and hold their tongues—but there are probably a deeper distrust and alienation than have before divided statesmen who were once colleagues. The passion is cold, but it is not for that the less keen.

In the earlier days of English party history personal rancour had but a small part in the conflicts of Parliament. Public life was a kind of aristocratic game, with the administration of the State for its prize, and though Whigs and Tories gave and received ugly knocks and got occasionally kicked and trampled upon in the scramble, there was, as a rule, no more ill-feeling than exists between the two sides at a match of football, played according to the Rugby game. Now, we fear, a different state of mind prevails. Perhaps politicians are more in earnest. Perhaps in some cases they are only more Pharisaic. Mr. Gladstone's conversion to Separatism is so strange that, if it is not due to a supernatural illumination on his part, a sort of on-the-road-to-Damascus miracle, it will suggest the manœuvre of a practised tactician who saw that eighty-five Irish votes were in the market and was resolved to have them at any price. Between the men who believe in the miraculous convert and the men who believe in the political schemer, to whom eighty-five Irish birds in the old Parliamentary hand are worth more than twice that number of English birds in the bush, there cannot be much cordiality. The man who thinks Mr. Gladstone an inspired political prophet and the man who regards him as an ingenious and unscrupulous political adventurer feel that they are better apart. The degree of their present estrangement is measured by their former intimacy. Each is to the other a sort of Banquo's Ghost—an uncomfortable spectral phenomenon; the outward semblance of the man—his look, his bearing, and his clothes—without the inner reality to which they once addressed himself. A stranger is masquerading, not only in the habit, but in the flesh and blood, of an old friend; and the superficial familiarity makes the interior strangeness the more complete. Short of this degree of distrust, the feeling that issues have been raised affecting, not only the future greatness and life of England, but the most vital principles of personal conduct, is enough to explain the division which politics have carried into society. Between believers in the peremptory obligation of the Ten Commandments and believers in their optional and conditional character, between those who would maintain and those who assail the integrity of the Empire, drawing-room and dinner-table civilities are difficult. That basis of common conviction and sentiment which has hitherto lain beneath the widest divergence of English politics is wanting. Apart from it there cannot be profitable variety of opinion; and even the easy interchange of thought or talk on things indifferent becomes a task. Each is conscious of a haunting secret. Perhaps this ought not to be so; but of a certainty in innumerable cases it is so. The result is social sulking and social boycotting.

CONCERTS.

THE concert given by the South Kensington Ladies' Choir at Prince's Hall, under the conductorship of Mrs. A. O'Leary, in aid of the funds of the South London Fine Art Gallery and Free Library, proved a decided success. The choir, which has been most carefully trained by Mrs. O'Leary, was supported by Miss Alice Gomes, whose charming rendering of Pergolesi's "Tre Giorni," and F. Clay's "She wandered down the mountain-side," received the enthusiastic applause it deserved. Miss Emily Skinner, who was unavoidably absent through indisposition, was represented by Miss Lucy Riley, who played an "Adagio" from Max Bruch's violin concerto in G Minor, and two of Brahms's Hungarian Dances very creditably. The choir were at their best in three trios for female voices by Brahms, which were very effectively accompanied by Messrs. Standen and Mann on the horns. Especially good was the last trio, a composition which needs much careful singing and strict attention to the lights and shades of expression. One or two members of the choir showed that with a little more study they would be able to take their places among the solo singers of the concert stage of the future with credit.

FANCY IN NUBIBUS.

"O! it is pleasant (and 'tis done with ease
When months have passed, so quickly memory flies)
To make a chat at Clouds mean what you please,
And let your easily persuaded eyes
See serious projects issuing from the mould
Of playful converse; or, with head bent low
And wits askew, find villanies untold
Preparing; then, an agitator, go
From stump to stump through noisy Paddyland,
Till, crammed with blarney, and with closed sight
To facts, all pikestaff-plain, on every hand,
By one idea possessed all day and night,
At last this fiction-bubble huge you see Rise like the swelling of soap-suddery."

Thus, or to very much the same effect,
In gist and substance so—or nearly so—
Sang Coleridge, in a sonnet I select
As one which you, a poet, ought to know.
How great wits jump! How seems this casual lay
Of that poetic Proteus to belong
To you and your adventures! None would say
That you take step for step with him in song—
That were too much: no "Ancient Mariner"
Floats through your brain, or in your bosom swells.
I do not think that you are destined, sir,
To witch the world with other "Christabels."
But "Fancy!" and "in nubibus." Ah! there
You and our Coleridge make a perfect pair.

What saw you in that retrospect of Clouds?
Less bright is yours than Coleridge's mirage.
Dungeons and manacles—nay, tombs and shrouds—
Planks for all bed, skilly pour tout potage,
And wasting forms of patriots affront
Your shuddering gaze; for such the vision stern
That your strange colloquy, good Mr. Bl-nt,
With Mr. B-lf-r gave you to discern;
Such, and more dread than such—the despot's glee
Who counts his scalps the Castle's walls within,
And, gaol-report in hand, smiles fiendishly
Over th' unfavourable bulletin.
These were the nubes which your fancy, freed
From sense's trammels, traversed—dark indeed!

Yet did that retrospect of Clouds disclose
Something more marvellous and fraught with awe
Than, gazing on the ever-shifting shows
Of Heaven amid his courtiers, Hamlet saw.
Grotesque, or so it pleased the Prince to feign,
Seemed him the nebulous shapes his eye that met,
Nor to the deference of the Chamberlain
Appeared they less fantastical; and yet
How feeble was that fancy which espied
Only the camel o'er the welkin sail!
How dull that glance that in the clouds descried
But the lean weasel and the floundering whale,
When you in such piled vapours of the air
Found the weird Nest of the Mysterious Mare!

REVIEWS.

EARLY ART IN IRELAND.*

MISS MARGARET STOKES is already well known to students of Christian archæology as one of the chief living writers on the antiquities of Ireland, and as an able fellow-worker many years ago with the late Lord Dunraven in his researches on the same subject. It is also to Miss Stokes that we owe the very useful English edition of Didron's Christian Iconography, consisting of various scattered papers which were collected and published under her direction in a convenient form two years ago.

We are glad that so able an antiquary has undertaken for Ireland a work similar to that which Dr. Anderson has done so well for Scotland. The purely Irish origin of the early Christian art of Scotland and a great part of England gives a special importance and interest to Miss Stokes's subject, illustrating as it does the history of art development in Britain. It is only by the most careful selection of examples and by a good system of classification that Miss Stokes has been able successfully to deal with so large a subject within the narrow limits of this little book of two hundred pages, the highly concentrated interest of which makes one wish that the author may some day produce a much larger work on the same subject—including, as it does, such very different classes of art as illuminated MSS., metal-work, sculpture, and architecture.

A very valuable feature in Miss Stokes's book is the tabulated list which she gives (p. 298) of the various works of art of all classes to which dates, either exact or approximate, can be given. These dated MSS., pieces of jewelry, buildings, or whatever they are, each form a fixed point of knowledge, which enables the antiquary to arrive at a probable chronological arrangement of the other and more numerous undated examples of each class.

In considering this chronological table, one of the most striking points is the very extraordinary technical perfection and complicated beauty attained by the Irish scribes as early as the seventh century A.D. No words can adequately describe the decorative richness and the mechanical perfection of such illuminations as those which so thickly crowd the Book of Kells in the Trinity College Library at Dublin, or the Gospels of St. Chad now in the Chapter Library at Lichfield. The ingenious intricacy of the various interlaced patterns are not only æsthetically beautiful, but give one also a sort of intellectual pleasure, akin to that derived from a clever mathematical problem, when one traces the unerring accuracy with which the various strands of the design cross and wind and knot with one another without a false line or an impossible plait occurring anywhere. One thing is clear about these marvellous patterns, and that is that they were produced by men who were themselves familiar with the working of gold jewelry; motives of ornament, clearly derived from gold wire twisted into complicated patterns, are very frequent in the MSS.; and these very patterns are to be seen in some of the no less wonderful jewelry of early Celtic times. In the art of prehistoric Greece exactly the same interchange of motives is to be seen; designs which grew naturally out of the technique of one art were copied in another and quite different class of work. Thus, for example, we see the wire spirals of the jeweller reproduced in the stone reliefs of Mycenæ and Orchomenos, and at Tiryns on the walls of the ancient palace were paintings in which every detail, down to the semblance of a fringe along the border, was copied from loom patterns or woven stuffs.

The fact is that man of all ages and of all countries, while passing through a similar stage of artistic development, is led, not only to use the same methods of execution, but even to produce the most closely similar designs. Certain combinations of spirals, repeated in geometrical patterns of almost exactly the same type, occur on the gold bosses of pre-Homeric Mycenæ, on many pages of seventh and eighth century Irish MSS., and among the ornaments of the pre-historic races of Northern America—a curious proof of the general sameness of the human brain and of the strong tendency which the peculiarities or necessities of certain handicrafts have to suggest certain forms of decoration to the mind of the worker. One peculiarity of the early Celtic illuminations is the absence of gold, either as a ground or as forming part of the pattern. The extreme richness of their effect is produced by the use of colours only, and among them it is interesting to find a gorgeous purple-scarlet, which appears to be a form of the old murex dye, for which the ancient Phœnicians were so celebrated. Miss Stokes quotes a curious statement made by Bede in his Ecclesiastical History, I. i., to the effect that a very beautiful scarlet pigment was obtained in his time from shell-fish found on the shores of Britain. The murex used by the Celtic scribes can hardly have been imported from Syria, and it is probable that they possessed the secret of extracting the dye from some shell-fish which no doubt is still to be found on the coasts of Britain or Ireland, though its special value as a source of pigment has been forgotten.

Wonderful as the early Irish illuminated MSS. are, the technical skill shown in the metal-work is even more remarkable. No people, except perhaps the Greeks of the fifth to the third century B.C., and the Hellenized artists of Etruria ever produced work in gold, silver, and enamels of greater technical perfection than that of the Irish Celts. The number of different metals and alloys and the variety of kinds and qualities of enamels which are combined in one such object as the Armagh Chalice are most extraordinary. This beautiful cup, now preserved in the collection at Dublin, belongs to that primitive type of two-handled chalices of which the finest examples are to be found in the Treasury of St. Mark's at Venice; the bowl very frequently is cut out of a solid piece of crystal or onyx, and the stem and handles formed in gem-studded gold. This early type of chalice is simply copied from the most magnificent sort of secular drinking cup, which with its capacious bowl and double handles was the most convenient shape during the time when the laity still received the Communion in both kinds. These larger cups often continued in use long after the introduction of the new system of refusing the wine to the laity had been established; they were then used not to hold the consecrated wine, but for what was called in Old English the "housel-sip"—that is, the sip of unconsecrated wine which was given to the communicant to help him to swallow the dry wafer-Host. The variety of methods are very surprising in which vitreous pastes or enamels, both opaque and translucent, are used for the enrichment of the Irish jewelry and other metal-work. In some cases the cloisonné process is used; patterns are formed by soldering on edge minute ribands of gold; the intervals between are then filled in with differently-coloured pieces of glass, each fused into its place with perfect accuracy. Another system was to form incised patterns in a solid bit of gold, the sinkings in which were then filled in with similar enamel glass. A third method, more difficult still, was to make small jewel-like bosses, in which the design was made by different-coloured bits of glass fused together, without any metal separation—a sort of minute mosaic, like the millefiori still made by the Murano glass-workers. A number of glass rods of different colours are arranged in a bundle, so that the ends of the rods form the design; the whole bundle is then melted together into one stick, which, while soft, is pulled out to a greatly diminished thickness, the relative position of each rod remaining the same, so that, without other alteration, the sectional design in the rod is reduced to a fraction of its former diameter. In this way glass patterns were made with the design so delicate and minute that a microscope is needed to trace the separate pieces of the mosaic. Wonderful examples of this process have been found in ancient Egypt—as, for example, the glass bezel of a ring now in the British Museum, in which the figure of a sacred hawk is formed by the union of microscopically minute sticks of glass. One of the advantages of this ingenious device was that a large number of slices, each with the pattern equally perfect, could be cut from one of these compound sticks of glass. This great skill on the part of the early Celts of Ireland points to a previously existing intercourse with Roman Britain, where very elaborate specimens of glass-work of this class are still occasionally discovered among other Roman remains; as, for example, the beautiful fibula, ornamented with a disc of glass mosaic, which was found recently at Caerleon, and is now preserved in the Museum there.

Miss Stokes gives, among the many admirable woodcuts which illustrate her volume, a drawing of the celebrated Tara brooch, now one of the chief treasures of the Dublin collection; its whole surface is enriched with delicate gold filagree work, and studded with gems and bosses of variegated glass, making it one of the most beautiful pieces of jewelry in the world. Another fibula of almost equal splendour was dug up some years ago on the site of the ancient battlefield of Largs in Ayrshire; in style of workmanship and date of execution it closely resembles the more celebrated Tara brooch. One curious Celtic custom, that of enshrining valuable MSS. in a richly ornamented metal casing, still survives among the Coptic Christians of Egypt; who use as one of the ornaments to be set on the altar on festivals, a silver box encasing some old copy of the Gospels or Liturgy. Even in design, though far inferior in beauty of workmanship, many of the Coptic silver cases for books closely resemble such Irish examples as those illustrated by Miss Stokes at pp. 93 and 95.

The last section of this very interesting volume is devoted to the early architecture of Ireland, beginning with the monastic stone beehive huts, which look like rude copies on a small scale of the great beehive treasuries of Mycenæ and Orchomenos. These early Irish monasteries consist of a group of small beehive huts, together with one or more almost equally small rectangular chapels, similar in construction to the stone dwelling chambers; the whole group is enclosed for purposes of defence within a surrounding precinct wall. This arrangement is one of special interest, as there are some reasons for thinking that a very similar plan for monasteries survived in Britain till nearly the time of the Norman Conquest. The existence of the great plan on vellum of the Benedictine Abbey of St. Gall in Switzerland, drawn during the reign of Charlemagne, has caused the general belief that the later arrangement was widely used as early as the ninth century; the St. Gall plan being in most points closely similar to the stereotyped Benedictine arrangement of post-Norman times. It appears, however, from various indications that the primitive Celtic plan in some cases survived in England till the arrival of the Normans introduced a new and more stately style of stone architecture. This appears to have been the case in the important Abbey of Abingdon, near Oxford, as is shown by the Abbey Chronicle printed among the Master of the Rolls Series (vol. ii. p. 272). This valuable Chronicle describes the plan "quomodo constructum est primo monasterium Abbendoniæ." Each of the monks had a little house and chapel; the separate houses were arranged round an open court, on one side of which was the main church, built after the early fashion, with an apse at both ends. This curious plan appears to give us the transitional link between the primitive Celtic arrangement of the scattered huts and the later Benedictine system of grouping the various monastic buildings round a cloister. The use of the two apses belongs to another period of transition, the oldest method being to have one apse only, not at the East, but at the West end; the reason being that the celebrant at first stood behind the altar, facing the people. Thus the apse was placed at the West in order that the priest might face East. The later custom was for the celebrant to stand between the altar and the people, with his back to the worshippers, and so during the period of transition from the one custom to the other it was not unusual to add a second (eastern) apse to churches which already had one at the west end, as was done, for example, at Canterbury and other English cathedrals. In some cases even a new church was built with both apses, as, indeed, is shown in the celebrated St. Gall plan. In this way the primitive Celtic type of monastery gains a new interest when we realize that it survived and influenced the architecture of this country long after the invasion of the Teutonic races had put an end to the distinctively Celtic arts. With regard to the curious round towers of Ireland, Miss Stokes has much that is interesting to say. By a minute comparison of the different styles of masonry and carving used in these buildings, she is able to arrive at a very satisfactory conclusion as to their date and the object with which they were built. By carefully tabulating a list of the existing examples the author arrives at the following conclusions:—"That the earliest of the round towers are not older than the ninth century, the latest dating probably from the twelfth century; that they were always built adjoining or near to a church, the commonest position being about twenty feet from the north-west angle of the church; and, lastly, that their original object was to provide a place of shelter and security during the invasion of the Scandinavian Northmen, who so often harassed the northern and eastern shores of Ireland, especially from the ninth to the eleventh centuries, within which period nearly all these towers appear to have been erected."

On the whole, Miss Stokes's work is a model handbook of its class; its only fault is that there is not a great deal more of it, and this we hope may be corrected in a future work, in which the author may not be so narrowly limited in point of space.

NOVELS.*

COUNTESS IRENE is a very romantic and sentimental story, with a very prosaic and practical moral. The story consists of a year's events in the life of a beautiful girl with the face of an angel, the soul of an artist, and the voice of a siren. The moral is, generally, that you should mind your own business, and particularly that you should have nothing whatever to do with Polish Jews. If Irene Nugent had not been touched by the woes of Olga Levinsky, and befriended that very commonplace adventuress in a variety of imprudent ways, she would not have gone near to causing her lover's death and her own. The lover in question, Herbert Harding by name, an Englishman in the Austrian military service, was nearly murdered by his defeated antagonist in a duel, and it may be remarked in passing that a more horrible duel was never described. That, however, is almost at the end of the book, and the vicissitudes of Olga Levinsky's worthless career occupy a large part of the three volumes. The life depicted is chiefly Viennese, the Emperor and Empress of Austria appearing with at least sufficient frequency. We have also, however, a fair proportion of low life, such as that of the couple with whom Olga lodges, and a very revolting study it is. Scarcely, indeed, since the publication of that French book about Berlin, wherein the author veraciously observes that any female inhabitant of that city would sell herself for a plate of roast goose, has there been printed anything quite so nauseous as the account of Frau Denk and her husband. A single quotation will, perhaps, suffice to justify this remark. Frau Denk, who believed herself to have good grounds for being jealous of her lord, found him waiting outside the door of their house, which he could not enter until she returned. She "unlocked the door and changed the key in the lock to the inside." She then turned suddenly and fastened her talons like a tigress in his face, tearing it deeply from forehead to chin, and before he could recover from the shock she closed and locked the door, leaving the wounded and bleeding man to his own pleasant reflections in the [illegible]eet." It is only fair to say that the rest of the book is very different from those chapters which deal with the Denks and their affairs, and to add that any one interested in the social life of Vienna will gather plenty of interesting information to compensate for much sordid detail. The family life of the Nugents, on the other hand, is drawn with admirable delicacy of touch, and Irene's friend, the intellectual and sagacious, if not very lively, Irma von Thurn, is as wholesome and natura[illegible] a character as almost any living novelist could draw. The wayward Irene, with her [illegible] for singing in public, and her irresistible impulse to arran[illegible]r people's lives for them wil[illegible] chiefly, perhaps only, attr[illegible] musical and æsthetic reader. She is, however, well worth [illegible]out, which is more than can be said of most modern [illegible] and her conquest of the old Baron Lindheim at Gmunden is told with exquisite grace. Grace is, indeed, the chief merit of Countess Irene, and distinguishes all those pages [illegible]t which are agreeable to read. The sketches of scenery are done with a light, firm [illegible]d which seems equally at home on the Danube and on the Shannon. For the author contrives to bring into his otherwise exclusively German drama some few episodes from the Irish [illegible]s and prospects of 1870, the year of the story. In the bac[illegible] [illegible]ooms the war between France and Prussia, in which Au[illegible] Hungary was, of course, neutral, but in which she migh[illegible] [illegible]ance [illegible] proved even temporarily successful, easily have become involved. For the truly wonderful part played by Mendelssohn's "Slumber Song," for the hairbreadth escape of Count Nugent in his voyage down the Danube, for th[illegible] circumstances which led Captain Harding innocently to in[illegible]ur the vengeance of Olga Levinsky's disappointed suitor, the book itself must be consult[illegible]. Were not the sex of the author proclaimed by him[illegible] to [illegible], we should unhesitatingly [illegible]e set down C[illegible]ntess Ire[illegible] [illegible]th work of a lady. Short of genius, and perhaps humour, it contains all the good qualities of a novel. There is a curiously foreign flavour in the style of the conversations; but that i[illegible] not inappropriate to the atmosphe[illegible] and surroundin[illegible].

Mr[illegible] Oliph[illegible]'s latest book [illegible]ther a particularly pleasant nor a particularly intere[illegible] [illegible]e second son himself is a poor creature, understood to be highly intellectual, but never saying or doing any[illegible]g to prove it, or even to disprove it, which would in the circumstances be a relief. Of his two brothers, the eldest is a semi-romantic nincompoop, with whom Mrs. Oliphant herself gets so bored that she kills him in a highly improbable man[illegible], while the youngest is an irreclaimable brute, one of a class with which judges and magistrates must deal, but which authors of Mrs. Oliphant's stamp might, with advantage to themselves and their readers, neglect. There is no redeeming feature in Stephen Mitford's character. He is merely a bestial savage, whose proper place is the criminal dock, and not the drawing-room table. Balzac drew men as bad as Stephen, perhaps worse. But there is some mental excitement in unravelling the skeins of their wickedness, whereas Stephen is simply the sort of person for whose benefit the Legislature sanctioned the punishment of flogging. The Squire himself is really not very much better, and it is to be hoped that no foreigner will take the family life of Melcombe as a typical picture. The excessive and monotonous rudeness which prevails between Mr. Mitford and his sons is certainly not characteristic of an age with plenty of faults of its own, nor is rural society quite so uncouth as Mrs. Oliphant seems to suppose. Lily Ford, the gamekeeper's daughter, who turned the heads of two Mitfords, and cost the life of one, never emerges from the chrysalis stage in which we first find her, and Mrs. Oliphant evidently did not think her worth the trouble of bringing out. The same remark applies even more strongly to Nina Mitford, who as a little girl is one of the cleverest, if also the most odious, among Mrs. Oliphant's minor creations. Her creator simply grows tired of her, and drops her without scruple so soon as she has played her not very important part in playing the spy upon her brother. The plot is of the most ultra-conventional type, turning, as it does, upon an elopement, a question of identity, an escape of imperilled innocence, and the alteration of a will. Edmund Mitford's marriage is brought about by causes which would in actual life barely justify a morning call, and when Miss Travers has qualms about having "thrown herself at his head," we cannot say that they are baseless. It is a pity that Mrs. Oliphant, who can write English with polished ease and finish, should fall into the trick of using a French word when it is not wanted. Such phrases as "the sourd, mysterious something which stood between him and Elizabeth," "a sourd mixture of anger and alarm and satisfaction," "a sourd antagonism," show a somewhat limited command both of French and English. One of Mr. Mitford's peculiarities was so disagreeable that it might have been less often described. We refer to the "foam" which "flew from his mouth" on the very numerous occasions when he was in a rage. This may have been what Falstaff meant when he said, "Call me horse." But equine propensities in the human race had better be left to physiologists. When all is said and done, however, The Second Son is a clever book.

The answer to the question which Mrs. Harcourt-Roe has chosen for her title is not difficult. Elma Tremaine's husband does not die till the end [illegible] the book, and although she married Percival Murray in the belief that George Brownrigg was dead, that piece of inadvertence [illegible] her part could not, of course, get rid of George as a "hard fact." [illegible] story turns upon what the virtuous but unlucky Elma [illegible] to do when she discovers that [illegible] not Mr. Murray's wife. [illegible] however, there [illegible] of the almost incredible [illegible] with [illegible] unwelcome attention [illegible] Murray, the sympath[illegible] -hearted reader in her subsequent and cons[illegible] a good deal diminished. She w[illegible] sixteen when she came from New Zealand in the same ship with Mr. Brownrigg, and she had plenty of money, which, we are told, she could [illegible] "touch" till she was eighteen. How she could "touch" it then, not being of age, Mrs. Harcourt-Roe does not explain. Mr. Brownrigg wanted the money, [illegible] being some time disliked and despised, suddenly found himself its [illegible] along with the hand of its mistress. Of Mr Brownrigg['s] [illegible] a single specimen may suffice. When Percival [illegible] from the antipodes, and met Elma, her husband [illegible] with him, young lady, remember [illegible], for [illegible] The Brownriggs speedily quarrelled, [illegible] Mr. B. threw [illegible] other. This degradation was more than the cultivated [illegible] could bear, and she retorted, with proud intelligence, "[illegible] least care for political economists, [illegible] on [illegible] would never do a kind action." After [illegible] Mr. Brownrigg left her and son [illegible] society of Utah that [illegible] which the tippl[illegible] ignoran[illegible] ever afford. Some [illegible] was dead, and made up [illegible]. The circumstances of [illegible] Brownrigg's supposed [illegible] communicated to her, in a singularly businesslike [illegible] Major Poole, a famous traveller [illegible] Elma bore it calmly, a[illegible] as perhaps natural [illegible] but, by way of [illegible] hypothesis, took it into her head that the worthy George had been buried alive. She consulted the Major on this point, who hastened to reassure her [illegible] saying "He was [illegible] as dead as a door-nail." "He felt this comparison," [illegible] are informed, "to be irreverent, but made it simply from the fact that he knew of no other to express an equal a[illegible] After marrying, or doing her best to mar[illegible] me a mother. It was a boy, and the [illegible] passionate outcry. "I thought no ma[illegible] exclaimed; "but if I lost this little chap, [illegible] grief to me." Could paternal love go further? [illegible] need not pursue the narrative of Mrs. Brownrigg's trials when George turns up, as odious as ever and just as much in want of money. He is a violent ruffian, but a good deal more lifelike than John Newcastle, the famous author, or his uncomfortable, mysterious wife, with a concealed title. Mrs. Harcourt-Roe's pages may amuse an idle hour, and she is sometimes most amusing when she means to be most serious. But she describes herself in speaking of some imaginary personage as "simply a manufacturer of something to read, not a living writer."

HISTORY OF THE MEXICAN PEOPLE.*

MEXICAN history after the completion of the Spanish conquest is not a particularly attractive subject, and, though Mr. Bancroft in this abridgment of his exhaustive work upon it has treated it with clearness and, along with some slovenliness of expression, with a certain degree of vigour, his book as a whole lacks interest. The description of Aztec civilization and the narrative of the conquest by Cortés are the pleasantest parts of his volume. Nearly three centuries of viceregal rule are passed over very briefly, though full accounts are given of two or three of the few striking events that occurred during the long period of Spanish domination. We are told, for example, how Vera Cruz was sacked by filibusters, how again and again the crops were destroyed by floods, and how one famine led to a serious bread-riot in the capital; but the rule of the viceroys was marked by little save a gradual decline in the character of the European population. For the most part none but Castilians by birth were appointed to any of the higher offices in the Church, the State, or the army, and a feeling of bitterness sprang up between them and the Creoles of much the same kind as that which existed in Ireland between the English by birth and the English by blood. In both countries alike the resident families of the conquering race sank to a lower level of civilization. In Ireland, however, the English by blood became at least as turbulent as their Celtic neighbours, while in Mexico "the three centuries of colonial rule were marked by a monotony so dead, a society so stagnant, as almost to bring about a lapse into barbarism of the Europeans here vegetating." After pointing out the main causes which alienated the Mexicans from Spain, Mr. Bancroft relates at considerable length the early struggle for independence under the leadership of Hidalgo, the curate of Dolores. Brave and single-hearted as Hidalgo was, he had neither military skill nor political ability, and though his successor Morelos, who was also a priest, was a man of far greater genius, the war, which was conducted on both sides with great ferocity, ended in the total overthrow of the insurgents. Mexican independence was the fruit of the revolutionary movements in Spain in 1820. The nation seems to have acquired its new political position before it had learnt how to make a good use of it. The fairly bright chapters on the revolution are followed by a dreary record of the intrigues of a number of second-rate adventurers, of constant changes in the constitution, and of a succession of obscure and ignoble struggles. The discipline that the nation needed was to some extent supplied by the efforts it made to repel foreign interference. Nevertheless, until within the last ten years the Republic has constantly been disturbed by tumults and sometimes even by civil war. The triumphant vindication of Mexican independence unfortunately involved the execution of the Emperor Maximilian. As this well-meaning and feeble foreigner endeavoured with the help of a foreign army to overthrow the Republic, and compel the Mexicans to acknowledge his sovereignty, they can scarcely be held responsible for his death; it lies at the door of the French Emperor, who used him to serve his own ends, and deserted him in his time of need. The narrative is brought down to the second administration of the President Diaz, which began in 1884. The character and work of this able and unselfish statesman are described in glowing terms; his two administrations form, we are told, "what may truthfully be called the Golden Age of Mexico." Mr. Bancroft's bulky volume contains a good deal of information about the social life and progress of the country, and is furnished with a large number of maps, plans, portraits, and other illustrations.

INCWADI YAMI.*

DR. MATTHEWS has had a long and varied experience of South Africa, and in this volume he gives his readers a somewhat long and varied selection from the leaves of his diary. Had he discarded his diary altogether, and consolidated his experiences, he would, in our opinion, have produced a better book. As it is, some useful and interesting information is hidden in a great deal of matter to which these epithets cannot be applied. We may also take exception to his mysterious title of "Incwadi Yami," which does not convey any clear idea to the minds of the uninitiated. Dr. Matthews began his South African career as a district surgeon in Natal, and in course of time found his way to the Diamond Fields, where he became Vice-President of the Legislative Council, and subsequently, on the annexation of the province to the Cape Colony, the senior member for Kimberley. By far the most interesting part of his book is that which deals with the development of the great diamond-digging industry, and the schemes and artifices of that rascally fraternity the I. D. B., or illicit diamond buyers. The whole story is melancholy, and to the believer in human nature most depressing. There is a saying that five years in South Africa is sufficient to corrupt the most immaculate, and that a man who has lived there for seven should not be believed upon his oath. Dr. Matthews's revelations certainly give colour to what we still hope is a slander. According to his account, the larger part of the community of Kimberley was, and to some extent is still, mixed up in this nefarious traffic. The temptation of obtaining diamonds at a fraction of their value seems to be altogether too much for poor human nature, and is indulged even by persons in official positions, and, to all appearance, of the solemnest respectability. Legislative enactments of the most stringent severity have again and again proved powerless to check the evil, and even when the delinquent has been caught and sentenced, he has, it seems, more than once been set free to resume his career of fraud, by means that will not bear examination. In other words, his profits being large, he has been able to spend some portion of them in buying a reprieve. "There is," says Dr. Matthews, quoting from a local newspaper, "something terribly revolting about the extent of crime arising out of the I. D. B. calling in all its ramifications. Inducing servants to steal, murder, perjury, receiving stolen goods, white women prostituting themselves to Kafirs for payment in diamonds, little boys employed by mining Companies taught to steal and supplied with false pockets in which to conceal the gems, bribes attempted on officers of law, and a thousand other crimes are practised and gloried in by gangs of ruffians whom the law seldom reaches."

It is, however, time to explain the method of this fraternity of thieves. Diamonds, as most people will be aware, are sorted out of the diamondiferous stuff by native "hands." Some of these hands are probably in the pay of the fraternity, or, to be more accurate, are humble members of it. A fine stone is turned up by one of them when nobody is looking. He seizes it, hides it in his hair, in his mouth, or in some other portion of his person. Or if a goat lie handy he twists it in his wool and tends the animal affectionately till an opportunity occurs of redeeming the stone. Or perchance he conceals it behind a rock, or forces it down the throat of a dog, or, Homeric device, he swallows it himself. The gem being restored to the light of day from its hiding-place, whatever it may have been—and many a diamond now sparkling on a lady's neck has made acquaintance with the stomach of a Kafir—the dusky thief in due course puts himself in communication with another native of a superior class. This man is a tout in the pay of a low white man; a "Mean White," as he is called in the Colonies. The tout buys the stone for, let us say, a hundredth part of its value, and the thief spends the money on the vile drink which it is the peculiar pride of civilization to supply to the unsophisticated savage, and, so far as he is concerned, there is an end of the transaction. Then the tout carries the stone to the Mean White, and receives from him a sum of money, perhaps double what he has given to the actual thief. The Mean White in his turn takes it to the licensed buyer of diamonds, who is possibly a person of glaring and even aggressive respectability—a churchwarden or member of the municipality, or at the least a merchant of good antecedents—and from him receives, perhaps, a tenth part of the worth of the gem. So far so good; but still there are slips between the cup and the lip, and it is sometimes found difficult to convey the stuff out of the country to the final receiver in London. To this end many artifices are resorted to. We have heard of innocent-looking fowling-pieces, which on examination have been found to be loaded with diamonds to within an inch of the muzzle; while such repositories as novels with holes cut in the leaves, the quills of ostrich feathers, and boots with hollow heels are not uncommon. Often the fair sex are found to be useful auxiliaries in these adventures, for there is a peculiar sacredness about a lady's underclothing that appeals to the mind of the Customs officer. The man would be bold who merely ventured on her back hair. However this may be, by far the greater number of stones so procured arrive safely in Europe. Most people will naturally think that the native rascal who takes the stone is responsible for this state of things, but it is not the case. The native, as is well known, and as Dr. Matthews is careful to explain, never dreamed of stealing diamonds until he was taught to thieve by the white receiver of stolen goods, and after his simple virtue had been debauched by "Cape smoke." More especially is this true of natives of the Zulu race, amongst whom, when they are as yet uncontaminated by civilization, honesty is not only a policy, but a universal practice.

Dr. Matthews tells some interesting tales of the I.D.B. fraternity. In the dead of a certain night in the year 1872 he was roused from sleep and confronted by a trembling and middle-aged citizen of the Fields, who informed him that he had swallowed a thirty-carat diamond and two sovereigns—just to show his friends how the scoundrels did it, and was now anxious to be rid of these foreign substances, which had presumably begun to disagree. Ultimately they were recovered, and the happy citizen departed with the diamond, leaving the gold in payment. Of course this man had disposed of the diamond under imminent fear of detection; but why he took the two sovereigns, not knowing we cannot say—unless it was to get his hand in. Some people, by the way, appear to be able to swallow very large stones, for so lately as last year, a native dying under suspicious circumstances, his body was opened, and a sixty-carat stone found in his stomach. Here is another tale. A white gentleman lived with a pretty Fingo woman, who also acted as his agent in the "trade." He fell ill of fever, and for weeks lay in a state of delirium, between life and death. She nursed him tenderly through it all, and, what is more, kept up his connexion with the "boys"; so that, when he came to himself, she was enabled to present him with hundreds of carats of fine stones. And now mark the sequel! No sooner was he strong enough than he departed to Europe, taking every gem and farthing that she had collected with him, and leaving the unfortunate girl to starve on the streets. On a certain occasion Dr. Matthews was called in to attend a dying digger who had once worked a claim for him. These were the words that greeted him when he told the man that there was no hope:—"I shan't, I can't, I won't die without telling you how when I worked your and Mr. Lynch's claim in No. 6 I robbed you of nearly all your diamonds."

In the face of stories such as these and of a mass of other evidence, it is sometimes difficult not to believe that civilization is a failure, and that the educated Christian man, except under very exceptional circumstances, and when restrained by the strictest pressure of law, is a lower animal at heart than the savage he despises and destroys with drink and rifle bullets.

Dr. Matthews made a journey to the battlefields near Newcastle, in Natal, shortly after the Majuba surrender. In Newcastle itself he attended a grand concert, at which the band of the 97th Regiment performed. Presently a gentleman began to sing a song of a soul-stirring and patriotic nature. Thereon the gods broke out, and drove him from the stage. "Loop!" (run) they cried, "Verdomte Englishman." "Go and fight the Boers!" "Why did you run?" It must have been a pleasing and instructive scene. Dr. Matthews also had an interview in 1886 with Piet Joubert, the Boer general, which, if it does not actually throw new light on the Majuba disaster, goes far towards confirming accounts that have hitherto been received with doubt in this country. Here is an extract from their conversation:—

"But tell me, General," I said, "were the English fully aware that the Boers were really coming up the mountain to attack them?"

"Yes, of course they were. They knew it for eight hours, as it was five o'clock in the morning when they fired the first two shots, and it was one o'clock when we got to the top."

"Then it was not, as it is alleged, a sudden attack in force which gained the day?"

The General smiled at my question. "How could it be when heavy firing was going on all the morning up to the very last moment."

"When the top was gained by the Boers what took place next?"

"There was no resistance; all was over in a minute or two."

"But tell me, General, how do you account for the fact that 500 English should run before 60 Boers who had just had an eight hours' climb up the mountain?"

"I don't wish to give any opinion," said the General, looking serious indeed; "but I am certain the hand of God was with us all through."

Piet Joubert also favoured Dr. Matthews with an account of his subsequent interview with Sir Evelyn Wood, for which we must refer the curious to his book. For our part we take the liberty to doubt its entire accuracy. We cannot more fitly conclude these remarks, and especially our allusions to Dr. Matthews's comments on the Boer war, than by quoting a notice (with which many of our readers are doubtless familiar) which he found posted in an inn at Ladysmith, and which seems to us to sum up the whole matter with some truth:—

MEDICAL BOOKS.*

It is a great pity that Dr. Parkin's work has been posthumously published; for, although not unmindful of the adage nil nisi bonum, it is impossible to criticize it favourably, if indeed seriously. This is the more to be regretted since it bears evidence that the author was a man of pains and learning, and must have spent no little time and thought in fabricating his theory. Starting from the dictum of Hippocrates—"Aer est omnium rex morborumque causa"—the author strives to demonstrate that the cause of all epidemics, whether cholera, measles, small-pox, or the black plague, is some altogether indefinite pollution of the atmosphere due to subterranean exhalations. Hippocrates was nearly right, in so far as the air is undoubtedly one vehicle which commonly conveys contagious spores. Dr. Parkin is altogether wrong in saying (p. 142), "These conclusions granted, there is an end of the contagious origin of diseases." And when we are gravely told that epidemic diseases may be shut out of a house by closing the doors and windows, we are tempted to ask how long persons thus hermetically sealed could survive the want of fresh oxygen. For, if the apertures were not hermetically sealed, the exclusion of the contaminated outside air could be only partial, and therefore ineffectual, more especially so if, as the author maintains, the morbific principle be of a gaseous nature. We think it only right to protest against such pernicious advice. No allusion is made in the work to the discoveries of bacteriology in the past few years, and we can only charitably suppose that the work was written, and has not been revised, since Koch, Pasteur, Lister, and others first demonstrated the pathogenic powers of micro-organisms. That certain conditions of the atmosphere are more favourable to the rapid development of pathogenic organisms than are other conditions, seems very probable; but that is a very different thing from Dr. Parkin's theory that all epidemic diseases are caused by some poisonous gas—the chemical composition of which he does not attempt to formulate—which emanates from the ground, owing to volcanic action. The attempt to prove this wild theory is painfully illogical, and is little likely to be heard of again.

Dr. Woakes's book is obviously that of a man who has paid special attention to the interdependent train of maladies which constitute its title, who has observed keenly, and reasoned out his theory in the true spirit of philosophical inquiry. The demonstration of the causal relationships of these maladies to ethmoiditis forms, indeed, the principal part of the book; and to this end the author has brought forward a mass of proof—physiological, pathological, and clinical—which entitles his views to the highest respect. We think that in a future edition the value of the work might be enhanced by more copious reference to the predisposing and exciting causes of ethmoiditis, which appears from this work to be the root-stock of a pathological tree which has many branches. Dr. Woakes has traced those branches most carefully to the parent stock, and has thrown new light upon many points hitherto vague and undetermined. He writes lucidly as well as forcibly, although here and there the style is needlessly turgid; as, for example, at page 31, where we read, "Or if a female, a hysterically constituted individual, unequal to the adequate discharge of the ordinary duties of life, and still less capable of rising to the higher walks of intellectual labour, or of successfully confronting the exigencies of physical enterprise." But this can be readily forgiven in a work which possesses such solid and valuable qualities as render it a distinct acquisition to medical science.

It is no easy task to simplify the language of science so that it shall be comprehended by unscientifically trained minds; and after the attempt has been made, it is equally difficult to get the public to take an interest in such a book at all. Most people are quite self-satisfied with the generally grotesque smattering of medical lore which they have imagined for themselves, or picked up at random from other sources, legitimate or otherwise, and they see no necessity for such commonplace advice as the little book before us contains. Nevertheless, those who do read it will gain no small amount of valuable information, conveyed in common-sense, if homely, language. The author very distinctly repudiates any attempt to teach the rudiments of medical science, but wisely confines himself to telling people what they ought not to do, in certain contingencies, and what simple measures they ought to take, pending the arrival of the responsible medical adviser. The chapter on Patent Medicines is a timely warning to those heartless amateurs who are so much addicted to trying experiments upon their own helpless offspring; and the writer notes with quite justifiable cynicism, the non-survival, and therefore elimination, of the many silly adult dupes who undertake their own diagnosis and treatment. The paltry revenue derived by Government from the sale of stamps upon patent nostrums is denounced, as it deserves to be, in no measured terms. Not a few imperfections of style may be noted in the work, but the motive is altogether honest and good.

The preface to these essays informs us that the author has "confined himself mainly to the medical aspects of the subjects discussed." With all due deference we submit that this very proper resolution is not very apparent in the following passages, p. 10:—"In some cases they (i.e. diseases) appear to have occurred as ordinary calamities. . . . In some they were inflicted simply as signs, as in the case of the leprosy of Moses, and were of temporary duration. In others they were evidently brought about by direct Divine intervention, as a punishment for sin, &c. &c." There is surely less of science than of theological dogma in such observations as these; and the prevailing animus of the work is even more apparent in the following astounding passage, pp. 21 and 22:—"There is little difficulty, therefore, in understanding what may be meant by leprosy in the house or raiment . . . . Some Jewish writers maintain that the marks of house leprosy correspond exactly in appearance with those of the person," &c. Although the author adds that "no appearances on inanimate objects can be said to indicate either leprosy or any other malady," he thus apologetically glides over the plain fact that the compiler of Leviticus enunciated the preposterous dictum that inanimate objects might be attacked by leprosy as well as man. Much space is occupied in quoting ancient writers upon the subject of leprosy, and the chaos that has arisen from confounding λέπρα and elephantiasis is duly recognized; and yet at p. 49 we find it very difficult to determine whether the author himself applies the latter term to "true leprosy" or not. As a matter of fact, the direst confusion existed from the earliest times, and even now exists, regarding the differentiation and nomenclature of skin manifestations, and we quite fail to see what good end can be served in trying to elucidate the paradoxical descriptions of Biblical leprosy and other cutaneous disorders. Certainly the writer has shown nothing more than that the compilers of both the Old and New Testaments were hopelessly bewildered in their attempts to classify these diseases. The writer passes on to discuss the diagnosis of the various "plagues" which are evidenced as vessels of divine wrath, and to identify them more or less with well-known modern plagues. Surely this is quite irrelevant from a scientific point of view. Then, as now, such epidemics appear to have slain the good and the bad indiscriminately; yet we are left to infer (p. 11) that the priest could avert the impending doom, while the physician was powerless.

DICTIONARY OF CHRISTIAN BIOGRAPHY AND LITERATURE.*

THIS noble collection of biographies and treatises ought properly to be reviewed, as it has been compiled, by distribution amongst specialists. Many of its articles, if they were printed in a larger type, would make volumes of a considerable size and provide the critic with plenty of hard work. The fly-leaf inserted by the publishers is intended, we presume, to call the special notice of reviewers as well as readers to some thirty of the chief articles. The list includes several which are sure to command attention by the proved capacity of their writers as experts, such as the wonderfully elaborate monograph upon "Origines," by Canon Westcott; the helpful elucidation by Professor Salmon of "The Teaching of the Apostles," and his essays upon "Simon Magus" and the "Ophites"; the valuable doctrinal essays of Professor Stokes; the consummate study of "Synesius" by the late Mr. Halcomb; the thorough handling of early Christian poets by the Rev. W. Lock, not only under the general heading of "Verse Writers," but in his painstaking analytical biographies of Prudentius and Sedulius. "Prosper of Aquitaine," "Sidonius Apollinaris," and "Paulinus of Nola" are treated with subtle critical skill and much detail by Canon Phillott. Orientius, to whose "Commonitorium" Adolf Ebert has given considerable space in the first volume of his Geschichte der christlich-lateinischen Literatur—which covers the same period as the present Dictionary—is dismissed by Mr. H. A. Wilson with less than a column, who, however, refers to Ebert as one of his authorities. Amongst other contributions of the first order, mention ought to be made of the exhaustive critical essays by the learned explorer of the sources of the Roman Petrus-Sage, Professor R. A. Lipsius—"Pistis Sophia," "Sophia" (Achamoth), "Thaddæus," and the dissertation on the Gnostic "Valentinus." It is scarcely agreeable, however, to the grateful student of so helpful a library to continue naming its particular treatises, when he is obliged to leave so much fine and accurate work unnamed. There are no fewer than a hundred and twelve articles under the heading of "Theodorus." One of these, Professor Swete's "Theodorus of Mopsuestia," is really a book; while such articles as the Bishop of Chester's "Theodorus of Tarsus" and Canon Raine's "Wilfrid" make us regret the arbitrary chronological boundary at which the writers are obliged to cease. When shall we have equally capable hands to continue early English "Christian Biography," at least as far as the Norman Conquest? The inconveniences of this chronological barrier confront us again and again in the Continental and Eastern biographies. It is particularly awkward in the history of important local churches and the successions of bishops in a See. The series of prelates named Nerses, beginning with Nerses I., or the Great, who had so powerful an influence over Armenian Christendom, may be taken as an example. Professor Stokes gives an account of "Norseses I.," and of the comparatively insignificant "Norseses II." and "Norseses III."; but the chronological warning-post stops him from entering into the much more important biographies of Nerses IV. and of Nerses of Lambron. Hence the inquirer will often be obliged, here as elsewhere, to put the Dictionary aside, and turn to Herzog or to Wetzer and Welte. The official title of the great Armenian prelates, by the way, is not uniformly given. In some places it is Latinized as "Catholicus," in others it is half Greek and half Latin, as "Catholicos." "Katholicos" and "Catholicus" are equally good; but the other forms are mongrel. The abrupt chronological break is nowhere more provoking than in Mr. Barmby's excellent notices of the Bishops of Rome, which are brought to a sudden stop with "Stephanus IV." or III. Some Popes, of whom there is little to tell, such as "Urbanus I.," have been allowed a needlessly large space. Mr. Barmby has most carefully orientated the dates by the use of the Chronologie der römischen Bischöfe of Professor Lipsius; yet he does not seem to have availed himself of the latest and most scientific authority on early Papal history, the Geschichte der römischen Kirche bis zum Pontificat Leo's I., by one of the ablest of the Old Catholic theologians, Professor Joseph Langen, of Bonn, although the first volume, reaching to Xystus III., was published seven years ago. In his account of "Zephyrinus," the first Roman bishop of whom we have a contemporary portraiture, he substantially but independently follows Döllinger. He omits the remarkable fact that the three greatest theologians of the age—not only Hippolytus but Origen and Tertullian also—were making common cause against the Roman chair, and that each was successively condemned by it. Quintianum, the see of "Zoticus," one of the prelates who took part in the Roman synod of 313, is Kintzen, in Rhætia. The articles by writers of an exclusively Anglican learning occasionally need amplification or revision. This is the case with the long essay on "Patron Saints and Angels" by the late W. E. Scudamore. It deals too exclusively with the general cultus of the saints. Mr. Scudamore deplored that he was not acquainted with any book treating especially of patron saints; but so old a work as Heinrich Alt's Die Heiligenbilder would have supplied him richly with what he needed. The article has no reference to the characteristic place which nationality and patriotism held in the canonizations amongst newly-converted peoples, both in the East and West, which was one of the signs of the naturalness of the union between the Church and the nations.

That abundant storehouse of sixth-century biography, The History of the Franks, by Bishop Gregory of Tours, has been sedulously explored by a group of the contributors, particularly by the Rev. C. Hole, Mr. S. A. Bennett, and Dr. Gammack. We have found so many names of slight historical importance to be scrupulously recorded, that we were led to expect we should find in the Dictionary a reference to almost everybody whom Gregory has introduced. It is hard to see on what grounds some persons equally important and others more important have been excluded. Under "Nicasius" Mr. Hole gives the names of three bishops, all anterior to the fifth century, but he omits a fourth—Nicasius, Bishop of Angoulême. Nanthin of Angoulême appears amongst the Counts, but Ollo of Bourges is absent. There are four entries under "Parthenius"; a fifth should, at least, have been added—Parthenius, Bishop of Javols or Gabalitana urbs (Mende), to whose predecessor, "Privatus," Dr. Gammack has given an article. Gregory has drawn a lively sketch of a sixth Parthenius, the brutal favourite of Theodebert. The Bishops Pientius of Poitiers and Pientius of Aix are both absent; so is Regalis, the diplomatic Bishop of Vannes, who sent out a procession of clergy with cross and choral-song to meet the invading army of King Gunthramm under Duke Ebrachar. The Frankish chief physician, Reovalis, who gave evidence in the monastic scandal at Poitiers, deserved a notice. He was a sort of link between the old civilization of the Christian East and the new civilization of the Christian West. He had studied and practised medicine at the Imperial Court of the Cæsars in Constantinople, and brought the science and manners of the East to the rude Court of Chilperich. Mr. Bennett gives only one "Riculfus," the third Archbishop of Mainz. He omits the two wicked Riculfs of Tours, the enemies of Gregory, one of whom was a sub-deacon, the other a priest of the Church of Tours. To the latter, whom Gregory describes as worse than Simon Magus, Count Leudast of Tours had promised the bishopric. He lived in the Church House—the episcopal palace—and while Gregory was absent with the King he acted exactly as if he were the bishop, giving away the landed property of the Church and administering chastisement to the clergy with his own hand. Gregory's account of his rival is not likely to be impartial. Riculf was a native of Tours, the son of poor parents, and hated the Bishop and historian as an Auvergnat. No place is found for Stremonius, Bishop of Arverna, the old capital of the Auvergne (Clermont), one of the seven bishops said to have been sent into Gaul as apostles in the reign of Decius, all of whom were the first bishops of their sees, and became martyrs. Stremonius, as the apostle of his native place, was the most attractive of the seven to the historian. Mr. Bennett deals in this volume with two out of the seven, "Saturninus of Toulouse" and "Trophimus of Arles," and Dr. Gammack has a notice of a third, "Paulus of Narbonne." St. Sunniulf, the abbot of Randans in the Auvergne, one of Gregory's ascetic heroes, is also absent; so is the priest Transobad, of Rhodez; so is Virus, the Roman Senator, who succeeded Evantius as bishop of Vienne in the famous year of episcopal mortality, 586. Teutar, King Segebert's arch-chancellor—the venerable man is frequently employed as a diplomatist after his ordination—is missing. This catalogue of omissions, we ought to add, is very far from being exhaustive.

The literary advocates of women's rights may possibly complain that the Dictionary is defective for lack of some representative of their sex among the contributors. Only a few of the Frankish ladies who figure in Gregory's history have been allowed a place in the Dictionary. "Radegundis" is introduced by Mr. Bennett; but no scholar has had the gallantry to insist upon room for Placidina, the sister of Apollinaris; for Tranquilla, the wife of Sichar of Tours; nor for Veneranda, whose relations to the Christian monarch make us wonder when Gregory describes him as "the good King Gunthramm"; nor for Septimina, the teacher of the children of Childebert II., whose tragical story throws a strange light on contemporary Christian morals and manners; nor for Tetradia, whose matrimonial adventures were the cause of a synod; nor for Rigunthis, the daughter of Chilperich and Fredegunda, whose name occurs so frequently, and whom Gregory calls "the Queen," a title which he often gives to king's daughters. Amongst other excluded women may be named Vuldetrada, wife of Theodobald, and Wisigardis, wife of Theodebert, the two daughters of the Lombard King Wacho. Vultrogotha, the pious wife of Childebert I., surely deserved a notice. She is mentioned in one of the canons of the Fifth Council of Orleans as co-foundress of the Hospital for Lepers at Lyons. Under the heading "Ursicinus (4)," her chaplain and chancellor, the Bishop of Cahors, is introduced by Mr. Bennett. Gregory states that this prelate's acquaintance with Holy Scripture was so extraordinary that he could even say all the genealogies by heart. Sedeleuba, the devout church-builder, the sister of Clotilda and benefactress of Geneva, has no place.

Great pains have been taken with the articles on Welsh saints, although some omissions were inevitable. "Tudwal," says Dr. Gammack, "is called a bishop, but no see is mentioned." His see was the ancient Lexobia or Lexovium (Lisieux) in Gallia Armorica. The episcopal chair was afterwards moved to Treguier. He was one of the Britons who fled before the English invaders. The name of his successor, St. Ruellin, is absent from the Dictionary; he is mentioned as present at the successive Councils of Orange in the sixth century. Early apocryphal literature, by reason of its recognized historical value, naturally occupies a large space, and the products of the latest scholarship have been so conscientiously explored as to give the Dictionary a singular completeness in this direction. Dr. Gwynn's article on "Thecla (1)" is an admirable specimen. The sixteen other entries under this name are also from his exact pen. We could wish that he had taken in hand the Acts of St. Timothy. About ten years ago H. Usener published a critical text of the Greek original and of the old Latin translation. It was ascribed by the Latins in the middle ages to Polycrates, the famous Bishop of Ephesus; but there is no allusion to it in Dr. Salmon's article "Polycrates (1)." Professor Langen, in a contribution to the Bonn Theologisches Literaturblatt, declares it to be of much greater importance to Church history than has hitherto been supposed. We are surprised at the omission of a man of such lasting popularity as Sturm, the disciple of St. Boniface, the first Abbot of Fulda, and "the Apostle of Saxony." There are nine entries under "Ursus"; but the popular Swiss St. Ursus, Knight of the Theban Legion and co-patron of Solothurn, does not appear amongst them. Notwithstanding the indefatigable research which is exhibited under such headings as "Paulus," with its 114 articles, or "Petrus," with its 83, or "Victor," with its 54, a crowd of bishops, priests, deacons, and lay folk of both sexes, eminent and influential in their time, have been left out in the cold. We cannot expect the Dictionary to record every name anterior to the ninth century in such huge collections as Pertz or the Bollandists. Yet many gaps might have been filled if a few unpretending assistants had been employed to overhaul books so easy to obtain as the earlier volumes of Neander, of Hefele, or even of Fleury. But the Dictionary, as it stands, is a truly noble monument of the best contemporary English scholarship, in which the two absolutely necessary elements of the perfect historical temper—the conservative and the critical—too often opposed as contraries, are happily blended. Mr. A. W. W. Dale's book on the Synod of Elvira gave an early indication of his capacity in the field of ecclesiastical research, and we are glad to see from his masterly treatment of the "Origenistic Controversies" that he continues to work so profitably on the same soil.

HEARTSEASE AND RUE *

IN the postscript to "An Epistle to George William Curtis," not one of the least pleasing poems in Mr. Lowell's new volume, there is an interesting touch of autobiography—a description of the poet's feeling in resuming his too long forsaken art:—

Little I ask of Fate—will she refuse
Some day of reconcilement with the Muse?
I take my reed again and blow it free
Of dusty silence, murmuring "Sing to me!"
And, as its stops my curious touch retries
The stir of earlier instincts I surprise—
Instincts if less imperious yet more strong
And happy in the toil that ends with song.

Too many a bard we fear, especially if able to say with Mr. Lowell, "Past my next milestone waits my seventieth year," has found these poetic rejuvenations somewhat delusive. The stir is felt perhaps in their own bosoms, but it fails to reach those of their readers. The author of Heartsease and Rue, however, is in no such case. Not only are the "earlier instincts" with him in possession of their full vitality, but the voice which they have again awakened has not only not lost, but has actually gained in power. It is a veritable Indian summer of Mr. Lowell's muse. There are pieces in this volume, and these, too, among the very latest in date, which will bear comparison with the best of his earlier work; and its opening poem, an elegy on Agassiz (though this, indeed, is of earlier date), we are inclined to regard as surpassing anything, not even excepting the noble "Commemoration Ode," which he has ever written. Mr. Lowell belongs to that not very large class of poets who seem to find a fuller and deeper inspiration in the sentiment of friendship than in that of love. Nineteen of the poems contained in this series—including all the most important pieces therein—are expressly classified under the head of "Friendship," the four other divisions of the series receiving respectively the subtitles of "Sentiment," "Fancy," "Humour and Satire," and "Epigrams." These last, considering the pungent pen to which we owe them, are perhaps a little disappointing. They are not only slighter in point of substance, but they are just a trifle less felicitous in form than was to be expected from Mr. Lowell. In the longer humorous pieces, however, he has done himself more justice. "Credidimus Jovem regnare" is a most brilliant exercise on a somewhat well-worn theme, and in the metrical speech supposed to have been delivered at a "Commencement Dinner" in response to the toast of "The Smith Professor," we have this master of comic verse at his happiest and best.

Tastes will perhaps differ as to the scheme of Mr. Lowell's sonnets; and it may be that his rigid adhesion to the same unvarying arrangement of the rhyme has not only precluded him from developing the full capacities of the measure, but has occasionally betrayed him into that monotony which Shakspeare almost alone among those who never vary the form of their sonnet has known how to avoid. In one example, too—that of the lines inscribed "To E. G. de R."—there is an unlucky lapse in rhyme, the word "be" in the tenth line being matched by an oversight with another "be" in the twelfth. This, however, we believe to be the solitary blemish of its kind; and, generally speaking, the level, not only of poetic quality, but of technical excellence, is admirably maintained—the sonnet "To Whittier" in particular attaining to a quite Wordsworthian dignity of expression. But it is in the ode that Mr. Lowell, as indeed he had given us reason to expect that he would be, is found at his strongest; and notably so, as we have already indicated, in the poem inspired by the memory of Agassiz. For variety and flexibility of rhythm, for sustained vigour of thought, and for unflagging force and flow of utterance, the place of this poem among the foremost examples of this difficult order of composition is certainly very near the front. A rough, but a most effective, test of the quality of an ode may usually be obtained by comparing its length with its self-sustaining power; for it is in adjusting the one to the other that the poet who is not fully master of this complex instrument generally fails. If he does not weary you with metrical monotony, he fidgets you with excessive frequency of strophic and antistrophic alternations—with too many "new pars," as a prosaic compositor once described them—or else he lengthens out strophe and antistrophe, until the back of the thought breaks helplessly under the load of words which it is made to carry. In an ode of more than four hundred lines in length Mr. Lowell is not only never guilty of any of these faults, but he never even comes near to committing any one of them, nor, what is almost equally disastrous, ever raises the uneasy apprehensions of the reader that he is about to witness its commission. It is no exaggeration to say of this poem that, although there is of course (as there should be) a certain rise and fall in the tide of poetic feeling, it does not contain a single prosaic line. To how few writers of odes, even among the greatest, can such praise be justly given! In Mr. Lowell's case, too, the praise is higher than in any, since no former poet has ever so boldly handled the prose of modern life, and pressed its most familiar commonplaces into the service of the Muse. In his description of the sudden shock given to him by the telegram announcing the tidings of Agassiz's death there occur fourteen lines contrasting the curt brutality of the telegraphic wire with the more sympathetic methods of the letter in the breaking of bad news, which are a veritable triumph of literary cunning. A too prosaic criticism might perhaps object that electricity, "the savage of the skies, whom men have caught, And some scant use of language taught," cannot in justice be blamed for a brevity really due to the costliness of those services which even a "savage of the skies" has a right to sell in the dearest market. Passages of this kind, however, must always be in the nature of tours de force. To test a poet's inbred quality rather than his acquired artistic powers, it is fairer to take a more inspiring theme. The sense of prematurity in the extinction, at whatever age, of all full and vigorous lives is more or less of a poetic commonplace; but here, too, Mr. Lowell's never-failing distinction of literary manner—perhaps the one expression which most accurately differentiates him as a poet—has enabled him to impart a charm of novelty:—

I cannot think he wished so soon to die,
With all his senses full of eager heat,
And rosy years that stood expectant by
To buckle the winged sandals on his feet;
He that was friends with earth, and all her sweet
Took with both hands unsparingly:
Truly this life is precious to the root,
And good the feel of grass beneath the foot;
To lie in buttercups and clover-bloom,
Tenant in common with the bees,
And watch the white clouds drift through gulfs of trees,
Is better than long waiting in the tomb;
Only once more to feel the coming spring
As the birds feel it when it bids them sing,
Only once more to see the moon
Through leaf-fringed abbey arches of the elms
Curve her mild sickle in the West,
Sweet with the breath of haycocks, were a boon
Worth any promise of soothsayer realms
Or casual hope of being elsewhere blest.

And again the contrast between the departure of those who have been worn out by their labours and of those who have been only stimulated by them to fresh endeavour is surely set forth in the following lines with an entire freshness of charm:—

When toil-worked hands are crost upon the breast
They comfort us with sense of rest;
They must be glad to be forever still;
Their work is ended with their day;
Another fills their room; 'tis the world's ancient way,
Whether for good or ill!
But the deft spinners of the brain
Who love each added day and find it gain,
Them overtakes the doom
To snap the half-grown flower upon the loom,
(Trophy that was to be of life-long pain)
The thread no other skill can ever knit again.
'Twas so with him, for he was glad to live;
'Twas doubly so, for he left work begun.
Could not this eagerness of Fate forgive
Till all the allotted flax were spun?
It matters not; for go at night or noon,
A friend whene'er he dies has died too soon,
And, once we hear the hopeless He is dead,
So far as flesh hath knowledge, all is said.

Of the lighter poems of the series we have already spoken. The best of them are those of which the motive is less directly and deliberately humorous—those in which Mr. Lowell's gravely ironic philosophy of life finds its way to expression through the good-humoured, well-mannered tolerance of the accomplished man of the world. "In the Halfway House" is a capital example of this mood of the poet. It is like a piece of Praed, with something less than Praed's metrical perfection, and something more than his playfulness of cynicism. But in mere felicity of expression it may well claim to rank with the best work of that master of the felicitous. This, however, to say the truth, is a kind of praise which it would be inequitable to apply to any one part of Lowell's work to the exclusion of another. The volume abounds with stanzas, with couplets, with single lines which hit the right nail on the head with as convincing a certainty to any reader of average taste as though his own finger were under the hammer.

FOUR BOOKS OF TRAVEL.*

THE extraordinary merits of Mr. Doughty's travels in one of the least known, though by no means one of the most remote, districts of the world may possibly, we fear, be veiled to at least the general reader by some of the features of their presentation. The author in his preface remarks that his book is not milk for babes; a hasty critic, with not much knowledge and little patience, might say that it was something much more like nails and gravel for ostriches. It is immensely long, extending (though it is true that this includes elaborate indices) to some thirteen hundred pages, each of which holds more words than two ordinary pages. Its altogether exceptional minuteness of observation, social and scientific, is combined with a singular neglect of that "eye of history," chronology; so much so that we do not know, as we read, in what year, month, or day Mr. Doughty was anywhere and did anything. Lastly, it is written in a most miraculous style, suggesting a mixture of Mr. William Morris, Mr. George Meredith, the late Mr. Carlyle, and the living Sir Richard Burton, a style of which two short specimens will suffice:—

Greater ones were a mitred fellowship of two or three withered Persian lordlings, for whom was pitched a wide pavilion in the stations. But for that little I met with them I could imagine the solemn Persian gentlemen to be the most bad-hearted dunghill souls of all nations.

Of a licentious military tongue, and now in the shipwreck of a good understanding, with the bestial insane instincts and the like compunctions of a spent humanity, it seemed the jade [sic] might have been, if great had been his chance, another Tiberius Senex.

This tormented fashion of speech is well enough as a ragout now and then; but twelve hundred pages of it are something of a chokepear. Having said this, however, as the duty of critics will have it, we have only to revert to our first sentence, and to say that the merits of the book are extraordinary. Starting with the Haj from Damascus, Mr. Doughty journeyed under the name of Khalil, but with no concealment of his Christianity, across the desert of Petra as far as Medain Salih or El Hejr, thus following a course more westerly than Mr. Blunt's, who journeyed Nejdwards by Jôf, or, as Mr. Doughty spells it, Jauf. At Medain Salih Mr. Doughty let the sacred caravan go on, and then took his chance alone, either actually in the desert living in tents with the nomads, or else in the rare towns, where, as a rule, he was in much more danger. Once or twice the danger came very near, but a perfect knowledge of Arabic and an uncommon command of temper seem to have preserved the traveller. He did not hurry himself, but accompanied his hosts backwards and forwards in the central desert, not attempting to visit either of the two sacred cities close to which he passed, or the southern capital of Nejd, Riyad, but sojourning at Medain Salih, at Teyma, at Hayil, at Kheybar (famous in the Prophet's history, and now notorious for its witches), and at Boreyda, from which last place he journeyed by Tayif to Jeddah. Both in these town sojourns and in his desert wanderings he lost no opportunity of copying inscriptions, of noting the geological features of the country, and, above all, of observing and recording the ways and manners of the Bedouin. As to the last point, it is satisfactory to say that the stupid and monotonous disillusioning of much modern travel finds no support in Mr. Doughty's grave and elaborate book. The Arab of the desert, whom we have sometimes of late been bidden to regard as nothing better than a picturesque blackguard, appears as a rather noble, though not in the least superhuman, savage. The Arab of the towns certainly does not figure so well; but then we did not expect that. Mr. Doughty seems to have seen a great deal of the women, who wear no face-cloths; and though, as with most uncivilized people, they have to do the major part of the work, they enjoy a great deal of liberty. He was several times offered wives, who were sometimes maidens, sometimes widows, and sometimes wives at the time; for divorce is free enough; but he never seems to have incurred the danger which the companion of Ayesha ran in a celebrated incident of the Prophet's life. He shows us the general condition of the Bedouin in, as we think, a more probable and a less exaggerated light than any previous traveller has managed to shed on it. Its privations and dangers are not of an Esquimaux or Fuegian kind; but the aversion to regular labour brings about a certain approximate starvation which sometimes comes very near indeed to starvation itself. As for the scientific results of his work, it is sufficient to say that his recovered inscriptions were printed by the Paris Institute, that authorities like M. Renan and the Marquis de Vogüé have acknowledged the light they cast on the mysterious Nabathæan monarchy, and the relation of its civilization to Greece on the one hand, and to Islam on the other; and that Professor Robertson Smith, Professor Sprenger, Professor Wright, the late Dr. Badger, and other Arabic scholars of the first rank, have testified, both by approval and by elaborate help, their sense of the value of his work. This work, both by transcription of inscribed documents and by record of vernacular dialect, has done wonders. As for the book itself, we wish that it could be compressed, and to a certain extent translated, but its value as a storehouse of knowledge simply cannot be exaggerated; while there has to be mentioned, also, the presence of an admirable map, topographical and geological, of the almost unknown country traversed.

To say that Mr. Lindt's magnificent volume of photographs from plates, taken on the spot in New Guinea, with letterpress appertaining, is a reductio ad impossibile of photographic book illustration, would be in the highest degree ungracious. But any ungracious critic who should make the statement might produce better chapter and verse for his assertion than most of his graceless kind. Mr. Lindt, a practised photographer, accompanied the late Sir Peter Scratchley, when, after the fatal delays of Mr. Gladstone's Government, part of New Guinea was saved from the German claw, instead of the whole, and the Australian colonies were empowered by the home Government to give the mother-country part instead of the whole of the greatest present that has ever been given to any European nation since Captain Cook made Australia English, if not since Columbus discovered America for Spain. That his text, though interesting and readable, does not quite rise to the height of this situation we blame him not; for a man can but serve in his vocation, and well for him is it if he be good in that. We do not even quarrel with the fact that the subjects of his photographs are not always chosen with a view to durable interest, and that cabinet portraits of divers no doubt excellent naval officers and pictures of the same in pith helmets taking observations on a tolerably everyday quarterdeck are not excessively stimulating. The point is that this book, to which we give hearty testimony, as one of the handsomest and best executed books of the kind that we have ever seen, shows conclusively how unfit photography is to be anything but the basis and substructure of book illustration. We are not referring, as some innocent persons have sometimes thought that those who made similar remarks were referring, to the supposed perishableness of photographs; we dare say that the processes here adopted will keep Mr. Lindt's plates clear till our summers have deceased. We are not now hinting, as we sometimes have hinted, at the artistic unpleasantness of the combination of sun pictures with ordinary letterpress. We refer to something quite different—to the tendency, that is to say, of a strong tropical sun to overpower all the "dodges" of art, and to make a mere blur of some of the most interesting parts of the picture. If these photographs had been handed over to a skilled artist on wood or copper, he might, no doubt, have lost in his transcript something of their absolute fidelity, but he would have substituted something intelligible, which their absolute fidelity often is not. He would have adjusted the values of black and white, and he would have made these interesting pictures, so to speak, legible. For instance, take the frontispiece, one of the best and most successful plates in the volume. It represents a girl carrying water, in a New Guinea landscape. The piece is striking; but not only has Apollo, justifying the favourite old derivation, destroyed the perspective of the vegetation, but he has completely smudged out all the young lady's doubtless charming countenance, except the extreme tip of a very broad nose. And this is quite the most successful plate of its kind in the book. Opposite p. 16 there is a capital landscape, the definition of minor points being of less importance there. But turn to the next plate (p. 22), where two young aborigines, as some philanthropists say, confront each other in another tropical frame. The smudge and the slur, which are the curses of the method, again occur. The houses and vegetation of some plates which follow are capital, and the tree-house opposite p. 36 could hardly be better. For wherever photography has to take anything percé à jour, and with a good jour behind it, the result is safe. But the sea palafittes of Tupuelei (p. 56) are "mixed," as the burin or the needle never would have mixed them, and of the many native groups taken with the sun in their faces, there is hardly one which can be made out without a magnifying glass and much imagination. We ought to except one opposite p. 6, which is full of good and comic effect, and we should be very sorry if anything we have said were taken as reflecting on Mr. Lindt, whose manipulation in anything but easy circumstances seems to have been admirable. But we abide by our thesis that, though photography is an excellent basis for book illustration, it is thoroughly ill suited for book illustration itself.

With regard to the last two books on our list we have no quarrel with M. Baraban for saying "Tunisie," but we should like to know why Messrs. Graham and Ashbee, who are Englishmen, say "Tunisia." The English name of the Beylik, as of its capital, is "Tunis," all short; and we really cannot see that the fact of France having assumed a probably temporary protectorate is any reason for altering it. But that is the only unfavourable comment that we have to make on either book. M. Baraban's does not require much notice, though it is well worth recommending to those who are interested in the purely geographical aspect of the matter. M. Baraban, an inspector of forests, was sent by the French Government to report on the agricultural aspects of the new colony, and he has done so with customary French clearness. Perhaps the most interesting thing in his book is that, evidently not out of prejudice, but from patient observation, he joins himself to the opponents of Captain Roudaire's grandiose project of a Saharian sea fed from the Mediterranean through the Chotts or dry marsh-beds of Tunis. He takes this line rather timidly, but few cool-headed geographers will fail to range themselves on his side in reference to a project which must cost vast sums, which might poison half Africa and seriously affect the Mediterranean ports, and which, as he very shrewdly suggests, might, from the merely French point of view, be rather a hindrance than a help to African dominion. Messrs. Graham and Ashbee have produced a careful and well-written account of journeys to Tunis, Kairwan, Sfax, Gabes, Carthage, and most other interesting places in the province, without any fine or gossipy writing, but with a record of careful observation and experience, and with half a hundred most admirable illustrations of all kinds. The frontispiece—a Tunisian doorway, with horseshoe arch and exquisitely delicate mouldings and patterns on the door—does Mr. Graham's architectural drawing credit, and it is followed up by many other large engravings of the same kind. Among these may be specially noticed the Court of the Bardo, the grand arcades of the Carthage Aqueduct, the ruined Temple at Zaghouan, the doorway of the Kasba at Susa, and the magnificent amphitheatre at El Djem. This last is made more useful by a plate of comparative elevations and ground plans of the Colosseum, Arles, and Verona, to only the first of which is El Djem (Thysdrus) inferior. Many other architectural or landscape plates might be mentioned, the ruins of Sufetula or Sbetla deserving particular mention; while of figure subjects a Bedouin woman and a group of Jewish girls in their famous Tunisian costume, with the veiled Arab lady later, are perhaps the best. Mr. Ashbee has added a very careful and elaborate bibliography, and the whole composes one of those books of travels which remain. We should add that many, if not most, of the large engravings are tinted, and are really admirable examples of their kind. The figure pieces are heliographed, and we like them less. The book is one which could hardly be produced except by travellers with means at their command; but, considering the amount that is spent every year by wealthy Englishmen on travel, we can only wish that it left more monuments of a similar kind.

BRITISH AND IRISH SALMONIDÆ.*

So much has of late been written upon the British salmonidæ, that there would hardly seem to have been room for another work on the subject. Mr. Day's book, however, has its special value, since it not only expresses the matured conclusions of one whose qualifications have long been recognized, but it is practically a summary of the information gained by the continuous and costly pisciculutral experiments at Howietown, so admirably conducted by Sir James Maitland.

At the very outset of his work Mr. Day commits himself to an opinion which is, we think, far too important to be overlooked:—

> It has been [he says] increasingly evident to me, for some years, that one of the main reasons militating against the successful cultivation of trout, and possibly char, by riparian proprietors, has been the confusion into which these forms have been thrown by naturalists, who, in order to give greater accuracy to their descriptive treatises on museum specimens, have subdivided them into many species. The consequence of this has been that fish-culturalists who have accepted the statements made have been constantly attempting to introduce new species into their waters in order to improve the native race. For the zoologists who have been most active in raising local varieties to specific rank have been compelled to admit that they all very commonly interbreed, but that the young revert to one of the original parents.

The above extract forms really the keynote to the whole work; colour, internal organization, and external form are all, as Mr. Day contends, consequent on local surroundings, and may be modified by changing the abode of the fish.

It must be acknowledged that the classification of the Salmonidæ has always been to a greater or less extent unsatisfactory. There are apparently no distinctive features which can be regarded as constant. The dark bars or bands down the side—par marks, as they are called—in the young of the true salmon, Salmo salar, are seen in the young of the non-migratory brook-trout, S. trutta, as also on some species of mackerel; the black and red ocellated spots partially or wholly disappear in the salt water, and where they occur are so variable in position that they serve no purpose of classification. The number of the pyloric cæca—small sacs closed at the end and attached to the intestine, and of which Dr. Günther says "there can be no doubt they may materially assist in fixing a species"—is by no means invariable; the brook-trout in our northern streams having, as a rule, a larger number of these cæca than have the trout of the south. Ova sent from Hampshire and Buckinghamshire to Tasmania have developed a race of fish which shows still further variation; the shape of the caudal fin varies with the age of the fish; the size and arrangement of the vomerine teeth are not always alike in specimens of even the same universally admitted species; and the number of vertebræ in the spinal column is not in every case identical. It can therefore be no matter of surprise that naturalists should have disagreed in their enumeration of species, from Dr. Günther, who, under "anadromous" forms—i.e. fish which migrate from the sea into fresh water to breed—describes six species, and catalogues an equal number of non-migratory fresh-water species, to the author of the present work, who recognizes only two divisions—(1) the Salmones, or true salmons, wherein the body and the head of the vomer, i.e. the central ridge in the upper palate, are toothed at some period of their lives; and (2) the Savelini, or chars, wherein the vomerine teeth are restricted to the head of that bone; in (1) he places the salmon and the trout, whether brook or lake, and in (2) the British, and the recently introduced American char, S. fontinalis. We do not know that Mr. Day's decision will be at once accepted, although he adduces very many striking facts in its support; it should, however, be most carefully tested, if, that is, pisciculture is to be regarded as a science of any practical importance; and, the conclusion once established that all forms of trout are varieties of the same species, new and greater consideration will be given to the advantages and disadvantages of crossing and interbreeding; of food, locality, and depth and volume of lake or stream; and it may not perhaps be too much to hope that peculiarities of inherited instinct may be so successfully cultivated that a race of trout will some day be produced which shall average a little under 1 lb., shall be guiltless of the sordid habit of bottom-feeding, and only rise to the fly.

It is impossible, within the limits of this notice, to follow Mr. Day through the whole of his almost exhaustive volume; in fact, it is a book which cannot be compressed, and what gives the whole work an additional interest is the liberal manner in which, chiefly in footnotes, he refers to the descriptions and opinions of others. There is hardly any authority whom he does not quote:—Johnson (1649), Willoughby, Ray, Pennant, Thompson (Nat. Hist. Ireland), Couch, Badham, and Yarrell. Reports of Commissioners, Inspectors, Chairmen of Fisheries; genial Frank Buckland, Huxley, or Willis-Bund, whose salmon problems should accompany every angler in his visits to the pools; writers in the Field, in Land and Water, and Notes and Queries; every one whose practical knowledge or observation can throw light upon a disputed point, or record some hitherto unnoticed fact, is pressed into the service, and the result is a mine of information; containing not only all that is at present known or can be reasonably inferred in the life-history of the Salmonidæ, but giving curious details on the authority of charters and early records of the terms of the petition presented to Edward III. 1357 (?) to regulate the price of salmon taken in the Thames; or of the sums paid, 6s. to 8s. a dozen, for fresh salmon by "the Convent of Durham" in 1532; and produces the evidence for the oft-repeated but contested assertion that an article was commonly inserted in indentures of apprenticeship, in towns situate on salmon rivers, that the apprentices should not be obliged to dine on salmon more than twice or thrice a week.

But there is one question on which we could have desired a more authoritative opinion, one upon which, for reasons not easily explained, much unexpected sentiment has been aroused—and that is, whether the extent to which Kelts are preserved is or is not injurious to the rivers. It is commonly asserted that, so soon as salmon have spawned, they drop down into the nearest pool and remain quiet until the next flood, when they go down with it to the sea, to return again the following season greatly increased in size. But every fisherman's experience teaches him that this statement is only partially correct; both female fish, known as kelts or slats, and male fish, kippers, remain in the rivers in large numbers many weeks after the spawning season has ended; owing to their weakened condition they are peculiarly liable to disease, and in the early part of the season are continually met with blind, or crippled with fungus, or dead and rotting in the streams; if, on the other hand, they recover their health, and become what are known as "well-mended," it can only be at the cost of untold thousands of trout and salmon fry; for, as Mr. Willis-Bund expresses it, "no more ravenous beast than an old Kelt can be found, and he is not particular what he eats." In our opinion the suggestion, more than once put forward, is an eminently reasonable one—that all male Kelts taken after the 1st February should be destroyed, and all of either sex from the commencement of March. It is a question which we beg to commend to all Boards of Conservators as one well worthy of their attention.

WHEN, during 1852-4, the Revue des Deux Mondes first gave to the world the successive instalments of those studies of eighteenth-century society which M. Louis de Loménie afterwards republished under the title of Beaumarchais et son Temps, it might well have been thought that his work, accomplished, instructed, and artistic as it was, should have been final. But, alas! there s no finality in biography. Not only is there always the possibility that some petty discovery may change the aspect of some minor detail, and so, with a running-and-reading public, vaguely discredit the general character of the whole; but even the very vigour and ability of the presentment often prepare its own gradual supersession by attracting fresh students to the subject. However judicious may be the first biographer, however on his guard as to his inevitable successors, it is scarcely to be hoped that he can escape the rectifications and revisions which increased facilities for the consultation of authorities and the endless disclosure of fresh material afford to the modern inquirer. It is well if he is not entirely set aside; and it is most likely that, if he survives by virtue of his style, it is only to be buried (like Boswell) under a Babel of footnotes. M. de Loménie has not yet attained to this disfigurement; but it is clear that his labours have greatly stimulated the admirers of the author of Le Mariage de Figaro. Messrs. Auger, de Goncourt, Fournier, Jal, Moland, d'Heylli, F. de Marescot, Auguste Vitu, have all occupied themselves in this matter; and in 1883 an invaluable bibliography was published by M. Henri Cordier. Germany, too, has been not inactive, and some very curious, though very unedifying, light was thrown upon the subject by a little book entitled Beaumarchais und Sonnenfels, published in 1868 by Alfred von Arneth, Director of the Archives at Vienna. A more detailed and laborious volume, Beaumarchais, eine Biographie, was also issued two years ago from the pen of Dr. Anton Bettelheim.

By a curious accident, however, the latest contribution to Beaumarchais literature belongs rather to the material which prompted M. de Loménie than to anything which may be said to have received its impetus from him. When, in 1850, he first made those dusty investigations in the garret of the Rue du Pas-de-la-Mule, of which he has given so graphic an account in his introduction, there already existed among the documents submitted to him by Beaumarchais's descendants a manuscript Life, prepared by Beaumarchais's friend and ally Gudin, or, "writ large," Paul-Philippe Gudin de la Brenellerie. Originally intended as an introduction to the edition of Beaumarchais's works published in 1809, it was suppressed at the request of Mme. de Beaumarchais, who appears to have feared that its readers might associate her husband too closely with some of the ultra-philosophic theories of his enthusiastic, but (in 1809) somewhat old-fashioned, biographer. Of these unpublished Memoirs M. de Loménie made considerable use—perhaps more use, even, than is quite covered by his prefatory acknowledgments—but after his book had appeared they were again forgotten, at all events for the time. Then the discovery of the original draft among Gudin's papers seems to have suggested their publication; which, after being projected by a M. Mabille, now deceased, was ultimately effected by their present editor, M. Maurice Tourneux. By a coincidence, M. Eugène Lintilhac, who is engaged upon a further study of Beaumarchais, was enabled to allow M. Tourneux to collate the draft with the fair copy used by M. de Loménie, so that, to use M. Tourneux's expression, Gudin has been treated "like a veritable classic." That he will ever become one is more than doubtful. To the defects which were felt by both M. de Loménie and Mme. de Beaumarchais lapse of years has added errors and misapprehensions long since rectified, while in the portion exploded by M. von Arneth, the Angelucci episode—upon which, as M. Lintilhac promises still further elucidations, it would be unwise to dwell here—he is naturally very much to seek. Still he has one incalculable advantage. Panegyrist and partisan though he be, he possessed Johnson's supreme qualification for a biographer—he had known and lived with the man whose life he wrote. He is besides effectively annotated and supplemented by M. Tourneux; and, as M. Tourneux says, it is but fair, even at this late hour, that the earliest and staunchest of Beaumarchais's apologists should be allowed a hearing.

This tardy justice is the less to be withheld because the suppression of Gudin's work upon this occasion was not by any means a solitary experience. Facile and laborious, "fruitfully mediocre," he spent a large portion of his lifetime in the preparation of a vast History of France, in five-and-thirty volumes, which never succeeded in meeting with a publisher rash enough to produce it. He also wrote two "opera-ballets," Lycurgue and Solon, which were equally unable to find a composer; and the most important fact connected with his numerous tragedies, acted and unacted, is that one of them, Lothaire et Valrade, after being printed at Geneva and played at Berlin, was burned at Rome by order of the Inquisition. And yet all this, added to his authorship of an heroi-comic poem, "dans le goût de l'Arioste," on the conquest of Naples, failed to save him from being put forward, some fifty years ago, as the "only begetter" of the work of Beaumarchais! But unless he should chance to find a new fame in the Mémoires now given to the world by M. Tourneux, it is most likely that his surest claim to recollection will continue to rest upon one line, now definitely ascribed to him. In 1779 the French Academy offered a prize, which was gained by La Harpe, for an Eloge de Voltaire, then lately dead. Gudin competed, and although unsuccessful, his happy characterization of Henri IV.,— was specially noted as a suitable legend for that monarch's statue. But even here Gudin's habitual ill-luck pursued him, for until very recently, not only was his authorship of this fortunate utterance practically unknown, but, to make matters worse, it was almost always misquoted.

FRENCH LITERATURE.

THIS article may be not inappropriately opened by a few words on the eldest and not the least noteworthy of French critics, M. Désiré Nisard, who has died since our last issue. More than fifty years have passed since M. Nisard's Poètes Latins de la Décadence and the parallel which (perhaps taking the hint of Byron's remark about Horace and Claudian) he drew therein between his immediate subject and certain of his own contemporaries made him regarded as the bitterest foe of Romanticism. He was all the more dangerous because he could not, like the Jouys and the Lemerciers, be dismissed as a "fossil," being exactly Victor Hugo's contemporary. Twenty years after, political as well as literary causes made him once more extremely unpopular with literary youth. He has sometimes been regarded as, and may very likely have been called, the Boileau of the nineteenth century—an appellation which would not be much happier than most such, inasmuch as he was far Boileau's inferior in mordant style, and far his superior in literary knowledge. Putting old quarrels aside, M. Nisard may be recognized as having been, though a narrow, an acute and accomplished critic. He wrote French of the best old kind, and his last republication—not very long ago—of critical articles displayed this agreeably. But his chief book, the "History of French Literature," was fatally injured by his prejudices and his want of range. It ought to be mentioned that, quite independently of his critical work, M. Nisard rendered valuable services as an organizer of literary education. Of many departments of this, especially of the Ecole Normale, which has since produced almost more men of letters than schoolmasters, he was, in fact, the second founder.

One of the most solid and not the least brilliant of Michelet's many services to history long ago put the famous Procès des Templiers (1) in, if not a new light (for the general truth had always been fairly enough understood by historians), at any rate a fuller light than had before been given. Fresh investigations of the documents have confirmed his views since, though they may have also shown that Michelet was always Michelet. M. Lavocat's exposition of the matter is patient in its reference to chapter and verse, and has the advantage of being arranged by a lawyer. It will thus be very useful for reference to historical students; but we have read books more satisfactory and yet not less instructive to the general reader, both in the digestion of fact into narrative and in the character of the critical comment.

A new series, the "Petite Bibliothèque Economique," opens very well with Vauban's famous, but little read, Dime royale (2). The book is cheaply but prettily produced, and has a capital introduction by M. George Michel, sketching Vauban's life, noting the economical objections to his project, and giving a sufficient account of the rascally cabal that disgraced, and in a way killed, the great engineer, and proved more clearly than anything else the dotage of Louis XIV.

Providence has rewarded that wicked Gyp for her gibes at poor M. Ohnet by quickly supplying her with a fresh subject of gibing. We are inclined to think Volonté (3) a more absurd book than any of its forerunners. M. Ohnet's pitiless critics of what Mr. Blunt calls the "drawing-room pedant" school will note that he calls the wife of Sir James Olifaunt "Madame Olifaunt," critics of his notions of the heroic feminine will observe that he thinks it ladylike for a lady when her husband has rescued her from the hands of villany to smite villany on the cheek with a glove, and critics of his style noble will chuckle over such phrases as this:—"Mais on ne change pas sa destinée; et il était écrit dans l'avenir que l'existence de Clément et celle de Louis devaient être tragiquement mêlées l'une à l'autre." And the public will no doubt buy another hundred thousand copies.

Among schoolbooks first place, by right of subject, must be given to Mr. H. A. Perry's edition of Hernani (Rivingtons). The notes are good, though Mr. Perry has not quite followed up his excellent determination not to take the student away from "the wholesome society of his grammar and dictionary," but has succumbed to the (to us quite unintelligible) fancy for indicating etymologies which have nothing more to do with Hernani than with any other work. His note on the Alexandrine metre were better omitted or considerably enlarged and corrected. To say that "e mute always counts as a syllable," without so much as mentioning elision, will utterly mislead the non-classical student. And it is entirely a mistake to say that in the [French] classical verse "the interests of the rhythm or harmony are paramount," while in the Romantic verse they have to give way to "the emphasis required to bring out the force of a word." On the contrary, the Romantic theory is not to sacrifice rhythm or harmony at all, but to vary, enlarge, and enrich both. The introduction might also be a little fuller; but we are glad to welcome the book. We have also useful school editions (Whittaker) of Piron's Métromanie, by M. Delbos, and of Galland's Ali Baba, by Mr. Clare; a book called The Self-Tests Series—French, by J. Berrington (Allen), which, no doubt, contains much useful information, but the general plan of which seems to us confused, and a capital French Accidence (Rivingtons) from the practised hand of M. Eugène Pellissier.

NEW BOOKS AND REPRINTS.

It is satisfactory to find that the Addresses and Lectures of the late Sir G. A. Macfarren (Longmans & Co.) are issued as delivered, and not prepared for publication like Parliamentary speeches. Never were discourses less academic in style or more invigorating and helpful than these ten annual addresses (1878–1887) to the students of the Royal Academy of Music. There is something apostolic in the earnest exordium which is an invariable feature of the addresses and in the fervid admonishment that occasionally intervenes in the course of exposition. In the midst of some technical or historical dissertation, enriched by the happy illustration Sir George Macfarren could always command, a note of warning is sounded in frankly colloquial language. Thus, in the admirable discourse on the Symphony (p. 88), in which its inter-dependent development by the great masters is eloquently demonstrated, we find this characteristic passage:—"It is too much the use nowadays to speak of Mozart as old-fashioned, to speak of Haydn as rococo. Oh, do believe there is endless youth, eternal spring, in the writings of those men, and that the more scrupulously we look into the beauties of their work, the more fit we are to understand what has been written since, and the more capable we are of enjoying it all!" The combination of dignity and simplicity, of wide culture and vigorous common sense, does not often characterize the official utterances of public men, and in Sir George Macfarren was extremely noteworthy. Few men have known so well how to instruct and interest a youthful audience, or how to utilize in the clear and expressive language that befits the platform the accumulated stores of thought and erudition. If there is little of what is commonly called oratory in this volume, there is abundance of the more valuable eloquence that survives the hour of speech.

In A Dream of John Ball (Reeves & Turner) Mr. William Morris is possessed of the spirit of prophecy, like the poet in the Vision of Piers Plowman; but, unlike the dreamer of the Malvern Hills, who proved to be a genuine seer, he prophesies very much after the event in his ghostly converse with John Ball. An unbiassed statement of facts was perhaps not to be expected in what purports to be a vision, and we certainly do not recognize "things as they are" in the vision of things to come which Mr. Morris unfolds to the wondering priest. The marvel is that he does not deter John Ball from his march upon London with his rabble rout, for he plainly tells him that his enterprise will not bring down heaven upon earth, but rather hell up from below. And it were well if all preachers of violence and sedition would take the moral to heart. This is not the way of Mr. Morris. The address of John Ball from the Kentish village cross, though prettily sown with archaisms, is strangely modern in style and matter. "Be ye bold, and again bold, and thrice bold!" is certainly a familiar adjuration. "And, look you!" says the leader of the insurgents, as they are about to have a brush with the King's troops, "think it no loss of manhood to cover your bodies with tree and bush; for one of us who know is worth a hundred of those proud fools." This modest self-esteem is not unknown among the Tappertits of our times. Being a poet, Mr. Morris could not altogether fail to write like a poet. His descriptions of a village inn, the interior of a yeoman's house, and the moonlit church, in which, seated in the vicar's stalls, he and his fellow-enthusiast discuss economic problems, are very sympathetic and spirited. Unhappily there are few of these pleasurable interludes in the heady current of Mr. Morris's vain imaginings. The forecast of our own days of steam and machinery, "when men shall make things, and not men, work for their superfluities," is rank distemper rather than a humorous perversion of fact.

Professor Morley's projected History of English Literature has advanced to a second volume of English Writers (Cassell & Co.), which completes the section devoted to literature before the Norman Conquest, the centuries treated being conveniently comprehended under the title "From Cædmon to the Conquest."

The Fortunes of Words, by Federico Garlanda (Trübner & Co.), is a little volume of "Letters to a Lady" on the study of language; one of the large number of books that show the natural increase of the popular interest in philology since the publication of Archbishop Trench's Winchester lectures On the Study of Words. Mr. Garlanda is an agreeable and unpedantic writer, and his book a good introduction to the subject.

Mr. Thomas Davenport Warner has written a drama—Madelena; or, the Maids' Mischief (Philadelphia: Lippincott)—and published it with the feelings of one who finds no place for it in the world and consigns it to Limbo. That publication frequently leads to Limbo is too true, yet we have never known an author candid enough to acknowledge so much. Mr. Warner's play is much too long and too diffuse, though by no means ill conceived. The plot is the old one that begins in comedy and is like to end in very solemn tragedy. The maids who plot mischief playfully almost bring a noble pair of lovers, their dear friends, to a shameful death. One of these young ladies is too fond of the verb to cuddle. She speaks rather enigmatically of "a toad cuddling in a flower bed," and of Venetian soldiers that "they cuddle themselves with glory."

Bird Notes, by Evelyn Douglas (Chelmsford: Clarke), have more of the carelessness than the rapture of unpremeditated song. Mr. J. W. Watson's Beautiful Snow, and other Poems (Ward, Lock, & Co.), now first collected in this country, have "won the favour," we are told, "of literary circles in America." All sorts of persons have fraudulently claimed the authorship of Beautiful Snow—a fact we should have thought incredible of any people save the countrymen of Mr. E. P. Roe. Mr. Watson's "poems" are mere Christy-Minstrelsy.

Lays of the Early English Church, by the Rev. W. Foxley Norris (Parker & Co.), deal with incidents in ecclesiastical history in ballad stanzas of extreme simplicity. The notes are readable and the woodcuts good.

A curious novelty in books of reference is the diminutive Pocket Encyclopædia (Sampson Low & Co.) An enormous mass of information is compressed into this dictionary by a somewhat painful process of abbreviation. When once the rather formidable list of "signs and abbreviations" is mastered, the book will be found to be really useful. The signs are almost mystical and astrological enough to deter the reader.

Mr. Joseph Alan Scofield may be a conscientious believer in psychical research, but he is an overbold dramatist. His four-act play in sad blank verse—Alwynne; or, the Secret of Narboth (Wyman & Sons)—deals with historic personages, such as the father of Lady Jane Grey, and sets forth "certain actual and recent psychical experiences." If the hero's experiences represent those of the author, Mr. Scofield must have had a dreadful haunted time, and merits our sincere commiseration. His wild and cryptic drama cannot seriously be designed for an earthly stage. Only an audience of spooks could endure it.

Among new editions and reprints we have the Life and Labours of Thomas Brassey, by Sir Arthur Helps, and The Queen's English, by Dean Alford, in "Bohn's Select Library" (Bell & Sons); a new and improved edition, with Glossary, of Mr. Edward Sims's Manual for the Genealogist, Topographer, Antiquary and Legal Professor (Edward Avery); the fourth edition of Lord Selborne's Defence of the Church of England against Disestablishment (Macmillan & Co.), and Goldsmith's Deserted Village and Traveller, edited and annotated by Professor Arthur Barrett (Macmillan & Co.)

DR. WM. SMITH'S LATIN DICTIONARIES.

NEW AND CHEAPER EDITIONS.

Nineteenth and Cheaper Edition. Medium 8vo. 1270 pp. 16s

A COMPLETE LATIN-ENGLISH DICTIONARY.

With Tables of the Roman Calendar, Measures, Weights, Money, and a DICTIONARY of PROPER NAMES.

This work holds an intermediate place between the Thesaurus of Forcellini and the ordinary School Dictionaries, performing the same service for the Latin language as Liddell and Scott's Lexicon has done for the Greek It therefore avoids those minute subdivisions and numerous quotations which, however useful in a Thesaurus, render a Dictionary less practically useful to students

"A most useful book and fills in Latin literature the place now occupied by Liddell and Scott's Lexicon for Greek."—Sir G. CORNEWALL LEWIS

"Dr Wm Smith's 'Latin Dictionary' is a great convenience to me. I think he has been very judicious in what he has omitted, as well as in what he has inserted."

Dean SCOTT, D D, Author of the Greek Lexicon

Thirtieth Edition, thoroughly Revised. Square 16mo 730 pp 7s 6d.

A SMALLER LATIN-ENGLISH DICTIONARY.

Abridged from the Larger Work With a Dictionary of Proper Names By Dr Wm Smith and T D Hall M A The Etymological portion by Dr INGRAM, Trinity College Dublin

This edition is to a great extent a new and original Work.

1 Most of the Latin examples are translated
2 Many articles have been recast and not a few entirely rewritten
3 Most of the etymological articles have been rewritten.
4 Very great care has been taken to ensure accuracy in the quantities
5 Short notes on synonymous words have been introduced in a large number of cases
6 The Index of Proper Names has been increased, and additional information given

 It is confidently believed that this work will now be found on comparison to be superior to all other School Latin Dictionaries in fulness and accuracy

Fifth and Cheaper Edition Medium 8vo 970 pp 16s

A COPIOUS and CRITICAL ENGLISH-LATIN DICTIONARY.

Compiled from original sources By Dr Wm Smith and Prof T D Hall M A

It has been the object of the Authors of this work to produce a more complete and more perfect ENGLISH-LATIN DICTIONARY than yet exists, and every article has been the result of original and independent research

Great pains have been taken in classifying the different senses of the English words, so as to enable the student readily to find what he wants

Each meaning is illustrated by examples from the classical writers, and those phrases are as a general rule given in both English and Latin

"This work is the result of an clear insight into the faults of its predecessors as to plan, classification and examples [illegible] —Saturday Review

MR. MORLEY AT NEWCASTLE.

It is pleasant to observe, in Mr. John Morley's speeches at Newcastle on Wednesday, no signs such as have appeared in some other of his speeches, both in and out of Parliament, lately, and have seemed to show that he had returned to political work too soon after his very serious illness in the winter. The number of fair-minded and good-tempered politicians, especially in the Gladstonian party, is not so great that Mr. Morley can be spared, even by those most opposed to him, to swell the throng of petulant sophists. He, indeed, as has often been noticed, usually shows at his best among his own constituents. There is a class of speakers, of whom Mr. Disraeli was an instance, and of whom Mr. Goschen is the most remarkable living example, who positively thrive on opposition and dissent, who never strike out so strongly as in a rough sea. Mr. Morley, like his present chief, and like the late Lord Iddesleigh, gets on much better with the tide. It is very edifying and agreeable to read the excellent opinion which he has of the Newcastle colliers and machinists, and to observe the cordial fashion in which these worthy persons appreciate his appreciation. "Collery [without the i] lads for evermore," says an old Newcastle song, and that is the opinion of the lads themselves and of their member—in the latter case, of course, so long as they return him. It must always be agreeable to all but sour curmudgeons to survey happy families of this kind, even if the happiness did not produce much better speeches than Mr. Morley delivers when he has opposite to him a not wise Chief Secretary, as he mournfully described his successor to his audience, a recreant Chancellor of the Exchequer, and a majority composed of persons as different as possible from the intelligent, the high-minded, the, above all things, "sober" artisans of Elswick and Byker.

At the same time the satisfaction of perceiving Mr. Morley at his best is perhaps increased by the additional perception how very little even so clever a man at his best can make of the cause and the party which Mr. Morley now represents. Mr. Morley is not in the least like Mr. Pecksniff, whatever may be the case with some of his friends; but, since the celebrated request of that great architect to be merry, after which he suited the action to the word by taking a captain's biscuit, a more curious kind of jollity has seldom been seen than Mr. Morley's declaration, that the state of the Liberal party in Newcastle is "admirable," because it has just suffered "some small "reverses." To his further argument that the heart of Irishmen has been changed and become as that of a little child, because they say handsome things to Mr. Gladstone and Mr. Morley himself, when Mr. Morley and Mr. Gladstone promise them everything they want, another parallel from fiction presents itself—the parallel of the boy who was "so obedient that you might guide him with a "feather—to pick cherries." It is extremely interesting to know that Mr. Morley admires the Duke of Wellington and Mr. Carlyle; but he must surely be a very hard-bested politician when he quotes these two particular names in a speech tending to the support of Radicalism in general and Home Rule in particular. So, also, no orator who was in funds, and Mr. Morley least of all, would have indulged in the foolish and, as far as real meaning goes, positively untrue taunt that those Conservatives—after all but a fraction of the party—who supported the Oaths Bill, were acting inconsistently with their conduct some years ago. Mr. Morley should be aware (whatever be the case with his half-namesake, Mr. Arnold Morley, who speaks with the double license accorded to a party Whip and a very young politician) that the presence in Parliament of other persons besides Mr. Bradlaugh affected the Oaths question seriously, and that the action taken in Mr. Bradlaugh's affair was due to the action taken by Mr. Bradlaugh himself. But the signs of "No case" were perhaps more serious and not less obvious in the comments made by Mr. Morley on the Budget and the Local Government Bill. This wicked Mr. Goschen, says Mr. Morley plaintively, only gets a surplus by not paying off debt as he ought to do. And he carefully does not mention that at the very same moment this wicked Mr. Goschen, by the conversion process, has, to all intents and purposes, reduced every twelve millions of the Debt to eleven millions, as far as the burden on the nation goes. He calls on blushing Free-trade to hide the dreadful bottled-wine tax; but he was obliged to explain to Elswick and Byker that he really has no objection to it as a tax upon bottled wine. And when we pass from what he said about Mr. Goschen to what he said about Mr. Ritchie, very much the same things appear. He is "delighted" that the Tories have been converted. That is his general criticism; but when he comes to detail the delight seems to be of a most curious character. There are very few things, after all, in the Bill that are right, and those have the damning fault of being done by the wrong persons. But the crowning instance is, of course, to be found when we come to Ireland; and Mr. Morley's case is no better that his mistake happens to be shared by Sir Henry James. Everybody remembers that memorable day when those who are unceasingly complaining that there is one law for England and another for Ireland fought desperately, as far as Ireland was concerned, against the proposal that both in England and in Ireland a prisoner or his wife might give evidence. Now every child, and much more an ex-Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant, knows what the opposition of Irish members to this means. It means, and can have no other meaning than, that the proposal would act as an additional means of detecting crime; and the Irish members, who represent crime, fight against it. Sir Henry James, like many lawyers, has no doubt other and technical objections; but none of these objections can by any possibility count with the Parnellites or with Mr. Morley. The Parnellites want, and very naturally want, not to tighten the rope round the necks of the advanced guard of their party. Honest men want, and very naturally want, to get that rope as tight as possible. And yet Mr. Morley acquiesces in resistance to the extension to Ireland of what he admits to be in itself and in England "a humane and beneficent "proposal."

It can scarcely be necessary to go further than this in detailed examination, and the result is very interesting indeed. Mr. Morley is one of the ablest, if not the ablest, of Home Rulers. He has not, like most of his friends (his secret opinion of whom would be very interesting to hear), taken up Home Rule as an office-key, a pick-lock to a place, but as a conviction—a very strange conviction, no doubt, but still a conviction. He has got reasoned grounds for it—very odd grounds, no doubt, considering that they rest ultimately on sheer fear, but still grounds which can be called reasonable if you grant a little. He is speaking evidently in good temper on the whole, and not under the pressure of any recent mortification, to a sympathetic audience, and without the trouble—a new but considerable one in this platform-haunting age—of any special opponent to answer. Yet, as has been seen, he can hardly touch a single question without dropping into an obvious fallacy, exposing himself to an awkward tu quoque, rushing on the horns of a disastrous dilemma, or incurring a damaging charge of laughing on the wrong side of the mouth. This is the constant fate of the Home Rule orator, whose argumentative progress deserves no description so well as that famous and eloquent one of the Psalmist, about those who go down to the sea in ships, with the single exception that it is never likely to end in any haven where he would be; to stagger from one contradiction to another, to reel out of this fallacy into that paralogism, this is the regular way of the defenders of the scheme. For it is a scheme logically and historically impracticable in itself, and discredited further by the necessity of working with a gang of politicians such as no honest man before our present Gladstonians would have touched with a little finger. It is scarcely wonderful that those who choose to meddle with it should incur such sorrowful chances by the way and stumble so lamentably in their going.

THE BUDGET.

THE main provisions of the Budget will probably be accepted either in virtue of their soundness or on Mr. GOSCHEN's authority. The narrow margin which he has allowed for amendments will render considerable alterations comparatively difficult to introduce. A small, and perhaps a precarious, surplus limits the elasticity of a Budget. A Chancellor of the Exchequer hampers his own freedom of action as well as the discretion of the House of Commons by proposing doubtful additions to the revenue as the alternative of an insufficient balance. Some of the new taxes will have the serious defect of being unpopular and not proportionally productive; but it will be necessary either to insist on the original scheme or to provide a substituted source of income. It fortunately happens that the most objectionable of all the minor articles of the Budget may be abandoned, not only without loss, but with a trifling gain. No class but that of vagrants has an interest in the suggested abolition of hawkers' licences. Quiet rustic householders view with alarm the facilities which are offered by Mr. GOSCHEN to sturdy beggars. Small ratepayers have no desire to increase the number of itinerant competitors, and the hawkers themselves would probably rather pay a tax on their occupation than surrender the monopoly which has been conferred on them by the imposition of the licence. A saving of 25,000*l.* a year looks insignificant by the side of the estimated millions of receipt and expenditure; but the hawker's licence has the collateral advantage of restraining a serious nuisance. If it were possible to discourage the whole mendicant profession by taxing their unprofitable industry, such an extension of the licence system would do more good than harm. It would perhaps be thought both presumptuous and paradoxical to suggest that the few thousands which might, as now, be levied on hawkers should be applied to facilitate the withdrawal of the heavy additional tax on bottled wines. The classes will perhaps not receive the sympathy of the masses with their grievance of dear champagne; but cheap wines, especially from Italy, which are commonly bottled where they are made, will be excluded from the English market if the present course of trade is disturbed. The technical difficulty of reversing a vote which has already passed the House of Commons might be easily overcome.

A more serious impediment to concession may perhaps be connected with Mr. GOSCHEN's motive for proposing an increase of duty. It is possible that his object is rather to recur to old-fashioned fiscal doctrines than to make a trifling addition to the surplus. One school of financiers has always disputed the soundness of Mr. GLADSTONE's policy in reducing to the lowest point the number of subjects of taxation. On the whole, the weight of authority is perhaps in favour of the recent practice; but it involves the inconvenience of rendering the fiscal system in a great measure dependent on the Income-tax. Mr. GOSCHEN's new tax on bottled wines is the first addition to the duty since the date of Mr. GLADSTONE's celebrated Budget of 1860, though the alcoholic standard was altered two or three years ago for the benefit of Spanish growers. The proposed increase of the duty on wines imported in bottle will produce an insignificant return; but it may perhaps be intended as the beginning of a new resort to indirect taxation. Mr. GOSCHEN caused some surprise by his remark that Parliament had no need to consult the susceptibilities of nations which take every opportunity of discountenancing English industry. The liberality of the English tariff is the result of a calculation of exclusively domestic interests. It was not out of generosity, but as a result of calculation, that Mr. GLADSTONE readjusted the wine duties. His measures have in a great measure altered the habits and tastes of English consumers. It is for their benefit, and not through polite consideration for French growers, that light claret has been introduced as a common beverage. The apparent intimation that the new duty on bottled wines partakes of the nature of retaliation would cause some anxiety if it had been propounded by a less orthodox economist. It may also be remarked that a Customs duty, however small, becomes protective if it is not accompanied by a corresponding impost in the nature of Excise. Some wines are habitually bottled abroad, while other wines are imported in the wood. The advantage which is to be offered to wine bottled in England is in some degree anomalous. The expediency of taxing luxuries as such is not universally acknowledged. Duties on commodities used by a few are comparatively unproductive, and, if they discourage consumption, the revenue suffers. It may be admitted that, if the effect of the duty is only to make champagne slightly dearer, the grievance will not be intolerable.

The new taxes on heavy vehicles and on wheels will affect a less patient section of the community. The limit of weight is so fixed as to bring almost every waggon, if not almost every cart, within the jurisdiction of the tax-gatherer. It is true that farmers will not be liable for vehicles exclusively used in husbandry; but a load of timber or of coal for household use will entail the payment of duty. It must also be remembered that farmers are purchasers as well as dealers, and that they for the most part haul all the goods which they consume in their own waggons or carts. It may be presumed that artificial manures will be carried as articles connected with husbandry; but a cask of beer or a sack of flour can only be brought in a taxable vehicle. The argument that heavy vehicles wear the roads is entirely inconsistent with the policy which has prevailed for more than twenty years in the administration of the most important highways. Turnpike trusts have been almost everywhere abolished, at the cost in many cases of heavy loss to the creditors, and with the result of throwing the expense of maintenance on the ratepayers. Carriers and others who use the roads for heavy traffic are useful and indispensable members of the industrial community. The tax on heavy vehicles is a deliberate measure of retrogression. The wheel-tax will be still more universally obnoxious. There is not the smallest reason for taxing the simple machinery of the farm which would not equally justify a duty on boilers or fly-wheels. The smallness of the charge will not diminish the irritation of the farmer or tradesman who will bear the burden. The tax will be thought the more vexatious because it will render only a small contribution to the revenue. When Mr. GLADSTONE opened his great Budget of 1853 he was interrupted by an inquiry whether he intended to tax carthorses. He replied without a pause that he saw no more reason for taxing the machinery of agriculture than for taxing the machinery of manufacture.

The parts of the Budget which have been mentioned are not of primary importance. If the new taxes can be spared, they may be omitted from the scheme without affecting Mr. GOSCHEN's general policy. He has evidently thought it desirable at the expense of some questionable experiments to reduce the Income-tax to the comparatively moderate amount of sixpence in the pound. The accompanying suggestion that sixpence is the natural or normal rate of duty is perhaps an arbitrary assumption; but, as future Chancellors of the Exchequer will not be bound by Mr. GOSCHEN's opinion, the question need not be discussed for the present. It is certain that the Income-taxpayer is entitled to immediate consideration. For many years it has been his fortune to supply all deficiencies in the revenue; and he would be the first and the greatest sufferer by any extraordinary demand on the public purse. Every new addition to the Income-tax increases its inequality. Lord ADDINGTON and a few consistent devotees of an obsolete theory complain on all occasions of the supposed injustice of a tax upon earnings. It has been found impossible to convince them of the demonstrable truth that a permanent and invariable Income-tax would adjust itself with the nicest accuracy to the equal incidence of the burden. The incomes earned in professions and trades are as permanent as rent or interest of money, though the persons of the recipients may be more frequently changed. An equal tax extending over a long term of years would be levied on those who earned it at the time, and the contributions of the Bar, the medical profession, or the Stock Exchange would be in proportion to a collective income, perpetually renewed. Injustice arises when the rate of duty varies at short intervals. A trader who had pursued his occupation only during the three or four years of the Crimean War must have paid ten to fifteenpence in the pound out of his whole receipts, although his successor ten years later would only pay a third of the amount. Mr. GOSCHEN apparently wishes to make the percentage more uniform by aiming at a rate which would, according to his scheme, last for several years. He probably disapproves of the facility with which the rate has been frequently raised, and of the delay which has followed when a reduction might have been possible. His opponents will probably complain of the inseparable connexion between the Local Government Bill and the Budget; but any Chancellor of the Exchequer who offered large relief to ratepayers must have made in his financial scheme sufficient provision for the grant. It is not yet known whether the proposed increase of the Succession-duty will meet with opposition. For reasons which were briefly stated by Mr. GOSCHEN, the duty on real property causes greater inconvenience than an equal charge on personalty.

AUTHORITIES ON THE NAVY.

WE do not know how it may be with other people, but we are becoming rather tired of comments on the state of the navy. The subject is not what we complain of. That is abundantly interesting; but what is talked and written about it is rapidly approximating, in point of confusion, contradiction, and inconclusiveness, to the level of notes on SHAKSPEARE's plays. There is not only no agreement as to the meaning of words among the disputants, but no attempt even to secure one. In a general way we know that official gentlemen will draw a pleasing picture of the condition of the fleet, and that naval officers will —— the said official gentlemen in heaps. So much is certain; but beyond it there is nothing to rely on. Within the last few days Mr. FORWOOD has been speaking, and various naval gentlemen have been writing, and it is hard to believe that they have been dealing with the same force, so different does it look in their respective pictures. Mr. FORWOOD is eminently official as against the naval officers, though he can be severe and independent enough when he has to do with the extravagance of the dockyards. He is perfectly entitled to speak up for the civilian element in the Admiralty, and the partisans of administration by experts will find that he does it well. But that quarrel is as good as fought out, and indeed never did greatly interest anybody outside the profession. What we should like to get from Mr. FORWOOD would be something to show that the Admiralty has a distinct idea of what the navy would have to do in war, and of how far it is able to do it. Unfortunately, he is so far from giving any such thing, that his speech rather seems to prove the existence of a good deal of confusion in the Parliamentary official mind.

Speaking as an official, and also as a shipowner, Mr. FORWOOD contrived to come, if not actually to, then to within touch of, a downright contradiction in terms on the subject of the protection of commerce at sea. We have his word for it that hard-headed practical men in the shipping business do not expect that any fleet can protect the 8,000 British ships on their homeward-bound voyages, and the 8,000 outward-bound vessels. This is good and self-denying of them; but then, on the other hand, they do expect, and have a right to demand, that "we shall provide a fleet more "than sufficient to watch, and I hope destroy, every war "vessel of a possible enemy." This is quite a different story; and how does Mr. FORWOOD suppose that the second of these things can be done without including the first? We should be glad to know that we have a fleet capable of watching and destroying every possible enemy. If it is there its existence can surely be demonstrated. Mr. FORWOOD declares that in 1891 England will have eighty sea-going cruisers, as against fifty-nine of other Powers. This practice of comparing what we will have with what others will have a few years hence is rather misleading at a time when war may break out in a week. But, even if it is allowed, on what does Mr. FORWOOD base his statement? It is only a few days since Lord CHARLES BERESFORD was making a very different estimate; and both cannot be right. The melancholy truth is that all these estimates are utterly fallacious; for on each side ships are included or ruled out according to the views of the gentleman who makes them. Nobody has yet settled what a "sea-going cruiser" really means, nor what amount of speed it ought to possess, nor what degree of slowness or other weakness ought to cause a ship to be struck off the active list. If we may read a little between the lines of Mr. FORWOOD's speech, it would seem that the Admiralty itself is not quite sure in its own mind that our force of cruisers is sufficient. All this talk, at least, about the difficulty of knowing what the protection of commerce would be in practice looks very much as if the official mind was terribly uncertain. The course to take, supposing this to be so, would seemingly be to build many more cruisers, and that quickly, and moreover to build them up to the level of the Reina Regente, which has just steamed from Glasgow to Ferrol at the rate of nineteen knots an hour. This course, however, is not to be taken. We have pleasing official comparisons instead, and we doubt whether professional criticism is of sufficient calibre to drive the Admiralty out of its position. It is some consolation to be reminded by Admiral FANSHAWE that the quarrel between the department and the officers is not new, and that we have got along in spite of it. The Admiral quotes some figures of Sir JOHN BARROW's in the Appendix to the Life of ANSON to show that in 1838 the navy was relatively stronger than it is now. He does not add that Sir JOHN collected those statistics in order to answer naval officers who were publishing pamphlets to show that the French were getting ahead of us, and that the very Russians were preparing a fleet in the Baltic at which we might tremble. Perhaps some future Admiral FANSHAWE will quote Mr. FORWOOD to crush some future Lord GEORGE HAMILTON.

THE SESSION TO EASTER.

THE first six weeks of the Session have been fully occupied, first with party squabbles and afterwards with large projects of legislation. Little more than a fortnight was devoted to repetition within the House of Commons of the invectives which had been delivered on a hundred platforms during the recess. All that remains in the general memory is the strength of language characteristic of the Irish Nationalists and their English allies, and the impression that both in the goodness of his cause and in his own growing skill and vigour Mr. BALFOUR was a match for his assailants. From his colleagues, with the occasional exception of Mr. GOSCHEN, he received but little assistance in debate. Perhaps they thought it useless to prolong a controversy in which it was difficult to say anything new; but it must be confessed that most of the Ministers in the House of Commons are not distinguished as Parliamentary gladiators. Mr. STANHOPE and Lord GEORGE HAMILTON display much ability in defending the administration of their respective departments. Mr. RITCHIE has founded a reputation on his exposition of the complicated Local Government Bill, and Mr. GOSCHEN has only one superior as a debater on either side of the House. Mr. SMITH, who has never professed to be an orator, has succeeded beyond expectation as leader. Good sense, good temper, and knowledge of business and of the rules of the House appear to be popular qualities. On the other side, Mr. GLADSTONE, Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT, and Mr. PARNELL have directed many attacks against the Government. Even the political enemies of Mr. GLADSTONE appreciate the unabated energy with which he takes a principal part in debate, and animates his party. His chief lieutenant's powers of debate and declamation still suggest a feeling of regret that he should not have taken service on the other side. Mr. PARNELL has on two or three occasions superseded his irresponsible subordinates; and they have been compelled under his authority to suspend their habits of obstruction. Mr. O'BRIEN was exceptionally favoured by permission to expound his personal experiences and his devices for evasion or defiance of the law. His speech was not without rhetorical merit; but its most remarkable peculiarity was the reception which it met from the official Opposition. Mr. GLADSTONE ostentatiously exhibited his admiring sympathy with the vituperator of Mr. BALFOUR, although only two or three years have passed since he was himself denounced by the same foul-mouthed declaimer under the nickname of WILLIAM JUDAS GLADSTONE. Forgiveness of injuries may sometimes be a virtue, but not when the pardon of a libeller is purchased by his not less scandalous calumnies on the enemy of his former victim.

After the experience of last year, the waste of two or three weeks of the Session almost formed a topic of congratulation. The debates on the Address conveyed no particle of information to hearers or readers, but it was felt that they might have been indefinitely prolonged. The Government was anxious to introduce several important measures, and for once Mr. GLADSTONE and his followers concurred in their laudable desire. The Opposition hoped, and still hopes, by facilitating legislation to loosen the alliance between the Conservatives and the Liberal-Unionists, and perhaps to create a schism in the Ministerial party. When the leaders of the Opposition announced their purpose of discontinuing obstruction during the present Session they had no means of knowing whether the Local Government Bill would be founded on household suffrage. If the Government, having once determined on a great organic change, had fallen into the mistake of making it incomplete, Mr. GLADSTONE and Mr. PARNELL would have justified their foresight by pouncing on a fatal defect in the measure. They must now content themselves with the chance of the rejection of the Bill by the party which naturally regards it with dislike or regret. Mr. LONG's speech at Devizes may probably have shown them that they are about to incur a second disappointment; but they have still some possibilities in reserve. Notice has been given by a professed Liberal-Unionist of a resolution for the inclusion of Ireland in the Bill; and the injudicious application of the measure to the metropolis may probably, unless the obnoxious clauses are withdrawn, furnish occasions for formidable attacks on the Government. On the other hand, it must be remembered that the Radicals cannot openly condemn the principle of a measure which they only disapprove because they would gladly have proposed it themselves if they had been in office. Their course would have been simpler if the Government had abstained from sweeping legislation. That their hostility is in no degree abated was proved by Sir CHARLES RUSSELL's unwise attempt to derive party profit from the Trafalgar Square riots. The considerable majority by which the motion was rejected imperfectly represented the contemptuous disgust with which the respectable part of the community regarded the patronage of disorder. It was wholly unnecessary to inquire whether any mob assembled on political pretexts had an indefeasible right to the monopoly of public thoroughfares. If the law had been so absurdly defective, the first duty of the Government would have been to pass a remedial Act.

The Ministers have made a good beginning of the Parliamentary year; but their supporters must not forget that they have taken upon themselves large responsibilities which they have still to discharge. Mr. RITCHIE has put on his harness and shown that it fits him; but he will be too prudent to boast till he has put it off. His Bill was printed and circulated a few days ago, and the immediate impression of those who have attempted to study it is that it is difficult to understand, and more difficult to estimate at its true value. The reception with which the general scheme has met must have satisfied the Government of its wise discretion in following the precedent of the Municipal Corporations Act. The social and material differences between towns and rural districts can scarcely be elucidated by discussion. No political prophet can foresee whether the gentry will be willing to take part in county administration, or whether they will be chosen for local office by the constituencies. Conjectures in these and similar subjects will supply little matter for debate. To many possible objections it will be a sufficient reply that any provision which may be impugned has been taken from the Corporation Acts. One argument for the Bill will perhaps not be publicly urged. A main cause of the tolerable success of urban Corporations has been the great administrative ability of many of their permanent officers. The counties will, if their Councils are well advised, spare neither trouble nor expense in obtaining the services of the best professional advisers. The Town-clerks of the great provincial cities are the depositories of municipal and local tradition, and when, as is generally the case, they possess considerable ability, they have in their hands the training and the guidance of successive generations of their nominal employers. Clerks of the peace or County-clerks ought to have equal qualifications and to exercise the same beneficial influence. Other officers, such as surveyors and architects, possess similar opportunities, and it is an important consideration that the paid staff for the most part stands comparatively apart from political conflicts. A lawyer or engineer who is worth his salt regards professional considerations as prior to party or prejudice. An elected councillor is more likely to be an agitator, a jobber, or perhaps a fanatical bigot. There is too much reason to fear that the nominees of temperance factions or of their opponents may be preferred at elections to the best men of business.

The only important Acts which have been passed are Mr. GOSCHEN's Bills for the Conversion of the Debt. In point of form they are classed among legislative proceedings, but they are really official measures. The credit of the remarkable success which has been achieved belongs to Mr. GOSCHEN, and probably, in part, to the skilled officials whom he must have consulted. When the CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER and the City are agreed the community at large accepts their authority, and Parliament is conscious of its own incapacity to review the action of the competent authorities. Mr. CHILDERS with creditable candour acknowledged the superior skill and good fortune of a successor who had, as he truly said, taken advantage of more favourable circumstances. Purists in search of a ground of objection were obliged to content themselves with a conscientious scruple as to the small payment to be made to bankers. The pittance was called a commission, and some commissions of an entirely different kind are illegitimate and even fraudulent. Rigorous Parliamentary logicians consequently arrived at the conclusion that the payment without which the whole scheme might have broken down was analogous to the present which a tradesman sometimes makes to his customer's butler. Mr. GOSCHEN was probably much more anxious to learn the decision of the Fundholders than to satisfy his House of Commons critics. The quotations of the Stock Exchange must soon have satisfied him of the absence of all impediment to his operations. His Budget will certainly pass, probably with some alteration; but he will not meet with the same unanimity which was allotted his measure of Conversion. Mr. GLADSTONE may perhaps have exhausted his limited store of indulgence to his adversaries, and Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT will wish to remind the House that he also has been Chancellor of the Exchequer. It may be doubted whether either of them will produce an apter criticism than Mr. CHAPLIN's broad assertion that no occupant of the Treasury Bench knew a horse from a cow. If the Ministers had cultivated rural sympathies, they would perhaps have induced Mr. GOSCHEN to remit the tax upon wheels and on waggons, which will irritate and annoy every farmer in the kingdom. The resident in the country will be still more troubled by a plague of vagrants, affecting to pursue the occupation of unlicensed hawkers; but it is not necessary on the present occasion to discuss the details of the Budget. If the Ministers can end the Session, four or five months hence, as creditably as they have begun it, they will have done much to justify and confirm their position.

WOMEN AND WORK.

THE pretty antithetical view of the labour market expressed in the burden "Men must work and women "must weep" is already utterly discredited. Masterful parents, and still more masterful single ladies, have gathered in overwhelming voice to spurn the base conclusion of the poet. The generous columns of the Daily Telegraph during the week are given over to eloquent and convincing letters from all sorts of people intent on showing that women must work. There is a fine practical tone about the majority of the correspondence on "Our Daughters." A little wailing here and there, and perhaps a touch of despair, but never a hint of weeping, is discernible in these frank and suggestive revelations of struggling worth. It is not a little remarkable that Mr. WALTER BESANT's article on the Endowment of the Daughter, in Longman's Magazine, meets with scant approval. Perhaps it is due to misapprehension of his views, or it may be the natural indignation of the self-reliant, that Mr. BESANT's scheme of endowment is considered by one writer as "too Utopian," while another expresses little sympathy with him because he "regrets "that woman must work." Almost all these good people who discuss "Our Daughters" agree on this point. They say in the clearest language "Women must work." Some go further by inferring that women must work even if they compel some men to give place to them. Now, Mr. BESANT does not say that women must not work. He laments the necessity, if it exists. By his scheme of deferred annuities, readily obtainable on easy terms, he shows a preferable way to relieve burdened households. He would have girls work, if they desire to work, but "[illegible] not "—because they must." Some of those who [illegible] to Mr. BESANT do not appear to have mastered his [illegible]. Others think there exists a limitless field for the [illegible] of single women in the professions and trades. Others [illegible] imagine that the problem is solved by girls obtaining clerkships at lower salaries than young men receive, forgetting that the united family income is lowered and not raised by this cheapening process. If ever young women succeed in filling mercantile offices and the like, it can only be by accepting inferior wages and at the expense of their brothers. It is well enough in fathers of seven or eight daughters to show a smiling face, but parents blessed with a better regulated quiver might well quail at the prospect. Indigent gentlewomen when they write to the papers become by a natural transition indignant gentlewomen. One enthusiastic lady wanders from the subject with the laudable desire to interpret a recent letter from Mr. RUSKIN on the unmanliness of what she scornfully calls the "nobler" sex. Another—surely a hopeful soul—agrees with "the "lady who writes so nicely from Brockley" in wishing to promote a conference on the subject of woman's work. Here, again, it would seem that Mr. BESANT's services enjoy but slight renown in the suburbs. Many women with loving hearts are wanted to devise some plan that would give women "a fair chance." The proposition is exquisitely vague, and is not likely to lead to anything but a new Babel.

What is meant by "a fair chance" is tolerably evident, to judge from the greater number of these spirited correspondents. Employers should be prepared to regard women competing for work with men as equal to them in capacity and endurance. Something more is meant than that "general intelligence" which Mr. BESANT regards as the possession of the average girl. And young men, moreover, must brace themselves for the arduous struggle with an Orinoco rush of what a brutal "Single Man" calls "female "labour." We are threatened with the worst of all conceivable forms of competition. "The men are arm'd, and "for the fight prepare; And now we must instruct and arm "the Fair." There seems to be a general impression that women are handicapped by certain artificial restraints or antiquated prejudices which must one day be swept away. Few writers in the discussion on "Our Daughters" refer to natural disabilities or to their willingness or obligation to work for lower wages than are commanded by men. No one is better qualified to instruct and arm parents and daughters alike than Mr. BESANT, but he hesitates to encourage young women to engage in a conflict that can only end in disaster to the majority of them. "If," says Mr. BESANT, "we open the Civil Service to women, we take so "many posts from the men which we give to the women "at a lower salary." And what is true of the Civil Service is true of all kinds of clerkships in the commercial world. Should this kind of competition become general and successful, the benefit to people with large families of boys and girls would be extremely doubtful. The strange case, cited by "A Single Man," of the male clerk ousted by a cheaper German or young lady, "possibly through "no fault of his own," might, after being common enough, become in the end impossible by the sheer repression of the man. Mr. BESANT lays proper stress on the limits of competition. His scheme for the endowment of daughters is perfectly feasible, as well as a sound precautionary measure. The purchase of the small annuity he cites, as an example of what it is in the power of most parents to effect, would provide a genuine stay for a young woman who is obliged to work. It would be an excellent stimulus, and inspire courage and confidence. Mr. BESANT observes, with excellent force, that it took many years to persuade people of "the duty of life insurance." It may take as long to make his scheme of endowing daughters acceptable to men with large families; but we cannot doubt it will, in the end, have excellent results.

M. FLOQUET'S CABINET.

THE sudden fall of M. TIRARD's Ministry and the formation of a new Cabinet by M. FLOQUET are, no doubt, conspicuous events enough, but they have changed nothing in the position of affairs in France. At the outside, they only note progress. It has been the French custom for long to upset somebody whenever anything unpleasant happens or is discovered. M. FERRY was turned out of office because a column of French troops had been roughly [illegible] in Tonquin in the course of carrying out a policy [illegible] approved of by the Chamber. M. GRÉVY was [illegible] because certain scandals in which nobody [illegible] personally concerned were discovered by [illegible] of course that the election in the [illegible] of M. TIRARD. Nothing could be more annoying than that Gen. [illegible] should start up from the box he was suppos[illegible] into tight. The event was most unpleasant to the [illegible] the Chamber, and as it could not get at General Bou[illegible] or the voters of the Aisne, it knocked down M. TIRARD, [illegible] after all, was only put there to be knocked down. The parti[illegible]cular question on which he was upset matters little. Four-and-twenty hours earlier eight Republican deputies out of ten would unquestionably have declared that there was no need for a revision of the Constitution; but on Saturday the Chamber was suffering from incipient hysterics. It was disposed to tear its cap, and scream at the maids. So it voted for a revision, and would have voted for anything else which was likely to produce a crash, and so relieve its nerves. In a week or less it will probably be whooping on the hearth-rug, and will remain there till it is revived by a bucket of cold water.

Only an extreme dearth of other matter could justify the use of more than a very little type on such a subject as the character and prospects of M. FLOQUET's Ministry. This gentleman has been marked out for the place of Premier for some time, mainly because the French, who are a very conservative people in their habits, have been accustomed of late years to think that the Presidency of the Chamber entitles the occupant of the chair to high office, and gives him some mysterious superiority. Nothing else is known of him to justify any confidence in his capacity. The most remarkable incident in his life supplied M. HALÉVY with a model for the great feat performed at Rome by the immortal M. CARDINAL. His colleagues have all given their measure or are absolutely obscure office-seekers. M. PEYTRAL, Minister of Finance, has amply proved himself an especially incompetent financier. M. GOBLET, who goes to the Foreign Office, has established a character for bad manners and bad temper. The jerky frivolity of M. LOCKROY, the honest nullity of Admiral KRANTZ, and the obscurity of all the others, except one, are familiar. The one exception is, however, considerable. M. DE FREYCINET goes to the War Office—to keep MM. PEYTRAL and GOBLET in countenance. This appointment is amazing, if any incident of contemporary French politics can amaze. M. DE FREYCINET is not only a civilian, which is of itself enough to disqualify him for the office in France, but his name is associated with the worst follies of the Provisional Government at Tours. There is probably not an officer in the French army who does not believe that M. DE FREYCINET's vanity and ignorant meddling with the generals in the field did much to aggravate the disasters of the army of the Loire. To appoint such a man to such a post at this time looks like the mere wantonness of folly. It is perhaps polite to comment on this Ministry's probable policy, but the politeness is entirely wasted. M. FLOQUET's Cabinet cannot live, and, therefore, it is superfluous to inquire what it will do. The Chamber is already so eager to begin pulling it down that the recess has been cut short, and the election of M. MÉLINE to the Presidency of the Chamber shows that the Moderates are already thoroughly well scared by the Radical victory. M. FLOQUET's Ministerial programme shows that he is a Radical prepared to abolish anything, and completely master of the stock phrases of his party. The recess will secure it a fortnight's life, and then the scrambling of a swarm of little parties, composed of fluent little men, will begin again and go on till a dissolution, regular or irregular, suspends it for a time. No government can possibly be conducted with such a body as the French Chamber. In general level of ability it is distinctly lower than, but in other respects it reproduces very fairly, the legislative body which smoothed the way for the Coup d'état of 1851. There are the same irreconcilable divisions, the same spirit of intrigue, the same stupid devotion to shibboleths, and, to complete the resemblance, there is "a man of destiny outside." It remains to be seen whether the country is so enamoured of this state of things as to agree with the deputies that "it should "continue and increase rather than that they, beautiful "Republican creatures, should cease to have the guidance "of it."

UNIONISTS ON THE SITUATION.

THAT "great but mistaken prophet," as the PRESIDENT of the BOARD of TRADE so well described him, Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT, has hardly honoured the public platform at all, we believe, since the delivery of his last imposing but infelicitous oracle. In this, no doubt, he is

If you have prophesied the almost imme- a political party, and it thereupon immedi- .s to display quite remarkable signs of increasing -and vigour, it is just as well to go into retirement a season, even though your very silence may cause a malicious political adversary to "wonder how you feel now." That, as Sir MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH has just told his constituents of West Bristol, is the sentiment which fills his mind as he reflects on Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT's present position—and which, it must be owned, is an extremely natural one in the circumstances. For, of course, it is not only the disastrous defeat of the prophet's electoral predictions which he has to contemplate, but also the highly disconcerting probability that the Parliamentary successes of the Government will, of themselves, tend to make these predictions fly wider and wider of the mark. If Doncaster and Deptford were so thoroughly satisfied with a Unionist Administration a month or so ago, when Ministers had had little more than time to show good intentions, what is likely to be the feeling of these and other constituencies now that Ministers can point to that list of legislative achievements to which Sir MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH was quite justified in referring the other night in such terms of pride? Probably the vote in the Gower Division of Glamorganshire supplies the correct answer to that question. The difference produced by the Ministerial exploits in legislation is likely to amount to this—that, whereas before those exploits the Unionist cause throughout England was fully holding its own, it is since then beginning to attract converts from Separation even in gallant little Gladstonian Wales.

We have no intention whatever of assuming the mantle which has slipped so untowardly from Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT's shoulder, and we therefore only throw out this last observation in a purely conjectural spirit. How the performances of the Government may be viewed by the electorate the next time it falls to any constituency to express an opinion is a question which we would rather leave it to events to settle. But, though we do not say that Ministers will command success at the polls in virtue of their services to the country in Parliament, we do not hesitate to agree with Sir MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH, Mr. CAINE, Mr. T. W. RUSSELL, and other legitimately rejoicing Unionists, that they, on that ground alone, and apart from their claims to credit as the restorers of law and order in Ireland, thoroughly deserve it. And in saying this we, for the moment, leave the Local Government Bill out of the question as a measure which has not yet reached a sufficiently advanced stage to justify positive assertions as to its future. It would be enough that Ministers have almost at a stroke accomplished the correction of those abuses in the House of Commons which have defied so many previous reforms of procedure; that they have, as Sir MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH says, successfully carried through the largest and most beneficial financial operation ever attempted by a Chancellor of the Exchequer in this present generation; and that they have, to quote Mr. CAINE, disposed of the largest surplus that has accrued for fifteen years, by fulfilling that hope of reducing the interest on the National Debt which Mr. GLADSTONE has so long cherished in vain. Unionists, whether Liberal, Conservative, or Radical, are justified in some modest exultation over a record which promises so well for the popularity of their common party. So pleasant is it to contemplate, that even Mr. T. W. RUSSELL has been mollified by the survey, and admits that the Government "has a "programme for Great Britain, of which he thoroughly approves." As to Ireland, he does not, he of course adds, profess to approve of some of the acts of the Government. He was against the appointment of Colonel KING-HARMAN as Under-Secretary; he regrets the action of Ministers in regard to "arrears of rent," and "their Land Commission Bill would "have to be greatly modified before it could be accepted by "the representatives of the Irish people." But, these drawbacks admitted, the Government, he was good enough to say, is "sound on the great question of the Union," and, though differing with them on these details of their administration, he did not think it his duty to obstruct their progress. In spite, that is to say, of their having declined to give an inequitable preference to the gombeen-man's claim on the defaulting tenant as against that of the landlord, and in spite of their having appointed Colonel KING-HARMAN Under Secretary instead of—well, instead of somebody better fitted for the post, Mr. T. W. RUSSELL does not think it his duty to transfer his support from them to a party which is pledged to break up the United Kingdom. Which for Mr. T. W. RUSSELL is a considerable concession.

To Mr. CAINE, as may be supposed, the latest legislation of the Government is the most acceptable. He positively basks in the political warmth which has been diffused by it over a Radicalism grown somewhat chilly from want of sustenance during the past twelve months. "Last Session," he said, addressing his constituents at Barrow, "the burden "of the bargain was felt most heavily by the Liberal-"Unionists; but this Session it was their turn to go lightly "rejoicing in the hope of the fulfilment of some of those "measures that had been the object of Liberal aspiration "for years past." We have no objection whatever to Mr. CAINE'S "going as lightly" as mental and physical conditions will allow, but we venture to object to his displaying such lightness of heart as is implied in his remark about "the disestablishment of the country squire." Of course in so strictly technical a sense of the phrase as that the justices of the peace are to be deprived of their ex officio right to administer county affairs, they may be said, and the class of country gentlemen from which they are principally, but by no means exclusively, drawn, may be said, to have been "disestablished." But if, and in so far as, that word is intended to convey any idea of effacement, of the annihilation of local influence and importance, we suggest to Mr. CAINE to consider whether the remark is not somewhat premature. He himself notes with satisfaction that Sir RICHARD PAGET, "the typical Tory country "squire, warmly approved the main features of the Bill," and it would be superfluous generosity on his part to suppose that Sir RICHARD PAGET was merely patriotically rejoicing over the exclusion of his own order from local public life. If Mr. CAINE holds—we put it hypothetically, for his language does not necessarily imply it—that, after the Local Government Bill is passed, he will hear no more of the "squires" in the work of county administration, we cannot do better than refer him to the opinion expressed on the same subject by an authority of so much more weight, with all respect to Mr. CAINE, than himself on such a point, as Sir MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH. We are not without doubts of our own as to the extent to which the county populations themselves will benefit by the proposed changes; but we entirely sympathize with the spirit in which Sir MICHAEL HICKS BEACH and Mr. WALTER LONG counsel the existing controllers of county administration to accept it; and we are disposed to think that it is, not the rulers, but the ruled, who have most reason for anxiety as to the results of the reform. As regards the prospects of the former, there is undoubtedly very great force in Sir MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH's remark that men who have taken a prominent part in Quarter Sessions, or as Chairmen of Finance Committees of their counties, are constantly chosen under household suffrage by those whose local affairs they manage to represent them in the House of Commons. "Depend upon it," continued the speaker, "that, if they continue in the future, as I believe they will, "to work for their country as they have done in the past, "they will be as active as ever and more powerful in county "government as members of a County Council than ever "they have been as members of Quarter Sessions." We sincerely hope that these anticipations may prove well founded, and we certainly quite agree that the surest way of fulfilling them—indeed, that an essential condition of their fulfilment—is for the English squires to accept the legislation of the Government in the spirit which Sir MICHAEL HICKS BEACH himself shows, and which he recommends to them.

POPES AND BISHOPS.

IT is at any rate congruous that ecclesiastical subjects should be discussed at Easter, and two of the subjects which have helped to fill the daily newspapers, at a time when it is necessary for daily newspapers rather to look about for filling materials, have been very ecclesiastical. Into some parts of the discussion about renewing regular relations with the Vatican it is not necessary to enter. The statutable and historical aspect of the question is of less than usual importance, though it is quite natural that Lord GRANVILLE and other persons who can say pars fui should take trouble to set it in what they conceive to be the true light. But the question is really one which requires almost a minimum of historical considerations, though it certainly requires a maximum of consideration of actual political facts. The POPE is not, and, except in some entirely changed order of things, is not likely to be, a temporal Sovereign; nor, though we know there are some not despicable judges who think differently, is he likely soon to be the head of a world-wide political organization of any kind. What he is is something very different; but, as it happens, something almost as important to us. He is the spiritual head, with a direct power of interfering in organization not wholly spiritual, of a large and, fortunately, for the most part very loyal section of HER MAJESTY'S subjects in England, of a very much larger and, unfortunately, very disloyal section of HER MAJESTY'S subjects in Ireland. It is idle to say that the QUEEN is ecclesiastically and spiritually, as well as civilly, the head of these persons as well as of members of the Churches of England and Ireland. It may have been a very great pity that that conception was ever given up; but by Catholic Emancipation it was given up, and it is absurd not to recognize the fact. The recognition of it leads straight to the conclusion that it is in the highest degree unpractical to have no formal means of communication with the POPE, and both undignified and inconvenient to have to supply the want of such communications by extemporized, irregular, and anomalous agencies.

The objections offered to the regularization of the position in some Gladstonian quarters are, of course, not surprising; it is more remarkable that they seem to have found an echo in quarters where political loyalty and political intelligence are less questionable. For the whole thing comes to this—that you never gain anything, and never can gain anything, by blinking accomplished facts. No Englishman wants the help of the POPE in governing Ireland; but he must be a rather foolish Englishman who, because of a point of etiquette about præmunires, or out of antediluvian Protestant hatred of the Scarlet Woman, or out of petulant touchiness as to "interference," fails to see that it would be a very good thing if the Government of the country could have such a say in the appointment of Irish Roman Catholic bishops as every foreign country has, and that some part, at any rate, of the present woes of Ireland are due to the childish system of pretending not to see the POPE which has prevailed so long. At present the Irish Roman Catholic hierarchy, no doubt with honourable exceptions, is the very worst example of an organized priesthood to be found anywhere in the world, from Thibet to Paraguay—ignorant, prejudiced, disloyal to the State, given to the constant countenancing of vices and crimes far more heinous than the vices and crimes with which of old time certain priesthoods have been chargeable, or at least charged. Nor is it the POPE'S fault. He hears the lies; we will not tell him the truth. He has the mischievous persons presented to him for selection; we will not help him to reject them and choose the good ones. And so we naturally get prelates of a well-known type, with the natural further result that the characters and sentiments of such prelates are reflected and exaggerated downwards till we come to those disgraces to Christianity and to humanity who sometimes figure at evictions and on platforms. That all this could be stopped at once, or even stopped in course of time, by accrediting an envoy to the POPE, is, of course, impossible; it is at least equally impossible that some good should not be done by such a proceeding. To represent the attempt to purify the present source of infection as a confession that we cannot govern Ireland is almost as unreasonable as to represent the anxiety of a householder to prevent the pollution at the source of a stream that runs through his garden as a confession that he cannot keep his own premises clean. We cannot keep Romish priests out of Ireland; we can, at least if we choose, exercise some influence to prevent the belief that the patronage of sedition, murder, and robbery is a passport not only to popularity at home, but to favour at Rome. If, as Colonel WARING'S letter seems to show, it is the fact that the offence given to the Protestants of the North would be greater than the advantage gained in securing, at any rate to some extent, the exclusion or discouragement of disreputable clergy in the South and West, that, of course, would be a reason for pausing. But it would be a reasonable argument, like the arguments for the innovation, and not, like the confession-of-weakness argument and the foreign-potentate argument, utterly unreasonable.

It is not a long step from the POPE to Lord GRIMTHORPE, because both are, according to some good authorities, infallible; nor is it a long step from the POPE to the English Bench of Bishops, because both, according to other good authorities, cannot possibly do anything right. Perhaps we should count Lord GRIMTHORPE himself among both our sets of authorities; it is certain that he always worries a bishop with as much natural-enemy feeling as SYDNEY SMITH himself, though with considerably less wit and good temper. At any rate, he is a good deal less at sea here than in his unlucky apologies for homœopathy or homœopathists. We are not far from agreeing with him in his summary condemnation of the disciplinary legisla the Church is concerned of the last half-cent is certainly right in many of his fault-findings measure now before Parliament. It has a bad hist all ways, from its not indistinct origin in the mong. Church reform schemes of the present Archbishop of CANTERBURY to its latest appearance in the House of Lords last month. But we are entirely unable to share Lord GRIMTHORPE'S extraordinary jealousy, less explicable than that of SYDNEY SMITH himself, of episcopal authority as such. The talk about the Bishop "wanting to get rid of "him [a clergyman] for other reasons" is what, if it had been used by somebody else, and if Lord GRIMTHORPE were criticizing it, Lord GRIMTHORPE would himself certainly call "nonsense." To begin with, bishops are seldom fiends and not always fools; in the second place, in a modern diocese there are far too many clergymen for a bishop to have, except in very exceptional circumstances, any personal prejudices against individuals; and, in the third place, with newspapers and suchlike things about, a case of persecution or oppression is certain to be even more awkward for the bishop who "gets rid" than for the clergyman who is got rid of. And if a bishop is not to have a part, and a very considerable part, in managing and disciplining his diocese, we really do not see why there should be bishops at all or what they exist for. It is doubtless very discreditable to English law that the present methods of getting rid of clergymen who are in different ways a scandal or a nuisance or a burden to the Church should be so slow, so costly, and so ineffective. Lord GRIMTHORPE has shown, what was not difficult to show, that the last device for curing this state of things is a bad device. But that is not the same thing as providing a better. We are neither bound nor prepared to draft a better ourselves offhand. Yet we certainly think that when it is found it will not be found in curtailing the bishop's authority in any way, but in enlarging it very considerably, and providing at the same time that the bishop shall be under complete and prompt responsibility for its exercise.

THE CAUCUS AND ITS CHILDREN.

WE are of course disposed, in the Unionist interest alone, to welcome the action which has just been taken, at Mr. CHAMBERLAIN'S instance, by the Executive Committee of the National Radical Union. Judging from the accounts given of the present composition of the Divisional Councils of the Birmingham Liberal Association, it was certainly high time that the Liberal-Unionists should withdraw from that body. Now that their representation upon these Councils is reduced to absolute insignificance, it would lead, as Mr. CHAMBERLAIN pointed out, to very mischievous misconceptions if they were to remain. Were they to do so, or at least were they to continue to take part in the proceedings of the Association, the country would imagine, whenever they brought forward their resolutions and amendments for certain defeat, that the result of the voting gave correct indications of the strength of Liberal-Unionism in Birmingham. On the other hand, to continue nominal members of the body, and to absent themselves from its deliberations, would produce practically the same effect. The public would infer, and infer rightly, that they did not oppose the resolutions of the Separatists because they were too weak to do so; and from this, of course, the same mistaken deduction would be drawn as to their corresponding weakness in the constituency. There was undoubtedly only one wise course open to them—namely, to withdraw definitively from a body which misrepresents their opinions, and through them, as they contend, the opinion of the people of Birmingham, and to form a new Liberal-Unionist Association of their own for the town, and to allow the old Association to sink to its proper level of a "mere Home Rule and "Parnellite organization."

But, while we view the action with approval from a purely Unionist point of view, we must confess to regarding it also with some satisfaction as a further proof of the essential vices of the electioneering "machine." Mr. CHAMBERLAIN stoutly contends that the test of 1886 is still trustworthy, and that the Liberal-Unionists still constitute a great majority of the Liberal party. We see no reason whatever to doubt that this contention is well founded. Every sign by which we are usually able to read the political mind of the country goes to show that it is. Yet, although Liberal-Unionism still holds its preponderance in the country, and though this preponderance was in few places

...u and significant as it was in Birmingham, yet ...atists in that constituency have contrived to them from all share, or from any share worth speaking of, in the representation. How has this been done? For our part we confess that we do not very much care how it has been done. It is good enough for us that the "Association" system has been discredited by such a thing having been proved to be possible. Mr. CHAMBERLAIN, of course, has his own explanation of it. "He would only say "that the votes for the Divisional Councils had been carried "against them at sparsely attended meetings into which "their opponents had imported bodies of adherents, many "of whom were non-Liberals, non-voters, or under age; and "some of whom were induced to attend by means which he "would not describe, but would only say of them that they "were non-political." These, it may be said, are irregularities which, if they occurred, are not due to any inherent faults in the system. Possibly that may be so; but it is sufficient for our purpose if, by these or by any other means, the organization shows itself, as it continually does show itself, apt to yield a totally false impression of the political opinion of constituencies, and to give an answer only to the question which party contains the most unscrupulous and dexterous practitioners of the arts of wirepulling and intrigue. The Gladstonians may reject Mr. CHAMBERLAIN's explanation, but they cannot for a moment pretend that the machine has not, somehow or other, worked in a fashion which, however satisfactory to themselves, is absolutely misleading as an index to opinion. This success has been too great; for, since they cannot suppose that the "reaction" they prate about can really have spread so far as to prevent any Liberal-Unionists from obtaining a seat on the Divisional Council "except by accident," such a complete rout of their opponents would, if genuinely brought about, involve an inference a little too good to be true. We feel safe, therefore, in preferring our own inference—which is that the Caucus is devouring its children.

A CASE OF ARBITRATION?

THE fable of the fly on the wheel was written in vain for very many, and notably for the Peace and Arbitration Union. It may possibly be that, if the members of the remarkable body had read the instructive story of the insect, they would not have solemnly informed Mr. CHAMBERLAIN that the Society "had been in existence forty years, and "during the course of its life there had been no fewer than "sixty cases successfully settled by arbitration." A very good-natured interpreter might persuade himself that the Society does not necessarily see any connexion between its own existence and the happy settlement of those sixty disputes; but it is to be feared that he would therein flatter the Peace and Arbitration Union. This great body is much more likely to be firmly convinced that it has in some way persuaded Governments which never heard of its existence not to fight over things not thought worth fighting about. If it were not very cocksure of its own importance, it could hardly have sent a deputation to Highbury, near Birmingham, last Wednesday, to congratulate Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. It obviously never expected to be met with the inquiry—Who, in the name of ZERNEBOCK, art thou? Another explanation of its activity might be found in the desire of the Peace and Arbitration Union for a puff; but that would be malicious. The persons who form Societies of this kind are far too well assured of their own importance, and of the value of their favourite nostrum, to condescend to hunt for puffs. Self-satisfaction is good for something, after all.

The peculiar propriety of the Union's compliment to Mr. CHAMBERLAIN is patent from the fact that, whatever his negotiations were, they were not a case of arbitration. It is a mere detail that the negotiations can hardly be said to be complete yet, since the United States Senate has not ratified the treaty. The peculiar beauty of the Union's haste to score a success is independent of the ratification. It is due to the fact that there was no arbitration in the matter. Indeed, if any one is in search of a modern instance of the futility of that much-praised resource, he could hardly find a better than Mr. CHAMBERLAIN's mission. Both sides were too much in earnest, and had too much they were resolved not to surrender, to trust their case to a third party who might be "prejudiced or ignorant." This was the irreverent description given by Mr. CHAMBERLAIN himself as possibly applicable to that virtuous person the arbitrator. He used it while he was explaining to the deputation that it was friendly negotiation, and not arbitration, which had settled this business. What his mission proves is that, when two States see no sufficient reason for going to war, and have a dispute to settle, they can do it by peaceful arrangement. This we knew before. Mr. CHAMBERLAIN gave the fussy Society such an excellent snub that one is sorry to find him saying very weakly that "in the course of the last fifty years great progress has "been made in the direction we desire"—"we" being apparently he and the deputation. Fifty years takes us back to 1838, a peaceful time; but since '48 great wars have occurred every six years or so, and all Europe is now going about in expectation of a greater than any of them. During this time, too, there have been quite a respectable list of treasons, privy conspiracies, and rebellions in half the States of the world, or more. Science has been actively at work improving tools for slaughter, and has succeeded pretty fairly—certainly much better than any Arbitration Society. There is something exquisitely fatuous in the belief of these modern enthusiasts that they have discovered the beauty of peace. If they will read that excellent work, COXE's Life of Walpole, they will make the acquaintance of a statesman who sought peace without canting about it, and that successfully. Whether he took the most dignified, and in the long run most profitable, course is another question; but it does not lie in their mouth to condemn him. Then there was a monarch named JAMES I., who was fond of saying Blessed are the peacemakers, and acting on his favourite maxim. Neither did Queen BESS love war for war's sake. It may have escaped the notice of the Union that the Church of England has prayed for peace in our time for some centuries, but it is a fact. With the exception of a madman here and there, nobody does want war if he can obtain his object without it. Unfortunately, that is just the rub. There are some objects which cannot be obtained without fighting, and then we must needs fight, shocking as it may seem to Peace and Arbitration Societies.

THE COMMITTEE OF SUPPLY.

THE usually thin attendance in the House of Commons on the first night after a recess may give a certain additional dulness to its proceedings from the newspaper reader's point of view, but it is a circumstance upon which Ministers have, as a rule, some reason to congratulate themselves. On Thursday night it undoubtedly tended to the dispatch of public business in which fairly satisfactory progress was made. Progress, indeed, was the more satisfactory because the first vote which came before the House in Committee of Supply on the Civil Service Estimates is one upon which economists of the school of Mr. ARTHUR O'CONNOR, Mr. PICKERSGILL, and Mr. LABOUCHERE—alas! that such names should have to be coupled; but Mr. LABOUCHERE l'a voulu—could hold forth, if they liked, for an absolutely indefinite time. As it was, they tempered their strength with mercy, and, though as unreasonable as usual, were not unreasonably prolix. Mr. PICKERSGILL—"with much iteration," it is said by a Parliamentary summarist who evidently does not know what Mr. PICKERSGILL can do when he tries—demanded the opening of Hampton Court to the public. Mr. CREMER asked that provision should be made for visitors to Kew Gardens to obtain refreshments; and Sir GEORGE CAMPBELL, with much more reason, we admit, than his fellow-critics, complained of the condition of the trees in Kensington Gardens. Mr. LABOUCHERE, however, was of course the hero of the occasion, as he is in all such encounters with a wickedly wasteful and anti-popular Office of Works. He denounced the extravagant management of the Parks, and moved the reduction of the vote, on which he was defeated by a majority of 95 votes to 53. We are, of course, bound to assume that every beat of "the great heart "of the people" is faithfully responded to by a throb under Mr. LABOUCHERE's waistcoat. Were it not for this, we should have said in our blindness that anything less likely to be popular with the class of holiday-makers and pleasure-takers whom Mr. LABOUCHERE professes to represent than the whole body of his criticisms on the management of the Parks it would be difficult to imagine. Perhaps he touched the climax in objecting to the deer in Richmond Park. "Parks," he said, "were made for men and not for deer." With equal truth, as regards quality, apart from extent, of statement, it might be said that Parks were made for men and not for trees. It would be possible, no doubt, by a sufficiently extensive clearance of oaks, beeches, and chestnuts in Richmond Park to render it capable of accommodating many more persons than it can at present, and, at the same time, to effect a considerable saving of expense. Will Mr. Labouchere bring forward a motion to that effect next year?

Once more the question of the deficient accommodation of the House has come up for its usual abortive discussion, Mr. Labouchere being again the principal exponent of a grievance which is no doubt, in a certain sense, a real one. The "let-it-alone" side of the case was, however, put by Mr. Addison for the first time, so far as we are aware, with considerable point and freshness; and possibly the considerations which he urged may not strike members the less forcibly from having been put forward at the particular moment. Mr. Addison and others content with the existing state of things have, in any case, a winning game; for, as Mr. Plunket's reply indicated, there is not the least likelihood of any extensive structural alterations in the House being adopted within any reasonable period of time, unless much greater pressure is brought to bear; and, while the practical inconvenience from the grievance is so rare as it is, this pressure is not likely to be forthcoming.

ALPINE WINTER PASTIMES.

It is hardly possible to conceive of a contrast greater than that which really exists between the deathlike stillness of the hamlets and the merry social life of the smaller Alpine towns in the winter months. In the latter, the whole of the educated classes are drawn together by the chilliness of the season. As work of all kinds is slack, there is plenty of time for amusement, and of this full use is made. This is particularly the case in places that form provincial centres and are fortunate enough to possess a garrison. The recruits who are enrolled in the autumn have to be drilled in order that they may be ready for the work of spring; but the real task of the Alpine regiments, which, for the officers, consists in laying down maps, in leading the men in larger or smaller parties over rocky heights, and in directing their evolutions in apparently pathless wildernesses, becomes impossible as soon as the first heavy snow has fallen, and little remains to be done after the routine of the day has been gone through. The courts of justice remain open; but clients prefer to postpone all business that will admit of delay to travelling for hours through the cold with the chance of being overtaken by a snowstorm before they can return, so that the judge and the notary are not exactly overworked. The great cattle-fairs are over, and when the timber-merchant has given proper orders for the removal and storing of his purchases, he may fold his hands till the spring has fairly come. The foresters are the only persons who seem to be really busy; for, though the work that falls upon the inspector of roads is occasionally very heavy, the daily work of his office is light, as no improvements or new constructions can be undertaken.

There is, therefore, plenty of leisure, and the German-Austrian likes to spend his leisure in a cheerful and sociable way. It is true there are places of the stamp described where discord is the order of the day, where the officers refuse to associate with the townspeople, the schoolmaster and the priest are in conflict, and the wives of the doctor and the notary are at daggers drawn. In such cases the very smallness of the society tends to embitter a quarrel, but they are comparatively rare, at least in Carinthia, where, for the most part, the inhabitants are too intent on enjoying their own lives to trouble themselves about vexing those of others.

The outdoor winter amusements are not very varied, and, to judge from some articles that appeared in the Saturday Review a few years ago, they must be very inferior to those of Canada, and much more primitive in their form. Of course where there are lakes there is skating, at least when a town lies near enough to render it probable that the expense of clearing the ice of snow and keeping the surface of preserved parts in due order will be paid. This is not so easy a matter as it at first seems. After the snow has been removed, the surface is usually too rough to attract visitors, and every night frost-blossoms form upon it which may charm the æsthetical passer, but do not appear in quite the same light to the skater who knows that every flower is formed round a small hole which, when the bright frost-leaves have been swept away, is not unlikely to trip him up in the execution of his finest designs. To render the skating-fields attractive, they must be marked off and carefully swept and watered every night. This is generally done by means of hand-buckets, but squirts are occasionally used to secure the perfect glassy equality of surface that skaters love after the rougher work has been done, or when the wear and tear of the day has not been great. Even the ballroom hardly affords such a license and convenient opportunity for flirtation as the skating-grounds, and so it is no wonder that they are popular, and that where lakes do not exist meadows are artificially inundated in order to afford the opportunity for a sport which is at once athletic and social. This is not a matter of great difficulty. When the earth is firmly frozen and the autumn snow has fallen, the latter has only to be firmly beaten down, and then carefully drenched with spring-water for a few days, to form an excellent skating-p. ponds have two advantages—no one can pos. them, and they usually lie close to an inn i. drinks may be procured, and to which one can with ease and a good grace if either the material or t. atmosphere of the outside world prove too chilly.

Sledging is another winter amusement. In such a place been described almost every one possesses a horse and sle.. and the mere suggestion that an excursion might be ma.. is enough to put all in motion. One after another they all start for the appointed goal, which is a village in which the wine is known to be good and the eating at least tolerable. Husbands bring their wives and fathers their daughters with them; and, if there is any doubt as to the nature of the entertainment, both wives and daughters bring hampers that fully supply the host's possible sins of omission. The quick drive through the cold air sharpens one's appetite. Wine is brought and coffee made; all the parties that sit at the long table seem a single family, and if there is a piano and a large room in the house the afternoon drive often ends in a dance that lasts till after midnight. When it breaks up a confusion generally ensues, but there seems to be a certain order in it, as the young people usually find themselves alone together in the same sledges, though their elders follow close behind.

Sometimes an amusement in which the ladies play a smaller part is the purpose and end of a sledging excursion that starts at an earlier hour and has been arranged for days beforehand. This time the object is to reach some village or inn that lies as near as possible to the head of a steep pass. Here the hand-sledges are unpacked, or, if anybody is unfortunate enough not to possess a vehicle of the hand, he hires one for a few pence. In structure these sledges are exactly the same as those used for bringing down timber from the mountains, but they are far smaller and lighter. As soon as every one is seated the race begins. Usually it is a mere rush downhill, in which the pleasure of rapid motion is rather enhanced by the probability of a collision and a consequent fall in the snow; but occasionally it is conducted on more serious principles. Two umpires are appointed, one of whom starts the racers, while the other is ready to receive them at the end of the course. Great care is taken that their watches should exactly agree with each other, as bets are often made against time, and the difference of a few seconds may decide a race on which considerable sums depend. In such cases the sledges are started separately, and the result is determined only by time. When the snow is in good condition a skilful sledger will cover his English mile in from four to six minutes, even on a winding road; and the course is usually at least a mile and a half, often considerably more. This speed can, however, only be obtained when the track is entirely free. If a vehicle happens to ascend the pass during the race, the drivers of the hand-sledges are bound by the laws of the road, and also by a care for their own necks, to run into the soft snow on the side of the way and let it pass, and this of course causes a considerable delay. Whether such chance hindrances are to be risked or taken into consideration in placing the winners is a matter that is always decided before the start. This sport is usually a great favourite with young officers.

Another and far more popular outdoor sport is Eisschiessen, Alpine curling, which may be played wherever skating is possible, though the two amusements cannot be carried on at the same place, even at different hours, as the skates roughen the ice. A court is cleared on a lake, or artificially formed in the way that has been above described. It must be at least thirty metres, or nearly thirty-three yards, in length; but if circumstances permit, as when it is situated on a natural lake or large-sized pond, at least forty metres, or above forty-three yards, of ice are cleared and prepared. The breadth of the courts differ; but it should never be less than three yards. At a few yards' distance from each end a piece is hewn out of the ice of about three inches in length and one and a half in depth. The back of the hole thus formed must be perpendicular, while the front gradually slopes upwards to the level of the court. It is intended to afford support for the right foot of the player, and must be in the centre of the course. At two or three feet behind these incisions at each end a cubic piece of wood is placed. It is named the pigeon, and is pushed aside from the end at which the game begins. Each player is furnished with two ice-sticks. These are circular pieces of hard wood about a foot in diameter, bound with heavy iron hoops. The smoother the bottom is the better; but the top may be ornamented according to fancy, if only it is surmounted by a straight, perpendicular handle. There is no law either as to weight or size; but the usual height of an ice-stick with the handle is about a foot and a half. Numerous wooden cubes, considerably smaller than the pigeons, but otherwise exactly like them, must also be at hand.

The regular game may be played by any even number of players from six upwards. Ten is usually thought to be the best, as it affords an opportunity for a variety of play, and yet does not render it necessary for any one to remain long unoccupied. Two parties of equal strength are formed, a mar or captain is chosen by each, and they take their places together at the same end of the court. The object of both is to place their sticks as near the pigeon at the other end as possible. Now, let us suppose that six players—A, B, C and X, Y, Z—engage in such a contest. A is the captain of the first and X of the second party. A therefore plays first, which is a slight disadvantage. He places his right foot firmly in the hole, lifts and swings his stick as much as he likes, which ...a then sends it gliding along the ice. His ... to bring his stick as near as he can to the ... place it in such a position as to render the ... the enemy difficult, if not impossible. X now ... endeavours either to displace A's stick, to put his ...er, or to knock the pigeon out of its place, so that the ...tage the other party has gained may be lost. As soon as ... first two shots have been fired, the two captains proceed to the other end of the ground and from thence direct the action of their followers. If X's stick is nearest to the pigeon, B and C must play their first sticks, and, unless one of them outdoes X, A must return to the other end to play his second. It is always the losing party that plays, and it may, therefore, happen that no member of a side except the captain plays—but this is a rare occurrence. At the conclusion of a game, when all the sticks of one side have been used, the captain of the losing party has a right to remove the first of his, to place one of the small wooden cubes in its place, and to try his luck once more. If he fails, the game is lost; if he succeeds, his opponents follow in due turn, and, if they are unsuccessful, their captain acts exactly as the first has done, and this shot of his decides who are the winners. It is, however, only the single nearest stick that counts.*

In artificial courts, a certain variety is lent to the game by the fact that there are sides and a back, so that in playing from one end it is impossible for the stick to go far beyond the mark, and in any case it is possible to calculate the rebound and thus sometimes to get behind the enemy. It will be clear that in both forms of the game heavy sticks in strong hands are a great advantage, as they can scatter all the lighter ones before them; but it is not every one who has the muscular strength to use them with certainty of aim.

Such are the chief outdoor winter pastimes of the higher Alps; they may easily be learned by a stranger, and most of them will afford him some amusement.

THE ABBOTSFORD CATALOGUE.

We have before us a very little pamphlet, "to be sold only at Abbotsford," but dated 1888, "edited by the Honble. Mrs. Maxwell Scott," and calling itself "A Catalogue of the Armour and Antiquities" which form so notable a part of the decorations of the "romance in stone and lime." Mrs. Maxwell Scott has done very well indeed to print this record, as she calls it, in a brief preface, of the "gabions" of Sir Walter, referring thereby to a term and an incident which all readers of her grandfather's admirable Life will recognize. And we can only suggest that she might have done still better to make the little book accessible at some London and some Edinburgh publishers as well as at Abbotsford itself. There are many collections of "curios" more extensive, more costly, more attractive to the virtuoso and the critic than this; there is none in England or in the world which has the same peculiar blending of divers sorts of interests. For it was formed, not out of the superfluity of a merely rich man, who finds dilettantism fashionable and directs into that channel a part, greater or smaller, of his superfluous riches; not out of the half-professional skill which buys that it may sell again; not out of the mere idle curiosity which buys anything that is, or that is labelled, curious. It represents the life's thought and the brain's expense of the greatest man of letters of this century, and of the one man of letters whom, in presence of unusually abundant details as to his personality, it is possible to love as much as one admires him. Every piece here, if not a tribute from some admirer of Scott's, is something that Scott planned or coveted, and that he got by means of the means that his genius obtained for him. And yet more than this, in the great majority of the items there is an actual connexion with some part of that vast structure of romance, which exhibits at once the kindest heart, the most fertile imagination, the most noble political sentiment, the richest humour, and (within a little) the sincerest pathos that have ever found themselves together in one human being since Shakspeare was buried at Stratford. In any other case the act chronicled here, which substituted on the day of Scott's funeral his own bust for Shakspeare's in a particular niche, would have been one of egregious folly. In this case only there might be said to be some excuse for it.

The main threads of interest, as one turns over the Catalogue, are two—the one connecting the objects with Scott's life, and the other connecting them with his works; but naturally these two "twist and twine." Those devotees of the Napoleonic legend who in France used to be so wroth with Scott's Napoleon might be indignant with his collection of blotting-book, pen-tray, and bee-clasps from that most inexhaustible source of curios in the world, the carriage looted after Waterloo. We do not know how far the getters-up of the forthcoming Stuart Exhibition will prevail over the guardians of the Abbotsford heirlooms; but few single collections can be richer in memorials of that family. Would a rigid critic admit "a silver-gilt ornament bearing the letters M R and the Lion of Scotland" as "Queen Mary's seal"? Perhaps; perhaps also not. And a "Piece of Queen Mary's Dress"? She had so many dresses; why should it not be? "Prince Charlie's Quaigh" with the glass bottom ("to guard against surprise," says the Catalogue, which does not seem to us certain) has a pedigree which the sternest frequenter of Christie's would hardly challenge; and there are many others of these agreeable drinking vessels with which, it may be remembered, Sir Walter used to astonish his Southern guests by sending round drams in them after dinner—an astonishment which would hardly come upon an Englishman now. Perhaps the Chinese paper of the drawing-room (respecting which minute directions, if we remember rightly, are given to Terry in the Letters) may be ranked as a curiosity. But this is not the kind of curiosity that one associates most with Abbotsford. The tortoiseshell cabinet of Montrose, which may once have held "He either fears his fate too much" itself in MS.; the mother-of-pearl cross, again assigned to the Mary of Maries; the sword, like the cabinet, the property of the Great Marquess—a sword which once belonged to Graham of Gartmore, these are the most characteristic items. Then there is Rob Roy's Sporran (this came through the somewhat well-known Mr. Train, which perhaps is for thoughts); the keys of Lochleven Castle, which may have been those that Roland Graeme threw into the lake; Rob Roy's gun (same which his son shot McLaren of Invernethy, with awkward consequences); the thumbikins which may have terrified Cuddie Headrigg, and the branks which are said to have incommoded the dying Patrick Hamilton. The two-handed swords which were the fruit of Anne of Geierstein, the keys of Selkirk Gaol and of the Heart of Midlothian itself; these, with those just mentioned, are only a few of the numbers. Many of them are familiar even to those who have not seen Abbotsford, by engravings in the later editions of the works, and by references in the notes. Almost every one may be said to refer in one way or another to some part of the genius that produced Waverley, and turned all the writing fellows of Europe for seventy years to this day, and for Heaven knows how much longer, into the writing of novels.

Then there are the curiosities which have interest less as having been collected by Sir Walter than as having been used by him; the double-barrelled gun (with the second barrel not juxtaposed, but superposed, after a fashion common enough in pistols but rarer in the longer weapon), the chairs, and desks, and writing-tables, so carefully planned; the toadstone amulet (sovereign against the malign, but certainly not in its possessor's case against the beneficent, influence of fairies), the silver-handled "tail" with which Scott, who had not some bookish persons' disgusting contempt of the book as a book, used, as Lockhart tells us, always to dust a volume after taking it down and before opening it (think of Wordsworth, ye Wordsworthians, and blush!); the belt and accoutrements in which he figured as a yeoman at those remarkable engagements which, on the spur of the moment and with doubtful veracity but true courtesy, he invented when the Czar asked him "where he had served."

And then, lastly, there are the pictures—none of them perhaps of the first interest as works of art, but scarcely in need of that interest. Here are the fancy sketches of Kirkpatr.. k Sharpe, of which Queen Elizabeth "dancing high and disposedly" is the best known, but which ought to be reproduced whenever somebody has the good taste to collect the works in pen and pencil of that very Rabelaisian or Lucianic person; the contemporary portrait of Claverhouse, which is so interesting to compare with the wonderful word-sketch in "Wandering Willie's Tale"; the supposed "after death" likeness of Mary. But there are one or two things that we miss, either because we have overlooked them or because they have been removed. Where is the silver vase which Byron sent to Sir Walter "full of dead men's bones" [from Marathon] and an autograph letter, and which the said Sir Walter was young enough to leave as it came, in his public rooms, with the result that some of his uninvited visitors, considerately leaving the dead men's bones, abstracted Byron's autograph? And where is the silver standish that he bought with his first fees, gave to his mother, and used after her death? But among things actually here, and in addition to what we have already mentioned, there is the Wallace chair (we own we don't care greatly about the Wallace chair), and a lock of Prince Charlie's hair, and Helen Macgregor's brooch (but Helen was not a nice person; we would rather have had something of Miss Die's), and a Burmese horoscope (let us hope it foretold the annexation which would have pleased Sir Walter), and Lely's Dryden, and Dryden's own Florimel—that is, being interpreted, Nell Gwynne—also by Lely, and the picture of Hinse of Hinsefeldt, not least memorable of cats, and broadswords and suits of armour innumerable, including one of the earliest crops ("very old landed," as the wine merchants say) from the ever-fruitful field of Waterloo.

We have said that the publication of this volume is a good deed; but there is a better, which Mrs. Maxwell Scott might do. It is now fifty years since Lockhart, with judgment which has never been surpassed, arranged her great-grandfather's biography. It is known, or at least confidently asserted, that there is at Abbotsford store of manuscripts and documents which in that arrangement were excluded, either out of proper deference to the feelings of persons then living, or simply because Lockhart's experience and critical acumen warned him against overloading a book already of very great length. We do not for one moment wish for the publication of such matter as that of which in one case Lockhart himself solemnly deprecated the publication; nor do we desire that anything should be added to which there can be the slightest objection. But there must be not a little which the lapse of time has rendered unobjectionable, and much which, superfluous then, would not be superfluous now. Whether this should be given in an independent form or in the form of a new edition of the Life, with additions, is of course a question for those immediately concerned. But we have ourselves long thought that such a new edition was called for. If there were no other reason, numerous books containing matter bearing more or less on the life of Scott have appeared since, and though Lockhart's work was so patient and thorough that no biographical fact of any importance escaped him, it was naturally impossible for him to foresee such later illustrations as have been given since his death. His "Scott" is at least as much a classic as Boswell's Johnson, and more time has passed since it was issued than passed between the first appearance of Boswell and Croker's edition thereof; while, with all respect to Johnson, it is impossible to put him on the same level with Scott. Filial reverence is sometimes accounted a Pagan virtue, but this we venture to think a corrupt opinion.

THE POMPADOUR.

FEW personages in the world's history have occupied writers so much as the humbly-born Jeanne Antoinette Poisson, wife of M. Le Normant d'Etioles, better known as Mme. de Pompadour. She wrote her autobiography, and, besides histories of her by Campardon, Mme. du Hausset (who occupied a position in her household), and others, she filled a considerable space in the books of what was to a great extent an age of memoir-writing. The name of Voltaire is connected with that of the Pompadour, about whom he composed a set of verses declaring that in her were united "Tous les arts, tous les goûts, tous les talents de plaire," to whom he dedicated Tancrède, and whose praise he sang under the name of Téone. (Afterwards in an edition of Pucelle he spoke of her differently, but that is by the way.) The Mémoires of the Duc de Richelieu, the Duc de Luynes, of the Marquis d'Argenson, of the President Hénault, the Comte de Maurepas, numerous Mémoires "Inédits" and "Secrets," the Vie Privée de Louis XV., and innumerable other volumes, of which the highly imaginative Chroniques de l'Œil de Bœuf is a specimen, deal with the Pompadour, and a full and succinct summary of her career is given by MM. Edmond and Jules de Goncourt. It was a perilous undertaking on the part of Brachvogel to write a play on the subject of the Pompadour, even if he borrowed his suggestions from Diderot, and, as is said, followed on lines which Goethe had planned; and, from one point of view, it is still more perilous in these days, when the facts of history are more generally known than they were in the days of Goethe, for English authors to adapt a work which deals with personages whose lives have been to a great extent laid bare. Many passages in the life of the Pompadour will never be known; but, if there had been any real foundation for the legend in which Narcisse Rameau figures (and it seems advisable to point this out; for, in spite of the evidence to the effect that Diderot invented the plot on which Brachvogel's play is founded, some writers have endeavoured to show that there was something in the story of "Le Neveu de Rameau"), Mme. du Hausset would have known, and would have written what she knew; for, though she contradicted the rumours as to the liaison between the Duc de Choiseul and her mistress, she was perfectly frank in stating what she knew, or believed, to be true.

In considering the play which Mr. W. G. Wills and Mr. Sydney Grundy have written we must forget French history apart from the broad facts that Mme. de Pompadour exercised supreme sway over the King, and was, as Macaulay remarks, "really the head of the French Government"; that the Duc de Choiseul was Prime Minister by favour of the King's mistress, and that Voltaire, with the humbler Diderot and Grimm, were to some extent courtiers as well as philosophers. An ignorance of anything more accurate than this is essential to a perfect enjoyment of The Pompadour. A recollection of facts and dates will show that what is represented as having taken place never occurred, and the legend of Eugène Lambert, the son of the poor mad player Rameau and his wife, subsequently the Pompadour, is the veriest fiction. We have our doubts about the wisdom of presenting any historical drama of a period about which authentic accounts exist, unless the rule be observed of dealing only with purely private matters which might reasonably have been supposed to escape even the memoir-writer. Thus we do not include such works as Mlle. de Belle Isle or Adrienne Lecouvreur, though we should have interdicted the writing of a drama which represents Louis XV. as absolutely subservient to the Pompadour up to the day before her death, and shows her dying suddenly of a broken heart during a fête in the gardens at Versailles. But these are considerations with which the great majority of playgoers will not concern themselves. They will want to know if the piece is impressive or entertaining; and if in some important particulars it falls short of that merit, it is a pleasure to admit that the authors have to a considerable extent justified their choice of a difficult subject. That previous works which have dealt with the period have been for the most part in the vein of comedy is no reason why graver pictures should not be placed on the stage—other, of course, than the reason aforesaid, that the events narrated never occurred, and that, therefore, the characters are represented in positions they could never have occupied; a circumstance which, again, detracts from the possibility of accurate portraiture. The first two of the four acts of The Pompadour are the best, for here the action is fresher and moves more naturally. Voltaire's introduction into the audience chamber at Versailles of the strange vagrant he has come across is in several ways striking from a purely theatrical point of view. Narcisse Rameau, as the distraught strolling player, mad for love of his lost wife, is called, presents an effective contrast, in his rags, to the dwellers in palaces, and the lines he has to speak are pointed and incisive.
as unduly restless in the part of Narcisse, warrant for this in the circumstance of the n.
though repose might be useful for stage purposes.
the Pompadour is also a well-contrived stage incident.
so effectually dominated the Court of King Louis m. been thoroughly realized by Mrs. Tree; but the charm o ing is undeniable, and there is sufficient dignity in the Pompa demeanour. The feebleness of the incident arises from the circu stance that all this scene, in which the Pompadour produces the Pope's dispensation, annulling the marriage of the King and Queen, is not only totally unwarranted, but altogether absurd, and it must be understood that it is only from the most theatrical standpoint that we can commend it. "The dream of my life is accomplished. There is now nothing between me and the throne!" is her cry as she proceeds to take her seat, but she recoils in horror, and falls to the ground with an exclamation of terror; for, as the hesitating courtiers step aside, Narcisse Rameau is seen sitting on the steps of the throne, a smile half vacant, half significant on his face. We note that this is described by one of the critics as "the worst of all possible situations," but to us it appears finely conceived if only we can forget the impossibility of such an occurrence in the formally ordered Court of Louis XV., and there is force in the dramatist's idea of utilizing Eugène Lambert in it for a double purpose—creating sympathy for him in his proper person as the lover of a devoted young girl, both being such staunch adherents of the Queen that he is ready to sacrifice his life in denouncing the favourite, and also, by causing the Pompadour to condemn him to death, making him the instrument of vengeance on his mother; for it is the knowledge that she has so condemned him which breaks her heart, after a scene borrowed from Hamlet. The introduction of Voltaire is justified for a dramatic reason, for it is he who has Rameau to play something like the flight of the false wife before the Pompadour, and, like the Queen in Hamlet, she proclaims her malefaction. The love scenes, however, entirely miss their point by the inadequate acting of those concerned.

The character of Narcisse is one which severely taxes the actor for the reason that there is a danger of monotony in the representation of a personage who is never in command of his wits. Throughout three acts—the play is in four, but in the second of these Narcisse does not appear—the vagrant harps much on one string. That Mr. Tree manages to sustain attention and interest, even through a very long address to a nodding China mandarin which is not pertinent to any issue, is no doubt a proof of his growing power in serious drama. His experience as Gringoire afforded him very serviceable training for the part of Narcisse. As for the Pompadour, Mrs. Tree's first difficulty arises from the fact that it is not the Pompadour that she has to play. The suggestion that the veritable Pompadour ever entertained a true and lasting affection for any human being is opposed to all that is known of her, and thus the scene in which, having caused her husband to be conveyed to his apartments, she dresses in the garb of long ago, and promises to return with him to the old life, conveys a totally false idea of the woman as she was. This is a shallow stage trick quite unworthy of what is best in the play. Again, her character, even as here presented, is contradictory. Lambert denounces and insults her, never dreaming that it is his mother to whom he is speaking; she causes his immediate arrest and orders his execution—natural enough for a furiously indignant woman with supreme power in her hands. But Mathilde visits her, and pleads for Eugène's life. She seems to relent, and indeed the apparent object of the third act is to show her in a sympathetic light; yet, when presently she is asked whether the death sentence is to be carried out, with the most cold-blooded indifference she replies in the affirmative. It seems to us that the actress is sacrificed by the authors to the exigencies of construction. Throughout this act the Pompadour has been presented as a woman with a heart; but interest must be carried on, and for this reason the fate of Eugène Lambert must be left in doubt; so her last words in the scene destroy the impression she has been carefully creating. Mrs. Tree rarely commits errors of judgment; but the act of kneeling to the Duc de Choiseul during the fête in his grounds on a spot which the moment before had been thronged by his guests is perhaps a little unreasonable.

Mr. Charles Brookfield has transformed his head into an exact resemblance of a well-known bust of Voltaire with remarkable skill, and all else he can do to suggest the philosophe he does. If Messrs. Grundy and Wills had been able to put into his mouth such keen satire and biting sarcasm as might have been spoken by the author of the Diatribe of Doctor Akakia they would be themselves Voltaires. They have written some telling lines, and these Mr. Brookfield delivers with all possible point; but all this smartness is not suggestive of Voltaire, and the authors are quite astray in making him jeer at Diderot's Encyclopædia, of which we know that Voltaire entertained a high opinion. Diderot, too, perfectly recognized Voltaire's superiority, and the admittedly greater man would never have derided one whose studies and objects he had encouraged. There were subjects on which the two differed, but an authority writes, "Voltaire néanmoins encourageait Diderot à poursuivre son rôle philosophique." Miss Rose Leclercq's representation of the Queen was distinguished by suitable dignity and evidence of deep sensibility, expressed with power and restraint; but the remaining characters we cannot commend. "An endeavour has been made," the playbill informs us, "to place upon the stage a faithful picture of the manners of a period of French history when the luxury of the eighteenth century had reached its highest point

...deavour has not succeeded. We cannot ...at Mr. Royce Carleton presents a faithful ... de Choiseul, still less that the Maupeau, the ... the Marquis de Silhouet, and the Abbé Terray ... most distant resemblance to the personages they are ... represent. The King Louis of Mr. Ashley is merely ...ure of comic opera. Of what is called the "mounting" of ... play, the dresses and stage pictures, we can speak without re-...ervation in the highest terms. The Audience Chamber in the Palace, and the Grounds of the Duc de Choiseul's Château, are masterpieces of theatrical decoration.

COW-KILLING IN INDIA.

RECENT advices from India show that what is called the "cow-killing question" is forcing itself to the front with disagreeable emphasis, and that the Government may be obliged to reconsider the Gallio-like attitude which it has hitherto very wisely observed in such matters. The sanctity attaching to the cow in Hindoo sentiment was originally due, no doubt, to the religious character with which primitive feeling invested an animal which was at once the indispensable agent of agriculture and the chief food-giver of the settlers. An unconscious sanitary instinct probably also attached religious penalties to the eating of a flesh peculiarly ill adapted for hot climates. But whatever the origin of the religious veneration, it survives, even where the religious feelings themselves are weakened, in a peculiar tenderness and sympathy for a creature so essential to human life. Neglect of such a sentiment has before now provoked serious consequences in India; while the present agitation, at any rate, promises to deepen race-hatreds and religious antagonisms. It appears to be more sustained than the spasmodic protests which have been made in the same direction by the Hindoos all through the period of British administration. For the most part ignored, these protests have died out, while fanatical demonstrations have met with prompt and effectual police repression. Now, however, Hindoo exasperation is being organized in certain localities into a regular propaganda. The movement is certainly one which deserves analysis, and the inquiry may shed light on some of the tendencies at work in modern India. It may be premised that the agitation is by no means this time a superstitious panic amongst the backward masses of the population. Many of the educated and some of the weightiest leaders of Hindoo opinion are engaged in it, and it has the countenance of several non-official Europeans of high character. Amongst the Hindoos themselves the growing conviction of their numerical supremacy, and of the advantages which they may gain from numbers, no doubt plays a considerable part. The "cow-killing" question affords them an opportunity of testing their strength. The memories of the Mogul Empire and of Mahommedan supremacy are losing their hold every day; and, under the authority of the British Government, and by a dexterous use of British theories of representation and majorities, they hope to redress the balance. Their demand to have their prejudices respected is stimulated by the spectacle of certain native Hindoo States. In the exercise of the powers secured them by the British Government some of the native Hindoo rulers have already legislated against cow-killing within their dominions. It appears, indeed, that several Hindoo chiefs who crossed the black water to Her Majesty's Jubilee have, to use a colloquialism, "made it all right" with their subjects by such legislation.

Here, then, is an incitement to the Hindoos to clamour for the same privileges from the British Government which are secured to them by native rulers. Another considerable impetus to the demand has been given by two decisions of the Allahabad High Court, which, however sound in law, are attended by political inconveniences. The High Court has excited Hindoo indignation by reversing the judgment of an inferior magistrate, who had convicted certain Mahommedan butchers under the Penal Code "of the offence of destroying an object held sacred by the Hindoos," in the sight of passers-by. But the judges refused to consider this conduct as amounting to the destroying of an object held sacred. Cows, indeed, can hardly be held to be inviolate in the sense of a temple or of an idol whose destruction or defilement is strictly prohibited. Nevertheless, the Hindoos complain that this ruling will encourage low-class Mahommedans in wantonly outraging their sentiments. A second judgment of the same Court is even more attacked, which laid down that Brahmini bulls released for ceremonial purposes (their owners thereby divesting themselves of proprietary rights) cannot, legally speaking, be the object of theft. Hindoo argument is trying to reduce these two decisions into a dilemma for British justice. An animal, it is contended, is not considered sacred until devoted to ceremonial purposes, and when constituted sacred may be stolen or killed with impunity. Meetings in the North-Western Provinces and elsewhere have given vent to the popular indignation, and the Government has been memorialised to prohibit the killing of all animals held sacred by the Hindoos. Such a petition, of course, has an impossible scope, and would include prohibitions to kill sacred monkeys, peacocks, and alligators, as well as cattle. But the Hindoos would, no doubt, be quite prepared to limit their real demand to the prohibition of "cow-killing." They are also endeavouring to move Government by economical considerations which are taken up by their European sympathizers. It is urged that the resources of India are being impoverished by the slaughter of cows, and that the Government, as universal landlord, is bound to look after its stock. There is possibly something in this plea, although the statistics with which native speakers try to support it are absolutely wild and incapable of verification. One orator calculates that India loses by cow-killing the sum of 1⅛ crore of rupees per annum, and estimates that "a cow with six bullocks, her offspring, is capable of feeding at least 141,600 men during the whole course of her life, by her milk and the produce of the labour of her offspring, six bullocks." But, in spite of these formidable figures, it is not probable that the Indian authorities will depart from their usual attitude of neutrality. On the other hand, they may be able to solve the difficulty by relegating the whole question to the municipal bodies. In this way, where a strong and active Hindoo sentiment existed, it would be able to enforce its own sentiments. At the same time the rights of the minorities would be jeopardized, very much indeed as they will be jeopardized by any system of Local Option in England. And the danger of provoking religious antagonisms, which is the awkward feature in the whole situation, will be only partially removed.

GAMEKEEPERS.

BUTLERS, cooks, and stud-grooms certainly have many opportunities of making their masters' lives well nigh unendurable; but we doubt whether any servant can give an employer a more exasperating day than can a gamekeeper under certain favourable, or rather, we should say, unfavourable, circumstances. You may have many acres of woodlands which have been stocked and preserved at great expense; an efficient staff of beaters may have been ordered for the morning of the great shoot of the year; your house may contain a party of the best shots in England; the weather, and indeed everything else, may promise well, and yet you reflect as you toss restlessly during the anxious night, that it is far from impossible that everything may be spoilt by your new head-keeper. Nor does it necessarily follow that a new keeper who would ruin your day need be a very bad one. In his last place he may have had the management of a number of small belts and spinnies, while your coverts are large wild woods, or vice versâ. It may be, again, that he has been accustomed to deal with a very different stamp of beaters; or that in his former situation there may have been one head-beater of great experience who took a considerable part of the responsibility in this department from off his shoulders. There is yet another way in which a great day's pheasant-shooting may easily be marred when the head-keeper is a fresh one. He may have an excellent plan of campaign, and so may his master; but these plans may be different, and through both master and man following their own systems, and giving their own orders, neither scheme may be thoroughly carried out, confusion being the result. Then the keeper's last master may have liked to manage everything himself, or he may have been in the habit of leaving everything to his head-keeper; and when the man finds his new master the exact converse of his last, mess, muddle, and recrimination are likely to follow.

Generally speaking, the best keepers are sons of keepers. They have been brought up among all the usual surroundings of a gamekeeper's lodge—guns, dogs, ferrets, hen-coops, vermin-traps, &c. One of their earliest treats was to be allowed to go into the coverts with their fathers, and their highest ambition to be, one day, like them, head-keepers. As boys, they were employed in watching young pheasants, in trapping, following the beaters, and in various minor duties connected with shooting and keepering. To vermin, especially, their attention was turned very early in life. In short, it is of the utmost importance that a head-keeper should have imbibed a good tradition of his duties during his youth; and, in addition to this, he ought to have a natural love and aptitude for his work. It is better, too, that he should be a strong, powerful man; that he should be healthy is essential, and he should have excellent eyes and ears. It is needless to say that he must be sober. A drunken, or even an occasionally intemperate, keeper is at the mercy of poachers. It is, of course, necessary for a keeper to know the features, voices, and names of the poachers in the neighbourhood, in order to be able to watch and identify them, and it might appear that for this purpose he would have an excuse for frequenting public-houses. As a matter of fact, however, nothing could be more fatal; and, if he should ever offer such an excuse, it ought on no account to be accepted. He should be active, firm, and decisive, but he must be neither fussy nor noisy. A man who is always shouting and bawling to his beaters is intolerable.

Rearing is one of a keeper's important duties. Up to a certain point it is straightforward work enough; yet it affords ample opportunities for skill and requires great care. A man who has little taste for it is apt to leave too much to his under-keeper, watcher, or even boy. There are many little details connected with rearing which require much attention. Keeping up the stock of healthy hens for foster-mothers, seeing that the coops are clean and sound, the question of the pheasant's eggs that are to be collected—when, where, and how many—the tame pheasants and their inclosure, the choice of ground for rearing the young birds, egg-testing, egg-setting, moving the hens off their nests every day, feeding the hens and the young pheasants, the "maggotfactory," the treatment of delicate birds, the making of feeding-stacks in coverts for the young pheasants when turned out, and many other little matters must be thoroughly attended to if success is to be attained.

Vermin-killing is a most essential part of a keeper's work. It is well that master and man should come to a definite understanding at starting as to what is and what is not to be considered vermin. On Scotch moors some masters will have no hawks killed, and even on ordinary English manors many will not allow kestrels or owls to be interfered with. Jays, again, are birds which some people forbid their men to kill, partly on account of their rarity, and partly because they are useful in giving the alarm when a wood is invaded by poachers. Jackdaws, too, are sometimes a matter of controversy, so are hedgehogs, and (where there are any) ravens and peregrine falcons. The greatest bone of contention between masters and keepers is the fox. As every hunting-man knows, it does not suffice merely to tell a keeper not to shoot foxes, or to preserve foxes; he ought to be told that in his coverts there must always be foxes, and that if they are drawn blank a certain number of times, consecutively, he will be dismissed. There should be no kind of compromise about this in a hunting country. In places where there are no hounds, it is quite another matter. Whether a master himself hunts or not, he ought to take care that his man should see that he has a keen interest in foxes being found in his coverts, from the earliest day of cubhunting to the last day of the season. When there is a good show of foxes, the keeper should be made to understand that it is a matter for pride and thanksgiving, and when the coverts are drawn blank that it is a day of humiliation and disgrace to man, master, and the very name by which the coverts are known.

A gamekeeper cannot be too careful in killing rats. They are inveterate enemies to eggs and young birds, and they often eat more of the corn stacked in the coverts than do the pheasants themselves. Where there are many old-fashioned farm-buildings on a manor, it is difficult to keep them down, do what you may. Stoats and weasels are still deadlier enemies of game, especially the former, and the only thing to be said for the latter is that they kill a great many rats. It cannot be impressed too strongly upon gamekeepers that those terrible egg-stealers, carrion and greybacked crows, as well as magpies, should be killed in the early part of the year. Where a fixed sum is paid for every head of vermin, the keeper is tempted to allow these birds to nest and hatch, and then kill both the young and old birds together after all the mischief has been done. Sparrow-hawks should also be killed as early as possible, for it is when feeding their young that they poach most. With regard to the various methods of killing vermin, it is usually the best plan to leave them to the keeper. We should, however, advise all masters to consider whether the use of poison ought not to be forbidden, and, at the very least, to put a limit on steel traps. The latter are a very cruel means of catching vermin, and they are apt to injure foxes so badly as to render them useless for sport. Dogs often do great mischief in coverts (and out of them too, when they disturb and spoil partridges' nests), and cats must be classed among the worst of poachers; at the same time it should be remembered that, while we make such a point of our legal rights in prosecuting trespassers after game, we ourselves often break the law by killing, or rather by allowing to be killed, the dogs and cats of others. A keeper ought to be told what the law is upon those points, and under what circumstances he may, or may not, kill cats and dogs. To kill a cat that may happen to be in a field near a covert, looking perhaps for field-mice, is not only illegal, but, in many cases, a very cruel action, as it may be the cherished favourite and sole companion of some poor cottager. Yet, when a cat has once taken to poaching, it becomes of little use as a mouser, and will be seldom at home. Indeed, we never desire a keeper to spare a cat of our own if he catches it in the act of poaching. As to the agony of spirit which may result from the loss of a favourite dog it is needless for us to say anything, and we fear that keepers, often necessarily, but sometimes unnecessarily, have inflicted many a pang upon the owners of pets of this sort. We have a keen recollection of a certain gamekeeper shooting, with a right and left, two charming and idolized Skye terriers (husband and wife), the property of a dear friend and neighbour of his master's. That master would rather have lost a thousand pounds than that this should have happened.

We have dealt so lately with the subject of poachers, that we need not say much about them on this occasion, although they are intimately connected with keepering. It is a question whether it is best that keepers should carry firearms when going out against them; whether, if they do carry firearms, they should be guns or revolvers is another. There is a good deal to be said on both sides in each case. Many people recommend life-preservers; but, in our opinion, a long and heavy oak-staff is a better weapon. Dark lanterns and police-whistles are very useful implements for night-watching; and field-glasses have done good service by daylight.

It is too much to expect a gamekeeper to be good at everything; and he may be a valuable man without being a good dog-trainer, although the breaking of dogs may, in some cases, be said to be included among his duties. But, at the very least, every keeper ought to be kind to dogs. A fellow who is always flogging his dogs and rating and swearing at them is a positive nuisance. If he cannot train dogs, there is no reason for his rendering them useless. It is very desirable that keepers should understand the diseases and accidents of treating them. It seldom takes long are fond of the man who manages them or latter is the case, a change of man rather tha is desirable.

It is not so absolutely essential that a keeper sho shot as might be supposed. To shoot well enough to k and to supply the house with game is all that is nec Whether an under-keeper should have a gun at all depends a g deal upon the manor on which he is placed and the system upon which it is managed. If he is entrusted with one, he ought clearly to understand that it is not intended to save him the trouble of trapping.

Gamekeepers' tips have been a source of much grumbling. It seems very hard, and most improper, that the man who gives a keeper a munificent bribe should be able to secure the best place in covert-shooting. Masters, however, may have the remedy to some extent in their own hands by placing their guns themselves. There is another alternative, which is sometimes resorted to—namely, making a common fund and giving it in a lump to the keeper. The objection to this plan is that it furnishes rich men with an excuse for being stingy. Worse still, we have known a fellow of great wealth, after preaching a homily upon the evils and unfairness of tipping, "buying places," &c., propose that each shooter, himself included, should contribute the same sum—a more nothing to himself, but a large one to some of the party—to a general fund, electing himself as paymaster to the gamekeeper. Allowing a keeper to give a day's rabbit-shooting to a limited number of people, at so much a head, as part of his wages, is a practice to which, it seems to us, there are many objections. Nevertheless, it may perhaps answer under certain circumstances. But, whatever may be a master's rules or systems, there can be no doubt of one thing—that he who secures a thoroughly good gamekeeper obtains an untold treasure!

BUSINESS AND POLITICS.

ONE of the most remarkable features in our Parliamentary history has been the singular divorce which it has exhibited between business—in the sense in which the City understands the term—and politics. At the time when Napoleon described England as a nation of shopkeepers it was governed by lords. The first Cabinet of the younger Pitt contained only one member of the House of Commons, that member being himself, and no representative of commerce. This state of things was of old standing; but it did not interfere with enlightened commercial legislation long anterior to his accession to office. Lord Beaconsfield described Lord Shelburne as opening the era of economic statesmanship in which we still live. He strangely forgot Sir Robert Walpole, in whose commercial and fiscal policy were the germs of the system developed later by Shelburne and Pitt, by Huskisson, Peel, and Mr. Gladstone. It is curious that what are now conceived to be the doctrines of sound trade had their original expositors, not in men engaged in trade, but in professors and theorists; in Adam Smith and Tucker, or rather in Tucker and Adam Smith—for the less distinguished writer preceded the author of the Wealth of Nations in the doctrines which have made that work a kind of economic gospel. The mercantile and manufacturing classes towards the close of the eighteenth century were the strongest advocates of restriction and monopoly, and were shut up in bondage to the mercantile theory; so little is it true that acquaintance with the details of business implies a clear perception of the principles of commerce. Politics, as Mr. Gladstone himself recognized many years ago, is a distinct profession, and ordinarily the training which qualifies for its successful pursuit can be found only in political life. The counting-house and the factory have seldom been the cradle of statesmanship. The doctrine of Ecclesiasticus, that the man whose talk is of bullocks shall not be sought for in public council, has hitherto been as true of the man whose talk is of three-fourths and seven-eighths, of contango and backwardation. The fact is curious that a great commercial nation has not found its interest in placing the conduct of its affairs in the hands of men engaged in commerce. The only conspicuous instance of the association of high statesmanlike qualities with the business of the City during the eighteenth century was found in Sir John Barnard, whose mastery of all questions relating to trade and whose general sagacity Speaker Onslow described as unique, and who might, if his ambition and health had tempted or allowed him, have anticipated Mr. Goschen in bringing into statesmanship qualities disciplined in business.

In recent times the aristocratic and territorial classes have been constrained to admit into minor partnership the representatives of commerce and industry. Mr. Poulett Thomson, of the firm of Thomson, Bonar, & Co., was borrowed by Lord Melbourne from the City; and Mr. Henry Labouchere—not the colleague of Mr. Bradlaugh—and Sir Francis Baring are other instances of the alliance, which is of very old date, between the great Whig and the great City houses. But commerce has always been, and it still is, the Co. in the political firm. The inclusion of Mr. Bright, Mr. Goschen, Mr. Forster, and Mr. Stansfeld in Mr. Gladstone's first Administration was the largest recognition which up to that time had been given of the claims of the middle and trading classes to a share in the work of government. More recently the names of Mr. Chamberlain and Mr. Mundella have to be added to this

... Mr. W. H. Smith, Lord Cross, and ...udous. These are all respectable names, ... represent any approach to the high-water ...ship. Mr. Bright, though a man in business, is ... to have been a man of business, and his official ... to have been that the art of governing consists in ... ngs take their own course, and that whate'er is least ...ered is best. Mr. Smith, Mr. Goschen, Mr. Chamberlain, ... Mr. Forster are the only men among those we have mentioned who have shown administrative qualities of the highest order and can claim a position in the front ranks of Parliamentary life. They prove the desirableness of qualifying the too exclusively aristocratic and territorial character which has belonged to successive English Governments by capacities otherwise trained; but they do not invalidate the fact that the work of administration in the present and future, as in the past, will, in the main, be best left in the hands of men of leisure and of cultivation, who are familiarized from boyhood, by the conversation which they hear at the dinner-table and in the drawing-room, with political ideas and social interests. That is the atmosphere which they breathe, the environment by which they are surrounded, as the young tradesman is surrounded by an atmosphere and environment of sugar and molasses, of tallow and of calico. They learn insensibly and imbibe through their mental pores the knowledge which it takes others much pain and trouble to endeavour, not always successfully, to acquire in later life.

These considerations have a close bearing upon the extension of the representative system which is sketched out in Mr. Ritchie's Local Government Bill, and which will probably pass from the stage of project to that of fact during the present year. The government of the counties has hitherto been squirearchical, as the government of England has hitherto in the main been aristocratic. The men in whose hands it still is have been trained to their business; and the disinterestedness or efficiency with which they have conducted it have not been questioned. It would be a great misfortune if it were in any considerable degree to pass away from them; but if they are to retain it, the tenure by which they hold it will not be the same in the future as it has been in the past. For natural selection, deliberate election will be substituted; for nomination by the Crown and its representatives, choice by the popular vote. It is to be hoped that the country gentlemen of the various counties of England will not shrink from taking their part in the new order of things, and from directly challenging the popular approval which has hitherto been tacitly given them. The extension of the representative principle to the counties was inevitable; and there is no reason at present to suppose that the system which has worked fairly well in the great municipal boroughs will not work equally well in the rural districts. But the elaborate mechanism which is provided of County Councils and District Councils, coupled with the maintenance of the Boards of Guardians, and for certain purposes of the Quarter Sessions, will make a call upon administrative capacity and public spirit as to which it is not possible to feel entire confidence that the supply will equal the demand. A too incessant requisition on the time of persons who are necessarily engaged in private business, in their farms and offices and shops, and who prefer to give their leisure to domestic life and personal pursuits, may produce a state of things of which France and the United States offer warning examples. The commune, the arrondissement, and the department in France, the parish or township, the county, and the state in America, require for their efficient administration a degree of attention which men whose own affairs necessarily and naturally occupy them are unable to give. The result is that local government in both countries has fallen to a most undesirable extent into the hands of idlers and adventurers—men who, being indisposed to regular industry, seek in mismanaging the affairs of others the profit and advantage which they decline to look for in the management of their own. If country gentlemen by abstinence from local business, by a disdainful reluctance to court the sweet voices of the electorate, leave the places vacant which they ought to fill, a stream of demagogues will flow into them. The work of local government must be in the hands of people who have leisure for it; and, if the leisure is not that of wealth and easy circumstances, it will be that of idleness and self-seeking. The mischief will not stop here, for the local politician and carpet-bagger will find the County Council probably a stepping-stone to the House of Commons; and a measure the aim of which is to improve county administration may become an instrument of national misrule. The corruption which prevails in the local Governments of the United States and the recklessness which characterizes them in France are due to the fact that men of wealth and leisure, of capacity and integrity, have pusillanimously allowed themselves to be thrust aside, or have indolently stood aloof from the tasks which naturally devolve upon them. No greater danger besets the wealth and culture of a country than its conspicuous divorce from the direct service of the public. In their own interest, not less than in that of the community, the country gentlemen of England are bound to enter frankly and energetically into the new condition of things. Whether the experiment in county government which is about to be tried shall be successful, or shall ignominiously and dangerously fail, depends mainly upon them. Greater issues as regards the future of England are at stake than those which are directly involved in the provisions of the new measure.

THE GERMAN REED ENTERTAINMENT.

MR. and Mrs. German Reed retired so long ago from active co-operation in what is still known as their Entertainment that Mr. Reed's death will only affect his many personal friends. After early appearances as a juvenile musical prodigy, he settled down in life as a leader of orchestras, and did good service in this capacity. The "Entertainment" was a happy idea, which Mr. Reed was able to carry out effectively by the aid of his wife, who had won deserved reputation as Miss Horton, and of his friend John Parry, a mimic and pianist of altogether exceptional power. That the German Reeds had the perception and ability to carry out successfully the scheme they had devised was shown by the cleverness with which they chose their authors, and partly chose and partly made their stage associates. Mr. Arthur Cecil's training was under this management; and Mr. Corney Grain, the successor of John Parry, first developed his capacity under Mr. Reed's guidance. The Entertainment not only survives, but flourishes. A new piece—we are always in doubt how to describe these productions, but "piece" is safe—has just been given at St. George's Hall. It is called Wanted—an Heir, and is written by Mr. Malcolm Watson, who does well in the absence of an author who could strike out a fresher line, though let it be added that the habitués show no desire for anything other than that which is provided for them. The trifle is simple and amusing in its humble way, though the dialogue given to one of the characters is unpleasantly tinged by vulgarity, which the taste of the management should have avoided. The plot would be scarcely sufficient for an average magazine story; but aided by music and the efforts of the players it serves its turn. The heir to a peerage is missing, and is sought by the heir's nephew. He believes that the adopted daughter of a farmer is the lost child, being driven to the belief by a ring she wears; but the ring has been placed on her finger by her lover, the village schoolmaster, and it follows that he is the heir. This is all, but it is enough. Mr. Alfred German Reed shows a remarkable aptitude for the performance of such characters as that of the bluff and genial farmer, John Bigg. Miss Fanny Holland plays the farmer's wife—a part, however, in which it is not possible for the actress to distinguish herself, for the author has made a futile attempt to invest Mrs. Bigg with marked characteristics which have no bearing on the story, and are therefore out of place. Mr. Walter Browne as the peer's nephew and Miss Kate Tully as the heroine fill their parts very successfully. Mr. Alfred Caldicott has composed suitable and sufficiently tuneful music. Mr. Corney Grain's new sketch, "Mossoo in London," is perhaps not quite so good as his usual efforts from a musical point of view. We do not think any of the songs introduced will win the popularity which many of his previous songs have gained; but the mild satire directed at contemporary social crazes amuses the audience, and the sketch is received with a great deal of laughter and applause.

THE EASTER CYCLIST MANŒUVRES.

WHEN the first serious effort was made last year at the Easter manœuvres to test the capabilities of cycles as means of moving infantry rapidly over long distances, we expressed an opinion that the experiment had shown that cyclists might under many circumstances undertake some of the most important duties at present assigned to cavalry. The experiment has been repeated this year in a more searching manner, and, while it has removed perhaps some illusions, has placed us in a much better position than we formerly held to judge with fair accuracy of the merits and defects of cycles as military machines. And it has further enabled those responsible for the development of this arm to consider practically the kind of training which will be necessary before cyclists can take their place as soldiers side by side with men of other branches of the service. The actual details of the scheme, and of the incidents which occurred during the efforts to carry it out, have been so fully dealt with in most of the daily papers that it is scarcely necessary to repeat them here. It is more important to note all the weak places and comparative failures, and to see how they can be strengthened and avoided; and also to note the strong points and the successes, and to see how they can be improved and further utilized.

The first point to observe is the fact that the force was not able to move over the distance originally intended in the time required. The reason of this was—firstly, the extreme unfavourableness of the conditions of the roads and wind; and, secondly, the untrained state of many of the men present. The roads were very heavy and often in that sticky state which is peculiarly trying to cyclists, and in some parts they were so covered with flints as to have made it desirable to push the cycles along the grass on the roadside. The wind was blowing hard, but opposite to the direction in which the cyclists had to advance, and at times the rain came down heavily. Thus everything was against rapid movement. But here we have a useful bit of experience. It is not to be expected that cyclists will always have the wind in their backs, or that the roads will always have that firm consistency which reduces the labour of the rider to the level of that required for descending a toboggan-slide. Military cycling must be a winter as well as a summer pursuit if it is to be of any practical value whatever. If we are to depend on cyclists for reconnoitring or for covering the advance of an army, we must be able to depend on them equally when the ground is deep in snow as when it is hard and dry. In the present instance, although the conditions were so unfavourable, the actual road distances covered were greater than could have been covered by cavalry. We may, therefore, say that it has been proved that a body of infantry can be transported, in a condition to fight, along distances at least as great as could be traversed in the same time by any other mounted arm. And we may further point out that they can utilize railway transport (where available), with a power of intraining and detraining with only little more difficulty than is experienced by infantry. This fact was of great advantage during the manœuvres this year.

The next point of importance which was brought out was the tendency of the cyclist columns to tail out. The cyclist has a natural desire to race. But the indulgence of this desire is fatal to military discipline, in whatever arm it may occur. In the present instance it became clear that only those of the riders who were in good training could accomplish even the curtailed distance. Thus, on one occasion, it was necessary not only not to check, but actually to encourage, a complete disorganization of the force, and to allow them to divide themselves by a process of natural selection, not into their original units, but into new units dependent only on speed. But even thus the officer commanding was able to deploy the rapid riders for attack in well-defined sections as they came up, and this in a very short time. For the future, each man of each section must clearly understand that his place is in his section, and nowhere else. The speed of that section must be the speed of the slowest man in it, and the speed of the column must be the speed of the slowest section. Of course there will have to be a limit of slowness in cycling, as in marching. But there is no reason why this limit should be out of the reach of any man of ordinary physique. Nor is there any reason why picked men should not be employed at a higher rate of speed for specially arduous duties. A body like the new Cyclist Volunteer Corps (the 26th Middlesex) ought to be able, for instance, to furnish a set of men who could do some startling feats of this kind. But in every case, fast or slow, there must be neither rivalry nor racing; and each section and each column must move along as steadily, and in as clearly defined formations, as bodies of infantry. The acquiring of this habit will be one of the great objects to be attained during the coming drill season. The only difficulty in the way of this is the eradication of all spirit of competition for speed, and the substitution of a spirit of competition for order. The power of bringing up at a fair speed compact bodies, well in hand, and ready for orderly and organized attack or defence, is the great thing to aim at.

A considerable portion of the time on Saturday was devoted to a series of small advanced and rear guard engagements, which have brought several very important points into prominence with respect to the power of cyclists in attack and defence. Cyclists, of course, only differ from infantry in having cycles. But, while their machines are in some cases a help, they are in other cases a hindrance to their mobility—as in the relation of cavalry to their horses. When a body of cyclists is advancing along a road, and the head and point are fired at by an opposing body of troops, the experience of Saturday shows that the first thing to do is to push on the advanced guard on their cycles to the nearest point to the enemy under cover, to dismount, deploy, and to open fire. If this fire is sufficient to drive the enemy out of the position, the advance can at once be resumed on the cycles. If not, as the successive bodies in rear come up they must be dismounted under cover and deployed for attack in the same manner, until their fire overwhelms the enemy. But it may happen that the mere firing from cover at the enemy's position is not sufficient to dislodge him, in which case he must be either turned or attacked in front. If a road exists suitable for the purpose, the turning movement may perhaps be carried out by mounted men. But probably the turning movement, and certainly any direct attack, would be performed on foot. An attempt was made on Saturday in one case by a section of cyclists to rush a position on their cycles. They were ruled out of action. Thus, in every case of successful attack the attackers will find themselves in possession of the enemy's position, not only, however, without means of following him rapidly at the moment, but under the necessity of going back to the point at which the attack began to fetch their cycles. The defenders, on the other hand, can hold on to the last moment, with their cycles close behind them, and, mounting by successive sections, retire rapidly to a fresh position in rear which they can place in a state of defence while the attackers are toiling back on foot for their cycles. One of the weak points of a cyclist attack has thus been most instructively brought to light by Saturday's work; and the important thing is to discover how the delay, which is apparently to some extent necessary, can best be diminished. Two methods suggest themselves. The first is that, while the dismounted fighting line of the attack is slowly making head, the reserve should push the machines of the whole party with them along the road. There are many cases in which this would be practicable. A second method would be by leaving the reserve throughout the engagement with their cycles at the point where the first halt was made, with orders that, as soon as the attack was successful, they were to mount and push on on their cycles, and so in their turn become the advanced force, the previous advanced force remaining in rear as reserve. It seems probable that these two methods, or a combination of them, would, if properly developed by actual trial, lead to an avoidance of the delay caused by the system tried on Saturday.

We cannot but think that Lieutenant-Colonel Savile ought to be satisfied with the results of his experiment. He did not, it is true, do exactly what he originally hoped to accomplish. But under the most adverse conditions, and with many untrained men in the force, he covered amply sufficient distance to prove all that he could wish to prove. And the details of the attack and defence were repeatedly worked out in such a manner as to place him in a position to lay down the tactical principles on which such engagements should be fought. Any one who is acquainted with Volunteers will know that it will be a long time before the whole cyclist system at present inaugurated will be in anything like perfect working order. But they will also know that, if slow, the progress will be sure. And that if the authorities will continue to support, as they have done, Lieutenant-Colonel Savile's efforts, he may look forward with confidence to a time when he will be able to cover the advance of an army corps with a "cyclist screen," well drilled and handy to manœuvre, and fully equipped in all respects for the work they may have to do.

FRENCH PLAYS.

M. COQUELIN cadet appeared for a few nights at the end of last week in conjunction with his brother and nephew, and thereby gave weight to a revival of Molière's Les Fourberies de Scapin, in which, to use the words of the programme, "les trois Coquelins" figured together. The part of Argante in the comedy is not a very important one; and the play itself, although containing several fine scenes, is not one of its great writer's best, and is, after all, only an adaptation of the Phormio of Terence, the plot of which it follows with slight variations. The interest, not very strong in the Latin original, loses a good deal of its directness in Molière's version by being elaborated with the introduction of a scene from Cyrano de Bergerac's Le Pedant and another from La Sœur of Rotrou. It is a piece for reading rather than acting, albeit the character of Scapin himself is admirably drawn. Argante is an old man, and Molière's old men are all more or less conventional. M. Coquelin cadet made the best of the rôle, and was very amusing throughout. He has excellent speeches to deliver, full of philosophical truths and clever similes; but, like his colleague Géronte, he is dragged through so much boisterous pantomime, after the fashion of the period in which the play was written, that he ends by impressing an average English audience as being a sort of pantaloon in a harlequinade. M. Coquelin cadet is too fine an actor to throw away his great experience and talent on such a part as this, when he is only to be seen three times. We acknowledge willingly its classical importance and fame, and also the modesty of the actor, who serves so valiantly the literature of his country by thus effacing himself in order to increase the reputation of a famous comedy. We confess, however, that we should have preferred seeing so capable an artist in something more important. He played Argante perfectly, and with great skill lifted the part into prominence by the exceeding delicacy of his method and the admirable manner with which he gave each word and phrase its proper value. Scapin, on the other hand, is one of the best drawn and most highly finished of all Molière's inimitable valets, and as a representative of these M. Coquelin aîné is unsurpassed. He gives us a complete picture of that curious product of the seventeenth century, the gentleman's gentleman, half slave and half equal, quick-witted, audacious, faithful, and generous, but likewise the incarnation of fun and frolic. Nothing could be droller, to recall an instance of admirable acting out of many, than M. Coquelin's play when, at the end of the comedy, in order to provoke sympathy from his masters, and thus obtain forgiveness for his escapades, he pretends to be mortally wounded. Funnier expressions of mingled feigned pain, fear, and mock humility can scarcely be imagined than those M. Coquelin assumes when brought in on a chair, with his head bound up and life apparently ebbing from him. When, however, his masters, moved by what they believe to be his approaching end, forgive him, and he hops off his chair, a hale man, with the most quizzical air in the world, he provokes hearty laughter. M. Jean Coquelin is too young a man and too inexperienced an actor to be placed on a level yet with his father and uncle. One cannot help thinking, when seeing him act the parts of old men, that he is merely a marvellously well-trained collegian. The young voice betrays him, and the wigs and neatly arranged beards cannot conceal, fortunately for him, his enviable youth. Silvestre, however, Scapin's companion in mischief, is a boy, and M. Jean Coquelin was in his element this time and played delightfully. Mme. Kalb, "of the Comédie Française," appeared only in Les Fourberies de Scapin, and made everybody regret they were unlikely to see more of so sprightly an actress. Zerbinette, who is a rather Bohemian young person, has very little to do in the piece except in the last act, when she has to laugh through an entire scene, whilst between one outburst of merriment and another she relates to Géronte the tricks his son has played upon him. This she did so sympathetically, and with such a silvery and contagious laugh, that the house joined in her mirth; and the pretty scene, as difficult to act as is the laughing song in Manon Lescaut to sing, passed off brilliantly. A one-act piece for two preceded Les Fourberies de Scapin. It has been seen often on the stage and in the drawing-room under various titles—Le Bibelot and La Soupière; its actual name is La Céramique. M. Coquelin cadet was Hector and Mlle. Barety Une Veuve. It was capitally played, both M. Ernest Coquelin and Mlle. Barety acting with infinite vivacity and charm. The Coquelins are said to be the inventors of the "monologue" recitations, which are admirable in drawing-rooms, but apt to be rather tedious when transferred to the stage. M. Eugène Vivier's Protecteur et Protégé is essentially Parisian, and seems to be an excerpt from some longer play, for it has neither beginning nor end. The two MM. Coquelin were, however, very funny, the younger as the pompous Protecteur, who gets thanked for doing nothing at all, and the other as the Protégé, who has a nervous trick of repeating the last words of every speech addressed to him. M. Touchatout's Habit ou Redingote is more amusing, and M. Coquelin cadet gave a truthful picture of the embarrassments of a gentleman who cannot determine whether he ought to wear evening or morning costume at a party to which he is invited.

Oscar, ou le Mari qui trompe sa Femme, one of Scribe's merriest vaudevilles—without couplets, however—was given for the first time in London in many years on Monday evening last. It was originally produced at the Français as far back as 1842, with M. Regnier as Oscar. The plot is of a kind which is best not emphasized in relating, since it turns upon a subject frequently used by the Elizabethan dramatists, and by Shakspeare himself twice—in All's Well that Ends Well and Measure for Measure—in which the wife, under peculiar circumstances, replaces the mistress, and her husband is none the wiser, until matters are satisfactorily explained, his misdemeanour being a sin of intention and not of deed. M. Coquelin is at his best in this kind of play; for, like our own Mr. Toole—the one actor we possess to whom he can be pretty closely likened—he is an unrivalled theatrical representative of middle-class husbands—les maris de la bonne bourgeoisie. His appearance, manner, and voice all help him to this end; and his art, as displayed therein, is infinitely subtle and unobtrusive. Mlle. Kerwich was very coquettish as Manette, the adroit chambermaid who has obtained a hold, through the suggestions of her mistress, over her master, which she is quite unable to explain, but which she certainly turns to her own pecuniary advantage. A monologue followed entitled "Le Sous-Préfet aux Champs"—a species of semi-satirical idyl, showing the official in question forgetting his duties under the influence of sunshine and flowers. It would bear translation, and is exceedingly well written. "Barbarson" is a piece of extravagance in the style of the adventures of Munchausen, which M. Coquelin delivers with a strong Marseilles accent.

The next novelty at this theatre, with the present company, is reserved for the last week, when Les Surprises du Divorce will be represented for the first time in London.

EXHIBITIONS.

MR. MACLEAN'S exhibition possesses unusual attractions this season in about a dozen good, really interesting, pictures. The remaining forty or fifty canvases belong to the ordinary class of work which generally constitutes the bulk of this Gallery. Whether they are better or worse than usual becomes a matter of supreme indifference when there is something else to be looked at. First of all we shall mention one or two examples of the great French school of the century and its immediate following in the Low Countries. Perhaps the best and most characteristic of these is a Diaz, "In the Woods: Evening" (21 A), evidently taken from the Forest of Fontainebleau. A mysterious windy play of light throws a dancing illumination over rocks, ferns, open country, distance, the tangle of shrubs and the branches of oaks. The general tone is deep and full coloured, the foreground swims in a rich sombre shadow, while the splendid colouring does justice to the local tints, expresses the atmospheric conditions, and salutes our first glance with a noble and harmonious scheme of decoration. The well-known and admirable style of handling suggests much, but never intrudes itself as a mechanism. In the works of Heffner and others who seem to have studied the mere method for its own sake, the workmanship, by its hardness and its obviousness of plan, tends to destroy air and the natural charm of the scene. Of two Corots, one, "The Fisherman" (21), is but half started and not so well arranged in its groups of sky and trees as might be expected; the other and better, "Sunset" (60), well shows the great landscapist's magical trees rustling against the sky and wrapped below in soft, dark, and impalpable air. We have seen works by James Maris fuller and fatter in colour than "A Dutch Village on the Banks of the Scheldt" (36), and others, again, still drier and dustier looking. This may be called a good average example of a fine and dignified artist. Much the same may be said of "Going to Market" (23), by Josef Israels; good in colour, especially in the sky, it is neither his best picture nor his worst. E. Van Marcke's "Cattle in Holland" (17), by its simple workmanship and concentrated arrangement pleases the eye better than many of his larger pictures. It also recalls more directly than some the composition and style of the greatest modern master of the genre, Constant Troyon. On turning to the English work we are met at once with a remarkable work, Sir J. E. Millais's latest landscape, "Christmas Eve (Murtly Castle, Perthshire)" (33). The high power of intelligence and earnestness that this artist can bring to bear on his art is here made manifest, since at his age, and after doing so much careless commercial claptrap, he can still sit down and produce a thoroughly interesting landscape. In some ways it seems to us his most successful effort in that direction. It has certainly a stronger sentiment in it than "Chill October" and its other predecessors. The sentiment, too, is of a high and really artistic order and so elevates the general aspect of the work that one is not tempted to look for faults. This is a tribute to the power of feeling in art, as upon examination some defects are to be found. The realism is not perfect; the tree hardly relieves properly from the building; there is a tendency to undue muddiness of colour under the trees; and the birds and the little stick in the foreground seem false, feeble, and cold. In the artistic treatment some defects are mingled with decided beauties of style. There is perhaps too much foreground, and without doubt the workmanship of the trees is small, mean, and ineffective. The other faults count for little; but this last defect, as it would be apt to grow on one, and as it contradicts the noble idea of the picture, cannot be altogether overlooked. On the other hand, the building rises against the sky in really imposing fashion. Both the castle and the wall are handled in splendid style, and something in their aspect reminds one of Millet's church in the Luxembourg Gallery. Two fine marine pictures remain to be noticed. Mr. H. Moore's "Sunset in the Channel" (14) is quite up to the level of his best work. Indeed, there is a robust naturalness in this sky which he has perhaps never before attained. What an improvement may be seen here on his somewhat tortured "Sunset after Storm" in the Grosvenor of 1886! Mr. Edwin Ellis's "Fishing Bay on the Cornish Coast" (50) arrests one at once by the grandeur of its aspect and by a bold, powerful use of the brush; yet a little more finesse in the values would hardly be amiss. Upon looking longer one feels scarcely convinced as to the distance of parts of the cliff.

At the exhibition of the Society of Lady Artists there is a slight improvement, at any rate in the water-colours. Miss Mildred Butler has a gift of observation which enables her to take in the general tone of an effect to good purpose while she has acquired some sense of style and some feeling for beauty. "Following the Plough" (93), with its grey, vaporous sky and broad foreground, and "Winter" (144), an aerial picture with fine finish, are good examples of her work. Amongst the best things are Miss K. Macaulay's sketches, of which the strongest and most natural is perhaps A Bit of Battersea" (14); Miss F. Currey's "At the Top of the Tideway" (161), with a rarely true middle distance, and an elaborate but not hard foreground; Miss Annette Elias's "River Oise, France" (135), a bright, strong picture, painted with a clean, smart touch; and Miss D. Martyn's very careful and sincerely rendered interior, "A Boat-builder at Work" (554). Mesdames Emma Cooper, Forbes Robertson, Gertrude Peel, M. Barnard, and one or two others, send good work. Miss Clara Montalba sends an oil, "A Sketch; Dortrecht" (530), but it looks poor and hot, and quite unworthy of her known talent. The largest oil is the "Holy Street Mill" (251), by Miss Mawson, a spotty, uncomfortable canvas. Perhaps the best of the oils are Miss Heckstall Smith's realistic and workmanlike "Staple Inn before Restoration" (238); Miss N. L. Rumboldt's shadowy and mysterious "Forest Glade" (244); Miss M. A. Sheffield's clever sketch, "Village of Ladywell, Kent" (546), and Miss H. Montalba's "Tending the Rialto Shrine" (243). Other fair landscapes come from Miss E. Gibson, Miss N. Erichsen, Miss Jane Inglis, and a few more. Modelling is not a quality much attended to in the figure-work; but we must speak with praise of one or two, such as "Chapeau Noir" (550), by Miss W. M. Fallon; "Amy" (539), by Mrs. Perugini; "Sandy Macfarlane" (222), by Miss Sara Fallon; "The Gardener's Daughter" (221), by Miss Bywater, and "Noonday" (65), by Miss Dora Noyes, the chief fault of which lies in a slavish resemblance to the work of Mr. Clausen. Resemblances of the sort are common enough; 535, 534, 234, and 278 are imitated from Mr. David Murray, and 529 is much too like Mr. Ludovici.

CONGRESS AND THE MONEY MARKET.

THE United States Congress has been now in session four months, and it has yet done little or nothing towards relieving the money markets of the world from the apprehensions which they suffer in consequence of the magnitude of the American surplus. The House of Representatives, indeed, has passed a Bill authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to employ in the redemption of debt all surplus monies now in the Treasury, or hereafter accumulating there; but the Senate has so amended it that it must go back to the House. Many Senators argue that the Secretary of the Treasury already has the powers which the Bill proposes to confer upon him, and that, therefore, fresh legislation is unnecessary; but the Secretary argues that the power referred to was given by a rider to an Appropriation Act, and that properly it can be regarded only as given for the year in which the Appropriation Act was passed. Consequently, he is unwilling to use the power. A Committee of the House of Representatives has also prepared a Bill for the reduction of taxation; but the Republican members of the Committee are strongly opposed to the chief proposals of the Bill. It seems very doubtful whether a majority of the House of Representatives is not also opposed to them; and even if the Bill passes the House, it is hardly likely to pass the Senate. The apathy of Congress is the more remarkable because it will be in the recollection of our readers that last year a crisis in the money market was very nearly brought about by the accumulation of money in the Treasury. Up to the end of June last the Secretary of the Treasury was able to dispose of his surplus in the redemption of Debt. There then existed a considerable amount of Debt which could be redeemed without notice, and therefore the Secretary was able to pay out of the Treasury surplus monies as they accumulated. Unfortunately the relief so afforded was only partial. The national banks are obliged to hold United States bonds as security for their notes, issuing only 90 per cent. of the nominal value of the bonds in bank-notes. When, therefore, bonds are redeemed, the banks are obliged to cancel the notes against which the bonds are held as security; but there is no legal machinery in the United States by which notes once issued can be called in and cancelled; and, when the banks are unable to cancel their notes, they are obliged by law to lodge in the Treasury, as security for the redemption of the notes, an equivalent amount of lawful money of the United States. Up to the present time there are about 20 millions sterling of national bank-notes circulating throughout the United States which ought to be cancelled, but which cannot be got in, and the Treasury holds an equivalent amount of legal-tender money. The accumulation of money for the redemption of notes would even before July last have had a serious influence upon the money market were it not that a large coinage of both gold and silver is going on annually. Even so, however, the addition to the currency by means of coinage was not sufficient to prevent some inconvenience through the accumu'ation of the bank-note redemption fund. On the 1st of July last year the whole of the Debt which can be redeemed without notice was paid off, and then there remained only bonds which stood at a high premium. The Secretary of the Treasury naturally was unwilling to buy bonds at a high premium, and consequently the surplus accumulated rapidly. Capitalists got alarmed lest the money market should thereby be seriously disturbed, and they began to hoard as a precaution against contingencies. In both ways so great a stringency in the money market was caused that the rates of interest and discount rose even in New York to 6, and sometimes even to 8, per cent.; in the North-West they rose to 8 and 10 per cent. and higher; while in the South-West they went to 12 per cent. and over. To avoid a panic, the Secretary of the Treasury offered to buy bonds at a price specified; but few bonds were sold, and then the Secretary of the Treasury was compelled to lodge money on deposit with bankers to avoid a catastrophe. The United States Government employs no bank in the collection of its revenue; but it is permitted by law to place upon deposit, under certain conditions, the portion of the revenue derived from internal taxes. By using this power relief was given to the money market, apprehension gradually died away, and since then ease has prevailed.

It was naturally hoped that, after the experience of last year, Congress would hasten to reduce taxation. In the current year, which our readers will bear in mind ends with June next, the surplus of revenue over expenditure, including in the latter the Sinking-fund requirements, is estimated at about 30 millions sterling. President Cleveland recommended last December a very sweeping reduction in the tariff; but his party has not supported him, and it has taken four months for the Committee of Ways and Means to agree upon a Bill making very moderate reductions. Under such circumstances it does not seem likely that in the remainder of the Session the Bill will become law. Next month the candidates for the Presidency will be selected by the National Conventions, and in November the new President will be chosen. The Democrats are afraid of offending the working-men by pushing forward too sweeping a reduction of the tariff, and, on the other hand, the Republicans would gladly see the Administration discredited by financial pressure. It can, however, not really be for the interest of either party that a financial crisis should occur in the midst of a Presidential election; and it is possible, therefore, that Congress may do something to avert a catastrophe before it separates. If it should not, a panic seems almost inevitable. At present the situation is this:—The Treasury holds in gold, silver, greenbacks, and bank-notes very nearly 120 millions sterling; but there are certificates outstanding amounting to nearly 50 millions sterling, so that the nett accumulation of money in the Treasury is 70 millions sterling. Of this amount about 20 millions sterling are held as a reserve against greenbacks—that is, the Treasury notes which circulate as legal tender-money. Another 20 millions sterling, or nearly, are held in the Treasury for the redemption of bank-notes when presented, and about 30 millions sterling are the accumulation of surplus revenue over expenditure. In addition to this vast sum, about 12 millions sterling have been lodged with the Secretary of the Treasury in depository banks. This latter sum, of course, can be employed by the banks in lending and discounting, and, therefore, we have not included it in the accumulation in the Treasury. Owing to the fear of a crisis last year speculation was brought to a stop, and even legitimate business was very seriously checked. All through the winter, in consequence, the money market has been quiet, and at present it is found impossible by the Secretary of the Treasury to lodge more money in the banks. The banks, in fact, find that they cannot employ the money profitably, and are unwilling, therefore, to take it. Of course, if the value of money was to rise, the banks would be as eager to get the money as they are now unwilling to receive it; but, under any circumstances, the plan of depositing money with the banks is a merely temporary one, and cannot afford adequate relief; for that there must be a permanent and a very large reduction in taxation. Unless this reduction is effected, we are likely to see a revival of the fears that had such serious consequences twelve months ago. In the ordinary course of things Congress will sit only about three months longer. As the Session draws to a close its members may feel that it would be dangerous to the best interests of the country to put off legislation any longer, and may carry a moderate reduction in the tariff; but, if the public begins to fear that taxation will not be adequately reduced, there will certainly be a revival of last year's fears. Bankers will be unwilling to lend, capitalists of all kinds will accumulate money as a precaution against contingencies; the money market will be laid bare of supplies; borrowers will be unable to obtain the accommodation they require, and very serious consequences may ensue.

Renewed disturbance in the American money market would be likely to affect the European money markets. Just now the balance of trade is against the United States. Owing to the heavy fall in American securities of all kinds, there has undoubtedly been an immense quantity of such securities sold by European holders and bought by American holders. In consequence, there is a debt due by America to Europe. Further, the imports into the United States have of late been very large. The probability would seem to be, therefore, at present that exports of gold from the United States are more likely than imports; but the whole situation would rapidly change if the value of money were to rise considerably. Then it would be profitable to send gold from Europe for employment in the United States, and doubtless gold would be sent in considerable quantities. If there were any good reason to expect that the crisis would be short and sharp, and that an effectual remedy would be speedily applied, of course the shipments of gold would not take place; but if Congress were once to separate, and the country were to be engaged in a Presidential contest, it would be hardly possible to apply a speedy remedy. Therefore the value of money in the United States would be likely to continue high for a considerable time, and exporters of gold from Europe would anticipate a considerable profit. In any case, if a monetary crisis in the United States seemed likely, the money markets of Europe would begin to fear large shipments of gold to New York. In consequence there would be a tendency to raise rates here; and, if the shipments really began on a considerable scale, the rise in rates might be very considerable. It is always to be recollected that the stock of gold held by the Bank of England is exceedingly small, that therefore the Bank cannot afford to lose very much of the metal, and that anything which made it probable that considerable shipments would take place would have a disproportionately great effect. The United States Treasury at the present moment holds about 62 millions sterling in gold, while the Bank of England holds less than 22 millions; and, owing to the desire of all the great European banks to keep the large stocks of the metal which they now hold, it would be difficult for the Bank of England to obtain elsewhere the gold withdrawn from it for export to New York. The beginning, then, of gold shipments to New York would, as we have just been saying, have a disproportionately great effect upon the London money market; and even the probability that shipments would take place would have a considerable effect. The policy pursued by Congress during the next few months, then, will have an important effect, not alone upon the American money market, but upon the money markets throughout all Europe, and through the money markets it will influence very considerably the course of trade and the prices of Stock Exchange securities.

CRYSTAL PALACE CONCERTS.

COME what may after them, a concert which begins with two of Beethoven's grandest works must of necessity run down hill. It is putting the good wine first—an unobjectionable proceeding if you are not going to drink the bad afterwards. One is chiefly concerned, it is true, to hear the finest music with a fresh ear, and from the hands of untried executants; but in a concert the second course must come, and it is likely to meet with undeserved misapprehension if the first is all strong meat. Spohr, Liszt, Rossini, fall flat on ears attuned to the heroic pitch of Beethoven in the Overture to Leonora (No. 3), and the Concerto for Piano (No. 5). It was unfortunate that Spohr's Die Weihe der Töne should have been thus prefaced. It is not too often heard; it is interesting as an early example of programme music; it is a splendid piece of musical construction and orchestration; but it is long, and, in all its length, it never reaches that loftiness of tone and impressive directness of effect without which nothing can hold the attention after a full meal of Beethoven.

The performance of the Overture to Leonora was good, though we have heard better. Though broadly and intelligently rendered, with a full sonorousness of tone, it seemed at moments to lack point. A more subtle shading of force would not have been amiss in parts, and, in the second half especially, a more lightning-like emphasis on certain accents and a less general pounding was wanted. Miss Martha Remmert attacked the Concerto in E Flat with a bold bravery which her effective strength of touch enabled her to carry on consistently. If we said that she might perhaps be a more refined player, we should not in any way refer to her technique, which permits of great flexibility and delicacy, but rather to her reading and her feeling for phrasing.

She is apt to be fanciful and to read more effect into details than is compatible with the broad unity and long-winded flight of this sort of music. She showed a charming delicacy and vivacity of touch, however, in many passages, and was never lacking in the power necessary for executing a great work. The orchestra seemed thoroughly up to their task, and the wind instruments, especially the horns and trumpets, which play a prominent part, were used with great sureness and delicacy. Spohr's Symphony, The Power of Sound, as it is generally called, met with an interpretation no less excellently artistic than that of the Concerto. An occasional feeling of tediousness arose, probably entirely from its following music in which there is nothing half-hearted and nothing superfluous. It would be difficult to deny the length and tameness, at least, of Spohr's third movement, "Tempo di Marcia." The march itself has not enough dignity or intensity to induce one to patiently await its return during the wearisome monotony of the Trio. It is not the least part of a composer's art to arrange his masses in quantities according to their interests. The first and second movements are perhaps the best, and they were very well done. The imitations of birds in the "Allegro" were by no means injudiciously forced, nor was the natural flow of the movement interrupted. In the second movement, a lovely cradle song on the clarinet is delightfully broken in upon by the soft tumult of the violins, entering with a piquant Dance Allegro, and this is followed by a charming Serenade on the violoncello. These graceful melodies were interpreted with taste and feeling by all the instruments concerned. A single violoncello plays as important a part in the Serenade as it would in a Concerto, and the excellent artist who leads these instruments handled it with a beauty of tone worthy of a good soloist. In the place of the usual pianoforte solos, Miss Martha Remmert gave us Liszt's Hungarian Fantasia for pianoforte and orchestra. The capriciousness of this music suited her talent perhaps better than the Concerto. She played it, if not with quite enough certainty, at least with spirit and with a due regard for its character. Unlike many good performers she avoided exaggerating the accents of that peculiar melody the "Vivace assai," and she entered thoroughly into the feeling of the piquant and difficult "Allegretto alla Zingarese."

The singer of the afternoon, Miss Alice Gomez, has a voice of the purest quality in all its notes. Her intonation is perfect, her method refined, and her idea of the sentiment of what she sings just and intelligent, and yet there is something slightly mechanical in the tranquil perfection of her style. She sang Weber's "O Fatima" (Abu Hassan), Mendelssohn's "Die Liebende schreibt," and Franz's "Er ist gekommen."

The concert came to an end with Rossini's Overture, William Tell. It is interesting occasionally to hear works which are a little out of the ordinary path of these concerts. The Overture is stirring, melodious, full of ideas, deservedly popular, and suitable to the theatre. Here, however, one cannot help thinking of names more familiar at the Crystal Palace than Rossini, and so wishing that Mendelssohn, Berlioz, or Wagner had had a word to say in the instrumentation of much of this Overture.

REVIEWS.

THROUGH THE YANGTSE GORGES.*

"WHAT I should like to know," said Sir Isaac Coffin, when seconding in the House of Commons the rejection of the original Liverpool and Manchester Railway Bill, "is to be done with all those who have advanced money in making and repairing turnpike roads? What is to become of coachmakers and harness-makers, coachmasters and coachmen, innkeepers, horsebreeders and horsedealers? Is the House aware of the smoke and the noise, the hiss and the whirl which locomotive engines passing at the rate of ten or twelve miles an hour would occasion? . . . Iron would be raised in price 100 per cent., or probably exhausted altogether. It would be the greatest nuisance, the most complete disturbance of quiet and comfort in all parts of the kingdom that the ingenuity of man could invent." This is precisely the kind of argument which the Chinese Government is now advancing in opposition to Mr. Little's scheme, as set forth in the present work, for opening up the upper waters of the Yangtsze kiang to steamer traffic. What, ask the Peking authorities, would become of all the boatowners and boatmen, the trackers and coolies, if "fire-wheel ships" were admitted into the reaches above Ichang, which have hitherto been traversed only by the harmless junk? What would become of the Fêngshui of the district? and what would be the effect on the riverside populations of such a new element in their existences?

It is not necessary to accept these arguments as the expression of the bonâ fide views of the Mandarins on the subject, any more than it is to imagine that when Li Hung-chang memorializes the Emperor to confer honours on a river dragon for assuaging a flood he believes in the existence of such a monster. But it is incumbent on the Mandarins so far to acquiesce in the opinions of the people as to be able to pose as their champions; more especially as they are urged from another and a more influential quarter to oppose tooth and nail the proposed innovation. The provincial authorities see in the advance of foreigners into the interior the ruin of their revenues, and they have in the fate of the Kweichow Customs duties a standing warning of what may be still further expected if the insidious "foreign devil" is allowed to push his way inland. Until lately the receipts from the Kweichow Custom-house were, next to those of Canton, the largest in the Empire, and these were, as a matter of course, paid into the Szech'uen provincial treasury. Two thousand taels—a sum equal to about 700*l*.—was the average amount collected each day at this barrier. Under the genial influence of these collections, the little market town of Kweichow expanded into a large and opulent city. Work-people crowded into it, and the more wealthy inhabitants built for themselves country mansions in the neighbourhood, which became houses of luxury and ease. Suddenly the order went forth that, in accordance with treaty, the foreigner should be allowed, by paying a transit duty of two and a half per cent. at the foreign Custom-house at Hankow, to send his goods from that port to Chungking in Szech'uen free of all further charge. The result of this was that the officials at Kweichow found their occupation gone, and the revenue has since been gradually reduced to nil.

With such an example before their eyes it need not surprise us to find the provincial authorities fighting shoulder to shoulder with the junkmen and coolies against Mr. Little's scheme. Mr. Little, on the other hand, is consumed with a zeal to open up the rich markets of Szech'uen to foreign enterprise, and to give the people of that province an easy means of transporting their products to the busy cities of Eastern China. The Chefoo Convention gives support to Mr. Little's proposal, and on the faith of that instrument he has had a steel steamer built, which is especially adapted for the navigation of the upper waters of the Yangtsze kiang, and which is now at Ichang, waiting only for the sanction of the authorities to start on the voyage westward. It would be paying a poor compliment to Oriental diplomacy to suppose that the Chinese Ministers could not make out of the materials at hand a case sufficiently strong to withstand the pressure which has been brought to bear upon them in this matter. So far they have certainly succeeded in doing so, and it remains to be seen how long they will be able to hold their own against the importunity of the British merchants.

Of the ultimate advantages of opening the river to steamer traffic both to the Imperial exchequer and to people of the Western provinces there can be no reasonable doubt. Szech'uen, the immediate object of Mr. Little's enterprise, is a province as large as France; "it has an even superior climate; a far larger population, equally industrious and thrifty; a land delightfully accidentée, and cultivated to its highest slopes." Cereals of every kind yield rich and abundant crops; while sugar, tobacco, opium, and medicinal herbs are grown with little trouble and to great profit. As matters stand at present, the people of this favoured region, who are the richest in the Empire, and who in point of numbers represent thirty per cent. of the total population of China, absorb only nine per cent. of the foreign imports into China. This disproportion between the number of inhabitants and the consumption of foreign goods is the more noticeable because, though the soil of Szech'uen produces every other necessary of Chinese life, it does not produce cotton; and there can be no doubt that, if once a ready means of access were established, the quantity of Manchester goods imported would go up by leaps and bounds. Hitherto the merchants of Szech'uen have been deterred from making any large ventures by the difficulties of the two routes by which alone they have been able to reach the outer world. We know what are the dangers and delays which are inseparable from the passage through the gorges of the Yangtsze—have we not the evidence of Blakiston, Gill, Little, and others on the subject?—and when we are told that these are as nothing compared with those which beset travellers on the mountain road over the Tsingling shan, we can form some idea of what the perils of that route must be.

No one acquainted with the subject will, then, deny that, if Mr. Little succeeds in establishing a steamer traffic between Ichang and Chungking, he will confer an immense benefit on many millions of people besides English merchants. But we could have wished that he had been rather more explicit as to the manner in which he hopes to overcome the physical difficulties in his way. We wish he had told us how the rapids which beset the four hundred miles which separate those two cities are to be passed by steamers. Junks can now only make the voyage in from five to six weeks, which is a longer time than it takes to go from London to Shanghai. This at first sight seems preposterous; but when one reads the accounts travellers give of the rapids, whirlpools, eddies, and currents which have to be encountered, one only wonders that any vessels ever survive to drop their anchors off the wharves of Chungking. The following is Mr. Little's description of his first attempt to ascend the Yen rapid, which is by no means the worst on this dangerous piece of water:—

> A gigantic whirlpool immediately below the rapid has hollowed out a bay in the rocks on the south bank, and where the eddy meets the downward rush a sharp point projects, which is a terribly ticklish place for a boat in the hands of trackers to round in safety. Our Laota (captain) having decided to take this course, we crossed the river, paddled up the eddy, which was running with unusual force, landed our trackers, and drove the boat's nose into the broken torrent while the eddy was still acting on her stern. The rudder ceased to act; our boat, on entering the down current, suddenly shot out towards the middle of the stream—the trackers were thrown down, and two badly hurt by being dragged over the rocks, while the boat heeled over, threatening to capsize on the instant; fortunately our trackers promptly cast off the tow-line in the nick of time, and we incurred no other danger than being swept violently down stream in the eight-knot current. Fortunately the up-river breeze still held, and the two men left on board were able to set the sail in time to get steerage way upon the boat before she drifted on the rocks below, and the Laota succeeded in steering her into the eddy on the safer left bank, with nothing lost but the result of the morning's toil.

Fortune in this case was more favourable to Mr. Little than she is often wont to be in such emergencies. A short time before he made this voyage Mr. Consul Gardner attempted to ascend the Shin rapid, and, his tow-line snapping, the boat was capsized, and his life was only saved by the exertions of the crew of the lifeboat, which is permanently stationed below the rapids to render assistance to voyagers who may be immersed in gurgite vasto. When Captain Gill went up the river, it was as much as a hundred coolies could do to drag his boat up this same rapid. Of course when, in the early summer, the level of the river rises in the gorges, as it almost invariably does, several tens of feet, the rapids become mere rushes, and there is abundance of water for a steamer of a considerable size. There is, however, another danger which was pointed out some years ago by Baron Richthofen, but which is not mentioned by Mr. Little. By the constant flow of the winter current the stream has in some parts scooped out for itself a narrow course in the middle of the wider summer bed of the river. As the water rises in the spring it conceals the limits of the narrower channel, with the result that junks are constantly stranded and wrecked on the shallow sides of the central stream.

The Yangtsze-kiang is a river about which most people know no more than about the Salween or the Orinoco. The geography books tell us that it is one of the largest rivers in the world; but, if it were not for the adventurous voyages of the few travellers who have lately faced its perils, we should know nothing of its beauties, and should be ignorant of the stranger sights which are to be witnessed on its banks. For depth and majestic beauty the gorges of the Yangtsze are probably unsurpassed anywhere. But for the full enjoyment of all scenery a certain amount of ease is necessary. It is quite impossible to appreciate even these masterpieces of nature when one is conscious that one's life is dependent on a tow-line which, under the fraying influence of a sharp rock, is threatening to snap in two every moment. Nor is the situation improved by landing on the banks, for there the foothold is so precarious that travellers unaccustomed to mountain-climbing are constantly reduced to scrambling on their hands and knees along the narrow ledges which serve as paths. Mr. Little tells us that in one of the gorges he attempted to follow the trackers.

> At length [he writes] the towing-path rounded a smooth, almost precipitous rock, about 100 feet above the river level, until at last the narrow footway came to an end, and the elbow of the slope was rounded by some ten or twenty single footsteps, cut in the face of the smooth limestone, just large enough for the small feet of a Chinaman. I was stuck. I could not go forward, and dare not turn round to go back; the trackers were far ahead, and the short twilight was fast merging into night. I was almost in despair, when fortunately one of the trackers came back to look for me. Carefully divesting myself of my boots, avoiding a glance at the foaming water below, and holding the man's hand, I soon got over; but what a path for men harnessed to a tow-line to risk their necks on!

No wonder he fails to give us an adequate description of the scenery which surrounded him at that trying moment. But speaking generally his book, as a record of travel, is decidedly interesting. His knowledge of the Chinese language has enabled him to gather information which was inaccessible to most of his predecessors, and his long acquaintance with the East has made him a discriminating observer of the features of the country and of the habits of the people. His knowledge of Chinese history is not, however, on a par with his capabilities for travel. His assertion that, "since the last change of dynasty (A.D. 1644) the Chinese have enjoyed the blessings of peace and prosperity uninterruptedly, with the exception of the petty wars of this century with ourselves and the French," is as true as it would be to say that Europe has been undisturbed by hostilities during the same period; and is in keeping with his statement that the Taeping leader, Hung Siuchuen, whose name he spells thus on p. 137, and Hong-hsio-choen on p. 2, "was one of the very few genuine Christian converts ever made in China." In the first place, Hung was never received into any Christian body, and was no more a Christian than Mahomet was, his religion being based on a study of some few chapters of the Bible and on the grotesque fancies of himself and his brother brigands. The implication, also, that missionary work in China has been absolutely barren is equally opposed to the fact. In 1886 421 Chinamen and women were baptized by the members of the China Inland Mission alone, and we must either accept the work of this Society as genuine, or we must believe that such men as Mr. C. T. Studd and the Polhill-Turners have allied themselves with a band of impostors.

THE CITY OF DREAM.*

In a prose note, hidden at the end of his book, Mr. Buchanan explains its scope and purpose. It is the "epic of modern Revolt and Reconciliation." The author means it to be "for the inquiring modern spirit, what the lovely vision of Bunyan is for those who still exist in the fairyland of dogmatic Christianity . . . the sympathetic modern will find here the record of his own heart-burnings, doubts, and experiences, though . . . he may not have passed through the Valley of Dead Gods at all, or looked with wondering eyes on the Spectre of the Inconceivable; though he may never have realized to the full, as I have done, the existence of the City without God, or have come at the last, footsore and despairing, to find solace and certainty on the brink of the Celestial Ocean."

The City of God is in Heaven, said Philammon, when the Goths asked him whether their sacred city of Asgard lay up the Nile; and the result of the Quest described in The City of Dream may be summed up in the same words. The entire poem is more or less modelled upon The Pilgrim's Progress; but the reader will not appreciate The City of Dream as it deserves if he continually compares the two. Bunyan knew scarcely any book save the Bible, and this fact limited both his style and his ideas to those of the Scriptures, while Mr. Buchanan ranges over all subjects in Heaven and earth. Bunyan's personifications are as clear as noonday; but Mr. Buchanan's are not unfrequently obscure, and we forget the music of his verse while endeavouring to trace his allusions. We miss, too, the strong human interest and the shrewd humorous touches which enliven Bunyan's mighty allegory; and are inclined to become sated and dazed as we follow Mr. Buchanan's vague central figure through endless mazes of fruitless wandering, told in the same sweet, sad, monotonously melodious verse. Having said thus much, however, we must now express our genuine admiration for the poem as a very excellent piece of work when judged upon its merits. Its versification is rather that of The Earthly Paradise than that of Paradise Lost; but this is no mean praise; while the lyric songs scattered through the work are perfect of their kind. Many phrases will win for themselves a permanent place in the memory, as, for example:—

> Like wicked music heard at dead of night
> Within some fairy circle by the sea—

or,

> When he spoke, his voice
> Was like a fountain in a shady place.

The machinery of the poem may be briefly sketched as follows:—The Pilgrim passes from his home to Christopolis, which we conceive to be Rome. On his way he meets one Iconoclast, whom we believe we are right in identifying with Voltaire, on the authority of the line,

> Iconoclast hath built this church to God, which seems to be an echo of the inscription "Deo erexit Voltaire." Chased as a heretic from Christopolis, he takes refuge beyond "a great gate dividing the city into two parts"—the meaning of which is not so difficult to guess—and, after meeting "the outcasts of all the creeds" at the Wayside Inn, he arrives at the Groves of Faun—perhaps the most beautiful part of the poem—rich with gorgeous imagery, and the Amphitheatre, wherein "an effort is made to adumbrate the entire spirit of Greek poetry and theology." All creeds and all mythologies sweep in stately pageant through the Valley of Dead Gods; and then the pilgrim finds himself in the City Without God. Here he is seized and cast into prison; but, "forewarned and cunning to escape," he declares to the Inquisitors that "when the body of man is dust" nought survives—Shade of Bunyan!—save "those thoughts which are the heirloom of us all," and that the believers imprisoned with him are mad.

> Because they see a Shadow on the world,
> Namely, the Shadow of Death, and call it God.

Upon this the Inquisitors say, "This man is harmless, let him go," and as, sick at heart and shamed, he creeps away amid the rebukes of his fellow-prisoners, he seeks "some place wherein a soul worn out with pilgrimage may rest and pray." He finds a stately temple with rich painted windows, wherein, "instead of Saints, were wise men of the earth," and an unseen choir sings the Darwinian theory. Driven thence, he finds a vast hall, where a lecturer practises vivisection. We must leave our readers to follow him to the shore of the Celestial Ocean, where he listens to the music of the spheres, finds "the dream of generations justified," learns to look on Death as a friend rather than a foe, and is taught by the vision of the "Ship of Souls" to look for the resurrection of the dead, and the life of the world to come.

Mr. Buchanan is too fond of sonorous meaningless words:—

> Through all the architraves of that blue vault
> . . . . a waste
> With never wood nor gentle cynosure.
> . . . . .
> The euphrasy of pain.

Does Mr. Buchanan know that cynosure means a dog's tail?

ΕΡΟΣ (sic) ΑΝΑΓΚΗ, and Eleokles we must charitably suppose to be printers' errors, but what are we to say of "Microcos" or "Kratos and dark Bias"? Christ, moreover, is repeatedly called "the Paraclete"; and many pious readers will be justly shocked at the words from the Cross being put into the mouth of the dying Cheiron, as it appears, and with the vision on the vivisector's table. But let us take leave of Mr. Buchanan con la bocca dolce by quoting one of the finest similes of The City of Dream:—

> Hast thou stood
> Within some vast cathedral's organ-loft
> While the great organ throbs, the stone walls stir,

* The City of Dream: an Epic Poem. By Robert Buchanan. London: Chatto & Windus.

The thunder of the deep ecstatic bass
Trembles like earthquake underfoot, the flame
Of the bright silvern flutes shoots heavenward,
And music like a darkness and a flame
Gathers and kindles, wrapping in its cloud
The great cathedral to its upmost spire?
Ev'n so, but more immeasurably strange,
Throbb'd solemn music through Christopolis;
And all my soul grew sick with rapturous awe
As slowly to the sound I mov'd along.
Amid the shining temples, silver shrines,
Solemn cathedrals, shadowy cloister walls,
Under the golden roofs, beneath the spires
With fiery finger pointing up to Heaven.
Far over head, from glittering dome to dome Flew doves, so high in air they seemed as small
As winged butterflies, and 'mid the courts
Paven with bright mosaic and with pearl,
Walk'd, wrapped in saintly robes of amethyst,
Processions of the holy, singing psalms,
While smoke of incense swung in censers bright,
Blew round them, rosy as a sunset cloud.

FLEEMING JENKIN.*

PROBABLY few distinguished men have ever left the world after doing much to help it on who so thoroughly required notice after their death as Professor Fleeming Jenkin. The curious absence of all self-seeking, even of the most legitimate kind, which distinguished him in his professorial and scientific work, together with his worship for and absorption in his distinguished colleague, leader, and teacher, Sir William Thomson, has caused his name to be almost entirely unknown to the general public. Even in the scientific world perhaps he never held as high a reputation as he deserved. For in the great advance in pure science which has been of so much importance to applied science—the fixing and standardizing of absolute measurement of electrical phenomena—his part was principally that of the man who forced the thing into prominence and had it done. But although, besides this, he gave much help to his colleagues on the Committee of the British Association by his clear grasp of the subject and his ready and fertile inventive powers, and although he drew up the report of the Committee, yet the names of his colleagues are better known than his. Apart from professorial life he was, if not known to the public, well known and much loved by a very large number of personal friends. To them he was known not only as a man always full of life and spirit, but as one of so ready a mind, so clear an intellect, that any man who would listen could extract from him many a valuable hint and many a fruitful saying on the subject nearest his own heart, however remote it might be from those subjects—and they were many—which Fleeming Jenkin was known to have studied and made his own. The present book gives more or less a record of his professorial and scientific life, and shows how much the world owes to him in the matter of electrical measurement, deep-sea telegraph cable-laying, and sanitary inspection, whilst the Papers will show how many different subjects were always kept at a high state of polish in his mind.

One thing will be clearly seen from these Papers, that Professor Fleeming Jenkin had the critical faculty in a very high degree, felt his power, and upheld the dignity of criticism by honesty and thoroughness. However much any reader may disagree with any opinions expressed in these Papers, yet, no matter what the subject may be, he will feel that these are the opinions of a man who knows his subject, who has thought deeply, and who is always ready with his reasons for forming those opinions. If the reader do not feel this at once, let him reflect that the criticism on Darwin's Origin of Species influenced the author, although much of the able and clever argument against evolution in any form would now be answerable by any earnest student of the subject, perhaps the more easily because the opinions of physicists and mathematicians as to the age of the habitable world have undergone great changes since this paper was written, and if any further proof of his clear grasp of new subjects were required, we might point to the fact that a review of a work on Gynecology, written by Mr. Fleeming Jenkin in his early years, was embodied by the author in the next editions of the work as an additional chapter. Both editors and biographer have had a difficult task, and, on the whole, it has been carried out well. Perhaps one or two of the literary and artistic articles could have been spared to make room for more of the scientific papers; certainly, in our opinion, those on Mrs. Siddons as Lady Macbeth, and Mrs. Siddons as Queen Catharine, might have been omitted, or at all events compressed, as there is but little Fleeming Jenkin and very much Professor Bell and Shakspeare, which occupies many pages which might have been devoted to the thoughts of Fleeming Jenkin.

However, such as the Papers are, they fully show the character of the man. Modest he was, yet never shirking the expression of his own convictions; courteous, yet always attacking fiercely what he considered to be wrong; many-sided, and versatile, yet never shallow, and, above all, thoroughly knowing his own mind and expressing his thoughts with a rare clearness and brightness of style. The short note by Sir William Thomson will show how Professor Fleeming Jenkin's professorial and personal qualities affected his great leader; and one passage should be quoted here in support of our statement that Professor Fleeming Jenkin's work is practically unknown:—

> He was the very first to introduce systematically into practice the grand system of absolute (electrical) measurement founded in Germany by Gauss and Weber. The immense value of this step, if only in respect to the electric telegraph, is amply appreciated by all who remember or who have read something of the history of submarine telegraphy; but it can scarcely be known generally how much is due to Jenkin.

To attempt to criticize Mr. Stevenson's memoir is by no means an easy task. There is much to admire in it, but, in our opinion, much to condemn, and still more which is inexplicable. In the first place, Mr. Stevenson, from necessarily imperfect materials, has succeeded with much skill in making a fairly consecutive narrative of Professor Fleeming Jenkin's life, and though debarred by ill-health from mixing personally with many of Jenkin's old friends, has brought together many characteristic anecdotes and records of conversations; but we very much question the good taste of raking up the carelessnesses and headstrong follies of families in whom the public takes no interest, the more so as we fail to see how Mr. Stevenson connects their vagaries with the character of their descendant, as he seems to think he has done, if we may judge from his reference to Mr. Francis Galton. But the point which is to us perfectly inexplicable is the apparent tone of depreciation and patronage in which Mr. Stevenson speaks of the subject of his memoir. It may be that, writing of a dear friend, he has feared to write in a tone of adulation, and writing of a friend old enough to be his father, he has feared to write in too submissive a strain, and thus has fallen into the opposite extreme; but even then we fail to understand by what mistakes or by what excess of caution Mr. Stevenson could have conveyed the extremely unpleasant impression of Professor Fleeming Jenkin's character which would be left on the mind of any stranger by reading the memoir alone, without correcting his judgment by reading the bright original letters or studying the collected papers. How this tone has crept in is perhaps no matter; to our mind it exists, but in spite of it the memoir is interesting. The story Mr. Stevenson has to tell is one of very great interest; for not only is it necessarily connected with the advance of science, and, above all, with the early struggles with the difficulties of deep-sea telegraph cable-laying, but it is also the record of a life of indomitable energy and cheerfulness—a life that no difficulties checked in its progress and no misfortunes could permanently cloud, emphatically a useful and happy life, and, further, a life passed amongst many stirring scenes of modern history, Fleeming Jenkin having been present in Paris at the Revolution of 1848, and having heard the celebrated shot fired which started that outbreak. His impressions of these troubled times are set out in letters written by him on the spot to a boy friend. Later on he was present at the siege of Genoa, and all who read the account of his behaviour during these abnormal experiences can see that in the boy as in the man there was that remarkable blending of poetic and generous feeling with sound practical common sense that made him in later years so delightful a companion and so trustworthy an adviser—qualities that enabled him to live up to his favourite maxim, "Work at your play and play at your work." He truly put as much energy and thought into his play as would set up most hardworking professional men, and got as much enjoyment or play out of the hardest work as would satisfy the most ardent pleasure-seeker. In conclusion, we may say that we hope that all who read these volumes will form their own opinion of Professor Fleeming Jenkin's character, manners, and abilities from the materials to be found in his own letters and papers rather than accept what appears to be Mr. Stevenson's view of them.

JEBB'S ANTIGONE.*

PROFESSOR JEBB'S edition of Sophocles is already so fully established, and has received such appreciation in these columns and elsewhere, that we have judged this third volume (The Antigone) when we have said that it is of a piece with the others. The whole edition so far exhibits perhaps the most complete and elaborate editorial work which has ever appeared. It seems scarcely possible that anything material to Sophocles can have escaped such diligence as these pages show. Indeed, the desire of the editor to present everything is only too impartial; and we are sometimes disposed, when we consider the extent of the subject and the condensed argument of the commentary and appendices, to recall him from refutation or examination to the task excellently described by himself as that of setting forth "his own mind in relation to Sophocles." But to the class of readers chiefly interested in a work of this scope the argumentative parts of it are so valuable that we can wish nothing away. And it is certainly a remarkable achievement, of which the worst that could be said is that it is too perfect.

In this volume the Introduction (to which in the space at our command we shall mainly confine our remarks) is very interesting and satisfactory. The most important question presented by the play is whether we are intended by the poet to view the conduct of the heroine with an unqualified sympathy? whether Antigone, in giving burial to her brother, though her king forbids the act, is to be regarded as simply maintaining the just rights of the private conscience against tyranny, or as urging with exaggeration one just principle incompatible for the moment with another also just, the principle of constitutional authority. Should her punishment be regarded as in some sense just? On this question Professor Jebb takes what we hold to be the right view—Antigone is intended by Sophocles to be wholly right, Creon wholly wrong. On the one hand, Creon is not truly representative of constitutional authority. "When the unanimous opinion of the community was ignored, the Athenians of the poet's day would feel that, as Hæmon says, there was no 'city' at all." On the other hand, Antigone is fulfilling the most absolutely sacred of Hellenic obligations. In all that the editor says on the force of Hellenic feeling in favour of burial we fully agree; what he says as to the great antiquity of this feeling is not necessary to his argument and not indisputable. In Homer we find at the most the rudiments of such a sanction; and when "the antiquity of the maxim that after a battle the conquerors were bound to allow the vanquished to bury their dead is proved by the fact that it was ascribed either to Theseus or to Heracles," it must be remembered that to claim a fictitious antiquity is a common defence of innovation. Sophocles himself, we think, might supply arguments to show that, even in the fifth century, the concession of burial under all circumstances, though doubtless safe from dispute among more civilized people, had not yet passed altogether beyond the region of contest. If it had, we should scarcely find it so prominent a subject of dramatic interest as it is in the Ajax and Antigone. However, this is, for the editor's purpose, merely an obiter dictum; on the main argument we entirely agree with him. Of the history of Sophocles's plot he has said what can be said. Unfortunately the indispensable documents are wanting. The epics of the Theban cycle, which must have been for the history of tragedy at least as important as those of the Trojan, are almost entirely lost; and we can only guess in what shape the story came to Æschylus. When we come to Sophocles the difficulty is complicated by our imperfect knowledge of Æschylus. The Seven against Thebes breaks off in the very middle of Antigone's story, and is obviously written "to be continued." The situation which it leaves is indeed, as Professor Jebb explains, essentially different from that of Sophocles. The Antigone of Æschylus is openly supported by some of her countrywomen; the Antigone of Sophocles stands alone. But for the literary history of the plot it is all-important to know whether Æschylus continued the story, and how. And just this is unknown to us. The "council" who are defied by Æschylus's Antigone could hardly have put her to death; if they did, they must have been much embarrassed by the case of her "maidens." Professor Jebb indeed regards these attendants as representing one side of average civic opinion, which, we think, goes beyond, if it does not contradict, the language which Æschylus puts in their mouths. But the sequel is not easy to figure, and for us at least remains untold. To return to Sophocles; we are rejoiced that the editor adds his weighty vote against the genuineness of the passage (904-920) which quibbles away the very essence of Antigone's justification for a miserable quirk upon the comparative value of brothers and other relations. His opinion, if not rigorously demonstrable, is probable and pious, and we shall continue to believe it. We should call it demonstrable if only we could guess the interpolator's motive. In connexion with the Antigone the editor of course discusses the alleged election of the poet to the office of strategus. He shows that the fact is by no means so surprising as it may seem at first to a modern conception, and in fact offers no internal difficulties to balance its respectable testimony.

Among the emendations, commendably few, proposed in this volume we notice, as to us quite satisfactory, παρὰ δὲ Κυανεᾶν πελάγει διδύμας ἁλὸς "by the waters of the Dark Rocks, the waters of the two-fold sea" (for κυανέων πελάγεων [sic] 966), and καὶ ταῦτ' ἐπαινεῖς, καὶ δοκεῖ παρεικαθεῖν; "And this is thy counsel? Thou would'st have me yield?" (for δοκεῖς, which gives the irrelevant question, "Art thou minded to yield?" 1102). In 23 σὺν δίκης χρήσει δικαίᾳ καὶ νόμου (proposed concurrently by the editor and G. H. Müller, for δίκῃ χρησθεὶς δικαίᾳ καὶ νόμῳ) is acceptable; equally so, and simpler ἀντιπάλῳ δυσχείρωμα δράκοντος (for δράκοντι, 126), "a thing too hard for him to conquer as he wrestled with his dragon foe." The note here might well be disembarrassed of the reference to "Æsch. Theb. 1022, τυμβοχόα χειρώματα . . . works of the hand in mound-making," a use of χείρωμα utterly different from the others cited and from any that is likely to be cited. The passage of Æschylus would not admit the meaning given, even if the use of χείρωμα did: it must be erroneous and is of no authority. To suggestions not his own Professor Jebb seems occasionally too indulgent; in 466 ἠισχόμην νέκυν is changed (after Semitelos) into ἤσχυναν κύνες, a restoration possible certainly, but so speculative that we should prefer an "obelus." In the passages, unusually numerous in this play, where our MSS. differ from ancient quotations, he reinforces the common-sense view that an ancient editor deliberately engaged in reproducing a poet's text was far less likely to blunder than a writer who perhaps had no copy before him at all, and might well be careless about a variation which did not affect his purpose. Quotations may supplement MSS. evidence, if defective, but are of little or no weight as against it.

Of the three Theban plays of Sophocles, now completed, Professor Jebb truly remarks that, even when arranged (as they were not produced) in order of plot, they do not make a "trilogy"; they are not parts of one literary whole. We gladly note a restriction on the abuse of this word, which, if only for clearness, might well be reserved to one sense—"Three tragedies produced (with a satyric drama) at the same time." The three plays of Æschylus's Orestes formed a "trilogy" because they were produced together, not because they make a complete whole; the Laius, Œdipus, and Septem of Æschylus formed a "trilogy" because they were produced together, and although they did not make a whole artistically complete. The union of the three contemporary tragedies by plot is described by Professor Jebb as "the practice of Æschylus," and is extended to include the "satyric drama." The practice was of course not universal with Æschylus, nor is it easy on the present evidence to say how far it obtained. The ascertained examples are not very many. But this subject is beyond the present occasion. We should rather turn, if we had space, to the editor's excellent translation and commentary, which we have hardly touched. But it is quite impossible here to do justice to the subject, and we would rather excuse our default by the frequency of the editor's diligence in demanding a commendation which he does not require. This volume is full of enjoyment both for students and simple readers, and we anticipate with confidence the continuation and completion of Professor Jebb's most honourable task.

OUR RIVER.*

THOUGH Our River is only a new edition of a favourite work, we fear it may have been neglected, if not forgotten, and it is a book that loses nothing by keeping. Moreover, there is a multiplication of the charming illustrations, and there are many alterations and additions. The Thames has been often described with pen and pencil, in prose and verse; but nevertheless lovers of the river seem never to be weary of hearing of it. They are under the spell of its bright associations, and are pleasantly haunted by the memories of merry boating parties or solitary musings in the sunshine of soft summer days. Those fervent admirers of Father Thames must be in strong sympathy with Mr. Leslie, who has taken the river to his heart and studied it in all its moods and caprices. He has brought out this new edition of his book in nipping winds and biting frosts, and so far it is tantalizing; yet it comes to us like a balmy breath of spring, and we almost forget to shiver for a time, as we lie basking in the glow of the summer we long for. Mr. Leslie writes of the Thames in all its aspects, but chiefly and naturally from the artistic point of view. He seems to have taken to the water like a young duck, and escaped by a series of miracles from his dangerous boyish adventures in crank or unseaworthy craft in Battersea Reach and below the London bridges. The gifted son of a distinguished painter, he was brought up in a society of artists, and his own artistic instincts were rapidly developed when the elder Mr. Leslie took a cottage at Hampton. It was then he first fell in love with the Thames, and his love has since grown into a passion. Summer after summer, since he began to handle a brush, he has gone to seek inspiration on its banks. The artists, like the fraternity of beggars and tramps, make it a point of honour to communicate their experiences. They are attracted, of course, by the fascination of the scenery that suggests their favourite subjects; and they combine considerations of economy with appreciation of the comfortable and an admiration for all that is picturesque and effective. For the most part they shun the fashionable hotels and the inns where apartments are generally bespoken in advance by the families of City men and couples who have gone honeymooning. They have their favourite houses of call in old-fashioned hostelries and in snug cottages with lozenged windows, where the rooms are clean, where the spotless bed-linen is scented with lavender, and where the mistress makes herself the mother of her guests, and takes a pride in her simple cookery. Mr. Leslie has much to say of some of these comfortable, though unpretentious, places of sojourn. Season after season in his bachelor days he used to go to the cottage of a certain Mrs. Copeland at Taplow, and he pays a tribute of gratitude to his good old friend in the shape of the portrait of a lady in spectacles, which must be a striking likeness. There, in a little spare bedroom, he entertained many an eminent or rising artist. There was a strip of garden running down to the little landing-place, at which he kept his boat; and there he laboriously initiated himself in the science of punting, and became the proud possessor of a punt of his own. That marked an epoch in his artistic existence. Thenceforth he was independent, and the punt became a floating studio, in which he set up his easel, and painted the otherwise inaccessible pieces of scenery that chanced to strike his fancy. He explored romantic backwaters, brought himself to an anchor under moss-grown eel-bucks between a couple of rypecks, and kept himself besides in first-rate condition by bringing all the muscles into active service. Through all the chapters of his fascinating volume he sings the praises of the punt. There is no painting to be done in outriggers, or even in tubs; steam-launches he holds in abhorrence and contempt; and he talks slightingly of the voluptuous indolence inseparable from the commodious house-boat. But the punt he considers the perfection of a water-carriage for the painter, and especially for the painter who is a family man. The companion of his pleasures and his cares may establish herself comfortably among the cushions at the stern, and a child or two may tumble about without any danger of upsetting the craft. Nor is the management so difficult as a novice might suppose. If you invite unsuspecting friends to an outing, you can often press them into hauling at the tow-rope; and Mr. Leslie has found in practice that they usually submit uncomplainingly. When you are reduced to do the heavy pulling against stream yourself, experience teaches you how to dodge the drudgery; and Mr. Leslie waxes actually eloquent as to the dexterity with which the adept can direct his craft. His punt seemed at last almost to anticipate his will, and yield docilely to the slightest turn of the wrist. That there are certain drawbacks he candidly confesses. The pace is slow; the number of passengers is limited; and, above all, the exigencies of punting bring the punter in for a good deal of abuse. The master of a steam-launch is freely cursed, of course; but he can laugh at the enemies he quickly leaves behind him. Whereas the punter may have to work up in the shallows beneath the bank, where a row of eager fishermen entered for a competition are jealously watching their floats. Naturally they resent the troubling of the waters, which scares the fish and makes them haul in their baits.

Mr. Leslie enlivens his book with many and miscellaneous reminiscences, and he relates them with a good deal of humour. Take, for example, some personal recollections of his hens, for he makes pets of his poultry, and cherishes a famous game breed. Two old hens have an embarrassing habit of "getting broody" late, when he no longer wishes for chickens. "They sit together, forming a sort of 'company limited' for hatching china eggs. It is astonishing how the other hens testify their faith in their company by investing eggs in it every day, which of course are removed. These hens go on in this queer partnership for three months, time being no object." Again, as a close and loving observer, he dashes off with his pen a series of delightful vignettes of the wild life on the Thames that may be met with even now; of the hanging gardens of wild flowers clothing steep cliffs of chalk and clay, and of the beds of blooming sedges and aquatic plants in which the punter may easily lose his bearings. The graceful swans are the great ornament of the river; there is a charming picture of three of them, done with the brush, as they float in the swirls and among the leaves of the lilies, between a stormy sky and the surface that mirrors it. The moorhens, although persecuted by the poaching roughs with their guns and dogs, of whom Mr. Leslie complains bitterly, are still to be seen frequently swimming below the banks. It is the more surprising that so many have survived since persecution has not taught them to conceal their nests. They build in the most simple and artless fashion, trusting, apparently, to the colours of the surrounding sedges to conceal them. The kingfishers get scarcer year by year, though they are still to be seen in the more secluded backwaters. Generally you may get a glimpse of a bright flash of colour shooting up or down the stream in the shadow of the bank or the bushes. But once Mr. Leslie had an opportunity of leisurely admiring one when it perched within a few feet of the spot where he was sketching, and remained motionless on the branch for several minutes. Herons are still common; and Mr. Leslie attributes it to the wariness which makes it almost impossible to approach them. That may be the case on a broad and bustling river, but we may say that on back-of-the-world streams and nooks in the far north we have found the heron anything but shy. At least he will imprudently tuck up a leg and settle himself for his fishing where the banks make it an easy business to stalk him. "There be land-rats and water-rats" in great abundance. Mr. Leslie detests the former, who come with a savour of the sewers to what should be the sweet-smelling Thames; but he has rather a liking for the latter. Listening as you go punting past, you may hear them chumping in the reeds; but when the punt comes to an anchor, and the punter keeps quiet, he is sure to see one or two come swimming out of the cover, and going in for their gambols on the boughs of the willows. Those clay-cliffs which are so brightly tapestried with flowers are honeycombed towards the bottom by the burrows of the water-rats; and the unlucky beasts are sometimes sorely put to it when floated out of their homes by the winter inundations. Mr. Leslie gives enchanting descriptions of the water-plants, and of the bank flowers in their summer bloom. With a painter's eye for colours and contrasts, he sketches the purple blossoms of the loose-strife blending with the pinks of the bushy willow-herb. And the St. John's wort may always be seen in close proximity to these, "the rich yellow flowers in exquisite harmony with the purple stalks and heads of the loose-strife." The river has gay gardens of its own; the islets of sand and gravel cast up by the changes in the currents are quickly covered with grasses and sedges, and even with the bright blue forget-me-nots. Yet, strangely enough, some of our most familiar wild plants are conspicuously absent, and ferns and primroses are rarely to be seen, though the soil may seem suited to the one and the other. But what has struck Mr. Leslie most forcibly, in his fond admiration of nature, is the marvellous and invariable harmony of design. "Where man has not dared to meddle there is nothing to jar on the senses. And where Nature is not atrociously outraged she is ever ready to forgive and repair. You cannot expect her to tolerate a cast-iron bridge or to throw her draperies over some staring factory building. But "very rapidly a new weir or lock becomes picturesque and beautiful; it is true the agents at work are powerful — large flowing bushes, tall grass and mosses, aided by the rushing waters, with their spray and a few weeks' hot sun." The river banks, being left to themselves, "are most charming studies of true arrangement, the most beautiful being always those that have been left undisturbed the longest. In the growth of trees and bushes what a wonderful thing it is that almost every leaf takes its line, and has reference to the lines and composition of every other leaf on the plant! . . . My favourite willow is a beautiful example in this respect," in the harmonious colouring of the foliage, and even in its self-adjustment to the setting of the landscape.

We have glanced at Mr. Leslie's volume chiefly in its picturesque aspects, because his æsthetic susceptibilities and his educated eye give a special interest and value to these. But as a handbook and a boating guide it is greatly to be commended; it indicates all the most attractive stretches of scenery; it directs attention to ruined cloisters and ancient manor-houses, to quaint farmhouses and cottages, to old-world hamlets clustered out of sight among their trees in the shadows of their grey old church-towers. It recalls the legends and historical memories of the past, as it is full of interesting reminiscences of the author's artist friends. And among the contributors to the fifty illustrations which enrich it are Mr. Marks, Mr. Briton Riviere, and the late Frederick Walker, who lies buried in the quiet churchyard of Cookham, and lulled by the murmur of the river he loved so well in life.

THE LAWYER, THE STATESMAN, AND THE SOLDIER.*

THE Lawyer, the Statesman, and the Soldier is the somewhat large title which Mr. Boutwell has chosen for a little collection of magazine articles or addresses devoted to Rufus Choate, Daniel Webster, Lincoln, and Grant. All four are good subjects for critical and biographical essays. Much has been written on them; but that is no reason why we should not have more. Even if there is nothing new and true to say about them, the essayist always has the resource of resaying the said better than it has been said already. Mr. Boutwell had his literary chance; and, as he was personally acquainted with all four men, it was a good one. He has so far availed himself of it as to have placed on record his own very ardent admiration for his four countrymen. This, in its way, is a matter of some importance. In future times, when the American historian sums up the period beginning with the youth of Webster and ending with the death of Grant, he will have Mr. Boutwell's word for it that these men appeared to him, and doubtless to many others, to be in the very first rank of greatness. Surveying all history, with that large sweep peculiar to Americans, Mr. Boutwell finds that these four eminent citizens rank with Pitt, Burke, Julius Cæsar, and generally with the foremost men of all the world. What reflections this estimate will give rise to in the mind of the American historian of the twenty-first century we shall not undertake to predict. Perhaps in the course of the ages the adjective "great" will come to be used with more discrimination in the United States. Perhaps it will slide further down the slope. By the twenty-first century it may have run the whole course which has reduced "naughty" from the King's Bench to the nursery. In the meantime Mr. Boutwell supplies an example of the prevailing American use.

Beyond that, he cannot be said to have contributed much to the sum of knowledge about "the lawyer, the statesman, and the soldier." On the types he has not much to say which strikes one as of universal application, though general reflections are not wanting. Take, for instance, this oracular saying, "The great things of life are the products of truly great men." How true! Neither is novelty a feature of Mr. Boutwell's estimate of his four particular examples. We have heard better and more characteristic things of Rufus Choate than are given by him; and as for the other three, Mr. Boutwell judges them as a good party man should. As for the truth of his judgments, that also is to seek. Not that we accuse our author either of suppressing the true, except in one case, or knowingly stating the false. Beyond all doubt he has put nothing down in which he did not conscientiously believe—but, then, he believes like a party man. Again, he has a way of making large statements on matters of history and politics, and of stringing names together which howl at finding themselves in company. The practice is American, but uncritical, and indicates a want of the judicial faculty. In the essay on Rufus Choate, Mr. Boutwell makes the reasonably safe statement, that great orators cannot be said with confidence to have been "eminently successful in the practical affairs of government," and then he goes on, "Cicero may have been an exception, but even his career is open to question in that respect. [Well, it is.] Certainly the elder Pitt, Burke, Lamartine, Kossuth, and Castelar are instances of failure, and some of them are conspicuous examples." Here are five oarsmen one wonders to see pulling in the same whaler. We did use to think, too, that the statesman who helped England out of the Walpolian slough of despond, the meanest mire she ever lay in, and who among other things settled the fight between us and the French in America, was not without practical faculty. This trick of rattling off strings of historical names is about the surest mark of the sciolist. In the essay on Daniel Webster Mr. Boutwell contrives to combine partizanship and bad criticism in a parallel between him and Calhoun. The South Carolina leader, he says, cannot be fairly called a statesman, because he "identified himself with the institution of slavery"; which means that nobody can be a statesman who was not on Mr. Boutwell's side. "Webster," he says, "was known as the defender of the Constitution; and that he was, for he well knew that the Union would stand as long as the Constitution was observed"; while "Calhoun's teaching tended to the destruction of the Union." But both men claimed to be devoted to the Union, and both believed that its continuance depended on the correct interpretation of the Constitution. The question between them just was as to the correct interpretation. Because the Union was preserved in one way, which for the rest was not Webster's, it does not follow that it might not have been saved in the other, which would have been Calhoun's. Mr. Boutwell skips very gingerly over the, for him, awkward fact that Webster also, in the end, "identified himself with the institution of slavery."

The four papers on Lincoln and Grant are full, as might be expected, of exaggerated praise. What is to be said about the criticism of a writer who asks for a judgment on Lincoln, "not as a competitor with Mr. Douglas for a seat in the Senate of the United States, but as a competitor for fame with the first orators of this and other countries, of this and other ages"? Of course he can have his judgment if he insists on it, but there are some comparisons which one does not make. We also have an answer ready to the question whether Grant's career can "fail to place him with the small number of great generals since Julius Cæsar"? No, we do not think that he will mess in heaven with Hannibal, Julius Cæsar, Gustavus Adolphus, Turenne, Marlborough, and the Great Napoleon. Still, when a heavy discount has been taken off for inflated rhetoric, there is a residue of solid truth in Mr. Boutwell's praise. As time goes on, and as the actors in the Civil War write or are written about, the President and his General look taller, and not smaller, among their competitors. The great names Mr. Boutwell lavishes so freely may be left aside, but Lincoln and Grant are certainly the least inconsiderable figures in their surroundings, with the exception of the two foremost soldiers of the Confederacy. The President had at least some of the qualities of a statesman. He knew his own mind, he had a definite object before him, and a good notion how to attain it. His intellectual honesty was respectable. He could estimate any fact he had to deal with, and he never thought that a thing must be so and so because it would suit his convenience that it should be. These are at least the qualities of a resolute, sagacious man; and, as compared with the professional politicians of Washington, or the vapouring logic-choppers of the South, they make Lincoln respectable and even dignified. It is all a question of comparison, and one need not take the standard least favourable to the President. Of Grant, too, it may fairly be said that he also knew what he had to do. One of the small number of great generals since Julius Cæsar would have seen that pegging away in Northern Virginia was a stupid, wasteful, and therefore wicked fashion of attacking the South. But the country wanted a big show, and Grant gave it, as became a workmanlike showman. At the mess-table spoken of already he will at least be entitled to a seat next to Suwarrow. He ought to get on very well with the Russian. The blessed ghost of the great King of Sweden could give either of them the king's bishop and checkmate them in ten moves.

THE NORFOLK BROADS.*

AMONG the water-ways of East Norfolk there is abundance of picturesque material of the kind that needs not to be sought with diligence nor demands the ingenuities of selection and arrangement. The maker of pictures has little to do but to record his impressions by more or less frank transcript. The landscape is highly favourable to the reproductive process employed by Mr. P. H. Emerson in the twelve proof prints from copper plates after negatives which he has entitled "Idyls of the Norfolk Broads." About the working of this process Mr. Emerson is discreetly silent. His confidences do not extend beyond the statement that no re-touching of the original plates has been permitted. Being obtained direct from nature, they may be supposed to represent nature, and should naturally please. The prints vary in tone from a lively and warm brown to a cool and well-tempered grey; some are remarkably successful, others show imperfect co-relation of foreground and distances, with dry and harsh accents of detail, and a distance that is diaphanous yet unatmospheric. On the whole, the series is representative of the district of which Mr. Emerson writes with the knowledge that comes of enthusiastic study. No. 12, "The Mill," the "Haysel," the marshy pasture in No. 3, are charming pictures. "A Grey Day Pastoral" is a pleasing example of the cool, moist, and luminous effect of mild diffused light under a thinly-veiled sky. Among the remaining prints are some that have all the baldness and want of interest of ordinary photography. Mr. Emerson's text is pleasant reading, if at times a little redundant in adjectives. The enthusiast is too obviously rampant in the statement that Wordsworth "would have failed to do justice" to the Norfolk scenery. Even Byron, who lamented the "narrowness" of the Lake poet, would have hesitated to say that the Broads must needs prove too much for him. Mr. Emerson, however, thinks that the old Lake poet would never have become an old Broad poet.

PAINTERS AND THEIR WORKS.*

THERE is not much to be said about a book of this kind. It is an attempt to reproduce, in one volume and in a popular form, the chief subject-matter of such works as those of Kugler and Woermann on Mediæval Painters, and also includes a sketch of modern and even living artists. There is no trace of any original work in the book, and the author has seemingly not taken the trouble to read any of the great mass of information that has been published within recent years, mostly derived from existing documents, which in many cases have largely modified the long-prevailing beliefs on many points of the highest artistic interest. All the old-established blunders about painters and their works are reproduced by Mr. Radcliffe in a way that would have been excusable ten or fifteen years ago, but is quite unnecessary in a book published at the present date. Thus, for example, the great fresco of the "Doom" in the Pisan Campo Santo is attributed to Orcagna; Timoteo della Vite is called a pupil of Raphael; the tapestries which Raphael designed for the Sistine Chapel are said to have been woven at Arras; Melozzo da Forli is said to "have painted only in Rome"; and countless errors of the same obvious kind are scattered through Mr. Radcliffe's pages. The description given at pp. 252-3 about the so-called invention of oil-painting is very misleading—the whole essence of the Van Eycks' discovery being the use of litharge and similar driers, and not at all, as Mr. Radcliffe states, the invention of better sorts of varnish.

In his chapter on English painters of the nineteenth century the author shows but little appreciation of what is most excellent in art. The old exaggerated estimate of Landseer's ability is given in such language as could hardly have been used even during the height of his not altogether fortunate popularity; and very insufficient justice is done to the brilliant abilities of Rossetti and some other contemporary artists, whose seriousness of purpose and exalted aims entitle them to a large measure of respect from all those to whom true art is something more than the production of pretty toys. Without much knowledge of art, a little care in revision would have enabled the author to avoid a large number of curious misspellings of proper names, as, for example, Parmogianino, Zuccara, Vallumbrosa, Scalzo, Omphales, Nausicaa, and many others. With regard to the illustrations, one can only say that they are not very strikingly inferior to the text. They are mostly cheap reproductions of very spiritless engravings, executed in the dull mechanical style of half a century ago.

CAIRD'S SPINOZA.†

PRINCIPAL CAIRD'S little book on Spinoza has most of the respectable virtues that a book treating of a great philosopher within the limits of a "series" can be expected to have. It is conscientious in diligence, edifying and moderate in tone, and legitimate, according to the writer's highly respectable school, in its final judgment. Yet we cannot assert with truth that we have learnt anything from it, or express with sincerity an expectation that students of philosophy will learn much. We can only hope that others may find it more readable and stimulating than we do. Perhaps we are disqualified from appreciating its merits by an unfortunate habit which we formed a good many years ago, and have never been able to shake off, of thinking Spinoza more intelligible than his expounders. And as a matter of literary taste we prefer Spinoza's Latin to the neo-Hegelian dialect of North British. The conjectural history of Spinoza's relations to his Jewish and Gentile precursors has been pretty well worked out, and seventy-five pages out of three hundred and fifteen seems an excessive proportion to give to it when one has absolutely nothing new to say. The topic—certainly not less important—of the relation of Spinoza to modern ways of thinking does not appear to get any assignable number of pages at all. Also the ethical part of Spinoza's system hardly receives attention enough. It is a rather easy feat of nineteenth-century dialectic to glide lightly over the matters of permanent value, and make a parade of criticizing Spinoza's "theory of knowledge." Our own opinion is that Spinoza had not any "theory of knowledge" at all in the modern sense; and for our part we do not see how he could be expected to have one. We are conscious, indeed, that our objections go only to what Dr. Caird could get said under his conditions; they might be removed if we had before us the whole of what he intended or wished to say. Dr. Caird would doubtless have ordered many things otherwise if he had had elbow-room. But, after all, he was not compelled to write in a "series." Dr.

Martineau, wise betimes, burst all such bonds, and produced a really excellent work. As we do not precisely agree with either commentator, we are at least impartial when we confess ourselves unable to put Dr. Caird's results on anything like the same level.

MR. FREEMAN'S WILLIAM THE CONQUEROR.*

It can scarcely have been a hope of dazzling the public with novelty which induced Mr. Morley to begin his series of "English Statesmen" by Mr. Freeman's William the Conqueror. He must rather have wished to show the scientific nature of his undertaking when he began a survey of the results of English statesmanship so far back as eight hundred years ago, and allowed Mr. Freeman to tell over again a tale which he has already told in many forms. We hope that this is a guarantee that Mr. Morley himself intends to deal with the eighteenth century, which we notice that he has reserved entirely for himself, in the spirit of a historian and not of a political pamphleteer. He begins his series, at all events, with a little book, of which the learning and solidity are beyond dispute.

More than this, though Mr. Freeman's views are already known to those who have read his previous writings, he has given in this volume a vigorous sketch, which is more than a summary of what he has said before. Though the main lines of the story are the same, though the general arrangement is unchanged, yet this book has a definiteness of its own, because Mr. Freeman has honestly endeavoured to set William in his place as the chief among the makers of England. He has given an admirable account of William's training, William's character, and William's work—an account which could not be amended within its own limits. But the chief interest which will attach to the series of "English Statesmen" will probably be, not so much the manner in which the historical side of the work is done as in the conception of statesmanship which exists in the minds of the various writers.

Now the central point in Mr. Freeman's view is given in the following passage:—"It was the fatal temptation of princes, the temptation of territorial aggrandizement, which enabled him fully to show the powers which were in him, but which at the same time led to his moral degradation. . . . Each step in his career as conqueror was a step downwards." We cannot gainsay this judgment; but it leads to many contradictory reflections. If William had remained Duke of Normandy, he might or might not have been a better man, but he certainly would not have merited the name of a great statesman. The Norman conquest of England undoubtedly caused bloodshed, was founded on oppression, and was maintained by violence; but it made the England of which Mr. Freeman is so proud. The institutions of early days might be excellent; the Witanagemot might have a procedure which contrasted favourably with that of our Parliament even as amended by the new Rules; but without the organizing capacity which the Normans introduced these institutions would probably have fallen into premature decay. Mr. Freeman admits this fully; but he cannot help falling back upon a modern formula about "the temptation of territorial aggrandizement" leading to "moral degradation."

It is, no doubt, very desirable that history should be written in a moral spirit; but its morality need not be that of current saws applied to a period when those saws had not been discovered. The phrase "territorial aggrandizement" would scarcely have had much meaning in William's ear. So far as it denoted what we mean by it, William would have repudiated it as indignantly as would Mr. Bright. William most likely took possession of England with as clear a conscience as Sir Bartle Frere asserted the rights of civilization against the Sultan of Zanzibar. Mr. Freeman is too good an Englishman to be able to look at the English even of the days of Ethelred and Edward the Confessor as they were looked upon by the public opinion of Europe. Indeed, that public opinion had very vague ideas about territorial rights; and William might be excused for thinking that a country which had been for some years overrun and then annexed by the Danes was scarcely capable of taking care of itself and sorely needed a competent ruler to manage its affairs. Mr. Freeman writes as though the right of the English to possess England and live there in any condition of confusion which they thought fit was a right immutably established in the nature of things, and that it was a crime to challenge it. Really Europe had gone through a period of incessant change since the fall of the Roman Empire. The Völkerwanderungen had continued till a sort of level of civilization had been established on the Continent. In the middle of the eleventh century the best men on the Continent thought that England had fallen below that level. They might be right or wrong, but they certainly thought so. They did not wish to see England exposed to invasions from the North and so threatening the peace of Europe. They desired to have England an orderly and useful member of the European Commonwealth. This was the reason why William's undertaking against England was regarded as a crusade. It was not only William's acuteness in extracting an oath from Harold, or a promise from Edward; it was not Lanfranc's cleverness in making the worse case appear the better. The Pope expressed the best opinion of Europe when he gave William his blessing, because William's enterprise was one of European importance.

The result showed that this opinion was justified. England received no further infusion of population from abroad after the Norman Conquest, and it entered into the current of European civilization so decidedly that attempts to direct England's policy by purely insular considerations have never succeeded for any time. Moreover, the Norman conquest of England was the last of the Völkerwanderungen; it marked the close of a period of European history. The statesmen of the eleventh century were probably right, after all, in having no formula condemning territorial aggrandizement. Their formula was a positive one; it was, the recognition of a duty to maintain the level of European civilization within the limits which had been at any previous period marked out for it.

Mr. Freeman truly remarks that William won England and ruled England in the same way, by strictly observing formal legality and by working through legal fictions. Perhaps in so doing he bequeathed to English statesmen a temper or attitude of mind which has always distinguished them. They have not been distinguished for great conceptions, or far-reaching designs, or high endeavours after an ideal end; but they have shown a cautious regard for formal legality, they have been expert in the art of putting things, they have been skilful in making the worse side appear the better. Those who have sat in the seat of William the Great have amply repaid the statesmen of the Continent for the liberty which they took in sanctioning William's conquest of England; for they have learned the trick of pursuing English interests and justifying that pursuit by high-sounding phrases about the good of Europe and the progress of civilization.

CETYWAYO.*

When Mr. Rider Haggard first published Cetywayo and his White Neighbours six years ago he was quite unknown as a novelist, and it was not difficult to see that he had not had much experience as a writer. But it was also obvious that his knowledge of the facts was very considerable, and that his brains and his heart were in the right places for the heart and the brains of an Englishman. The book now appears with an Introduction of nearly seventy pages, sketching the sequel of events which followed those recorded in the original volume. This Introduction (which, it may be observed, shows many signs of Mr. Haggard's literary practice in the interval, and is a remarkably lucid and forcible paper of its kind) is not much pleasanter reading than the body of the book, but it is not quite so unpleasant. Mr. Haggard traces the fortunes of the unlucky Wolseley settlement, and of the still more unlucky restoration of Cetywayo; details the efforts of the Usutu party against Usibepu, the calling in of the Boers, the reduction of Zululand to a mere shadow of itself by the rapacious invaders; the final interference (after long and useless prayers by all the best authorities on the subject), which first tore a certain part of their prey from the Dutchmen, and then safeguarded it with the unannexed portions by making Zululand British territory, as it ought to have been made years before. He gives at length some account of the Transvaal after the conclusion of the most infamous convention in all English history, and of the dealings of the Boers with their Western neighbours, and the interference, as before tardy and partial, which at last put some check to their filibustering. And he has a short, but very interesting, section devoted to the more recent and now far more important questions of Delagoa Bay and Amatongaland, in which he deals with the future in what we hope is not too sanguine a spirit. No one who knows Mr. Haggard's writings and views on the subject will need to be told that he anticipates much more trouble from the Dutch inhabitants both of the Transvaal and of such territory as it did not please Mr. Gladstone to give away; but he seems to see in the probably increasing productiveness of gold and other mines, and the consequent influx of English and miscellaneous diggers and immigrants, a via salutis. The Introduction is very well worth reading by any one whether he knows the book or not, and the book by any one who wishes to be acquainted with one of the most ghastly stories of injustice and imbecility combined that recent times have seen.

THE HISTORY OF PORTUGAL.†

Mr. McMURDO would seem to be a very confiding person of no great familiarity with the literary code of honour. At least, that is the only decently civil explanation we can give of this curious venture of his. He has published a book, professing on its title-page to be a "History of Portugal from the commencement of the Monarchy to the reign of Alfonso III. (Compiled from Portuguese histories.) By Edward McMurdo." This sounds well, but unfortunately the work compiled by Mr. McMurdo is, in truth, a translation by "the accomplished Miss Mariana Monteiro" of Dom A. Herculano's Historia de Portugal desde o começo da Monarchia até o fim do reinado de Affonso III. On the face of it, this looks like a very curious proceeding; but Mr. McMurdo is so innocent that we cannot use strong words about him. Only a person of great inexperience could have thought that any profit was to be gained out of a "conveyed" translation of a Portuguese history which ends in 1279, centuries before the country began to be of any interest to foreigners. Then Mr. McMurdo is so confiding. He honestly confesses that he knows no Portuguese, and found his ignorance stand in the way of his commendable desire to learn something of the history of Portugal. The effort he felt was incumbent on him because he had a concession to make the Delagoa Bay railway. We have such a respect for the pursuit of knowledge that after this our heart warms to Mr. McMurdo. Then, too, except on his unfortunate title-page, he is quite the gentleman. He politely attributes all the merit of the present volume to his translator—the accomplished Miss Mariana Monteiro. If this lady told him that she had compiled the volume from the "anonymous of Sahagun," the records in the "Torre do Tombo," and other recondite places, she probably said it with that air of confiding frankness sister woman generally assumes when she is telling a particularly monstrous fib; and Mr. McMurdo only fell a victim like the rest of his stupid sex. We hope that was the real story, and that Portugal deserves the credit of the practical joke. Perhaps the gentleman only thought that Dom A. Herculano (than whom a better-meaning historian, though a trifle dull) was unknown out of Portugal, and need not be named. If so he underrated the sagacity and extensive information of the British critic. As regards Miss Mariana's translation, we are prejudiced in her favour; but it seems to us, in the main, creditable. It is always stiff, sometimes confused, and here and there ungrammatical; but it is not so easy to write a foreign language, and the lady has used her dictionary honestly. She is quite entitled to an interpreter's certificate, and a place of dignity and emolument in the Portuguese Foreign Office, or at least in the Board of Trade, if there is one at Lisbon.

BOOKS ON DIVINITY.*

MR. TROTTER tells us that his five lectures on the history and claims of The Church of England were put together at short notice and at a busy time for delivery in Newcastle Cathedral, and of course he makes no pretence to originality. They may have served their immediate purpose, but were not worth publishing. And the strange omission of any paging in the table of contents goes far to destroy the only possible use of the publication, as an elementary handbook.

In lumping together under the title of Three Friends of God Tauler, Henry Suso, and Nicholas of Basle, and identifying all three alike as "persecuted Christians" with the Lollards, John Huss, and Jerome of Prague, Miss Bevan only reproduces the exploded blunder of Mr. Vaughan, and to a certain extent even of Dean Milman. Tauler and Henry Suso, who was afterwards "beatified" by Rome, were mystics but devout and obedient Catholics, and were not "persecuted." There is no proof that Nicholas of Basle, who was burnt as a heretic for teaching very different from theirs long after their death, had ever known them, and if he was, as some suppose, "the layman" who was once Tauler's friend—which the dates render very doubtful—there is clear evidence that his opinions had entirely changed in the interim. Miss Bevan falls into the vulgar error of confusing Mysticism with Protestantism, whereas in fact nine-tenths at least of the Mystics were Roman Catholics.

Mr. Wilmot-Buxton appears to have made it his speciality to cater for the spiritual needs of children, and judging from his Lighthouse on the Rock he succeeds well in his task.

Mr. Hardman informs us on the title-page of his Parson's Perplexity, which is not a tale but a collection of sixty short sermons "for the hardworked and hurried," that they are "suggestive" as well as short. We should ourselves rather have called them simple and suitable for the class addressed. Meanwhile his references to "the late Bishop Thirlwell" is suggestive of carelessness in correcting the press.

Dr. Macduff's St. Paul in Athens is a little volume full of pious but rather discursive reflections on the great Apostle's speech on the Areopagus, prefaced by descriptive and topographical notices of the city, put together apparently on the spot. If the language were simpler it would not make a bad Sunday reading book for children who have passed beyond the nursery stage.

Dr. Ker appears to have been a popular preacher in Scotland, and two volumes of his Sermons have been published. The present volume is a posthumous collection of fragmentary Thoughts, something after the manner of Coleridge's Table Talk, on various topics secular and sacred. They manifest a devout spirit, a good deal of miscellaneous reading, a breadth of judgment and of sympathy, a certain Scotch humour, and strong common sense; and the style is clear and natural, which cannot be said of the preface contributed by his Editor, Dr. Simpson. He quotes from some unnamed source a happy saying about Carlyle, that "he had a large capital of faith not yet invested." This may really be called a "suggestive" book.

The six Tracts by different writers on the great non-Christian Religions of the World, scattered over the series of Present Day Tracts, have been collected into a single volume, which will be found very convenient for reference. They deal with Islam, Confucianism, Parseeism, Brahmanism, Buddhism, and ancient Paganism.

In the preface to his last volume of Sermons, on Every Day Christian Life, Archdeacon Farrar lays down the obviously true principle that doctrine and morality can never be divorced from one another. The present course of Sermons deals mainly with practice, but claims to rest on a doctrinal basis. It exhibits to the full the characteristic merits, and less than usual of the characteristic faults, familiar to Dr. Farrar's numerous readers. He always indeed appears to us to be at his best in preaching, which gives free scope for his unquestionable Christian earnestness and more legitimate scope than some kinds of literature for the rhetoric and word-painting in which he is apt to exceed due bounds. It may at least be said of all these discourses that they possess one indispensable note of a good sermon, which is unfortunately too often conspicuously absent—they are interesting, even to read, and must have been still more interesting to hear. There are several misprints left uncorrected, e.g. in one place "a besetting God."

Mr. Jennings has inevitably failed in essaying the impossible. The very "terse" record of facts in his Manual of Church History is indeed, so far as we have observed, accurate and impartial, though the writer shows incontestably what he calls his "theological proclivity"—which is Protestant—in his comments e.g. on Eucharistic Liturgies and on the early cessation of miracles. But the real objection to his "historical method" is, not that it is "of very small educational value," as he himself admits, but that it is a direct hindrance to education. To pack ten centuries of Church history into a little over 100 small pages—the last eight being reserved for similar treatment in a second volume—is to make for those who trust to this manual all real knowledge of the period impossible, while for those who know something of it already the book is useless.

A still heavier indictment lies against Jerome Mercier's Story of Salvation, which she tells us in the preface is designed to encourage not the devotional but the critical study of the Bible, while yet "it cannot pretend to learning, and may be found too often incorrect." It is therefore worse than useless for its professed purpose, and, in spite of the goody-goody element which pervades it, is also very dull.

Some years ago the Rev. Flavel Cook showed that he had the courage of his opinions by refusing communion to a parishioner whose views he considered heterodox, and who prosecuted him for libel in consequence. These Fifty-two Lessons on the Works and Claims of Christ are intended for the guidance of teachers in Sunday Schools and Bible Classes. They seem to be very carefully compiled, and well adapted for their purpose.

Whatever may be thought by some of the recent "Beatifications of English Martyrs," no Englishman of any creed need grudge More and "the Blessed John Fisher" their new honours. This little Treatise of Prayer was written, in Latin, by the good Bishop about fifteen years before his death, and translated a century later by a priest trained at Douai. The translation is reprinted here without change of language or even orthography, which last is certainly a mistake, if it is meant for practical use. It concerns mental rather than vocal prayer, or what is commonly termed meditation. The tone is most scriptural and devout, and there is hardly a word any religious Anglican, or indeed any Protestant, would find fault with.

Mr. Bindley of Merton College has translated and annotated for the Christian Classical Series St. Athanasius's well-known treatise De Incarnatione Verbi, which is one of his earliest writings composed before the outbreak of Arianism. The editor has done his work well and thoroughly, and the little volume will be very acceptable to theological students.

Mr. France has compiled for the use of Anglicans under the title Preces Veterum a series of Latin prayers and hymns from the writings of St. Jerome, St. Augustine, St. Anselm, St. Bernard, and others, omitting and altering in them whatever he finds "opposed to his convictions," which he calls by an ingenious euphemism "pruning occasional redundancy." Thus e.g. a marvellous muddle is made of the beautiful Stabat Mater—which is transformed into a kind of Stabat Pater—and with still less plausible excuse the last line of the Dies Iræ is most absurdly changed into "Dona nobis requiem." We do not hesitate to call this sort of arbitrary manipulation both an historical and literary crime. It is at once an outrage on the writers whom it travesties and on the readers whom it misleads. It was quite open to Mr. France to exclude any compositions he considered doctrinally objectionable, as Archbishop Trench did in his volume of Sacred Latin Poetry published some forty years ago; it was not open to him to mutilate them. And as to his "practical aim," men sufficiently educated to prefer saying their prayers in Latin might, one would have supposed, be trusted to use their own discretion, instead of Mr. France's, in the matter. He has unwittingly emulated one of the worst tricks of ultramontane controversialists in cooking the Fathers. "Corrigendus sanctus pater," is their phrase; he is bolder, and calmly declares that the passages he has tampered with "are alien to the real intent of the writers themselves," which it was left for Mr. John F. France, some thousand years or more after their death, to discover.

Canon Fleming has thought it necessary to add yet another to the countless manuals of Family Prayer already existing. It is fair to say that, being made up entirely of collects from the Prayer Book, it is very preferable to most of them.

Mr. Clayton, of Magdalen College, Oxford, has issued a reprint of the Manual of Devotions for Communion, derived from the works of standard Anglican divines, originally brought out by the late Bishop Wilberforce half a century ago under the title of Eucharistica. In doing so he has revised carefully the text of the extracts which he found very faulty, but which he considers to testify in their authentic form to the continual maintenance in the Church of England of the doctrine of the Real Presence and Eucharistic Sacrifice. The little volume is very prettily got up.

SUPERNATURAL STORIES.*

THERE is in this and other countries a person of the male sex and of uncertain nationality, upwards of one hundred and forty-seven years old, able to appear and vanish as he pleases, and to a very limited extent, and subject to a great many restrictions, to raise the dead for purposes of cross-examination. Considering these advantages, he is a person of extraordinary fatuity, and though it is by no means clear what he wants to do there is every reason to believe that, whatever it is, he cannot do it. Mr. Fitzgerald Molloy styles him Benoni, and "To him who in these pages [the pages of A Modern Magician] is styled Benoni" Mr. Molloy's story "is dedicated in sign of service." The service thus designed does not appear to be one which untheosophisticated persons would enthusiastically appreciate, but there is no accounting for tastes. The dry bones of the story in which Benoni is made to play an abject part are in substance as follows. Mrs. Netley was a vulgar parvenue, with designs on "Society" (and she eventually married the imbecile brother of a duke; but that has nothing to do with the plot). She had a weak-minded but well-meaning niece, called Miriam, who married Philip Amerton, an author and a prig, of credit and renown. Colonel Tarbert was a villain. With the aid of another villain, generally called Jacob Glender, the Colonel committed forgery. (With the aid of his father's bankers, who were innocent of the knowledge that a cheque is invalidated if the drawer dies before it is presented, he got the cheque cashed; but that has nothing to do with the plot either.) Amerton neglected his wife, and Colonel Tarbert ran away with her, but after a short time they separated, and she went back to Philip. Jacob Glender then strangled the Colonel. Philip was arrested for the murder, but Glender committed suicide, and confessed his guilt while dying, so Philip was set free—or rather let alone, for a magistrate, who knew his business as little as the bankers mentioned above knew theirs, had released him on bail in defiance of the criminal law—and lived happily ever after with his sincerely repentant wife. By the murder of Colonel Tarbert, his virtuous cousin, Ulic Tarbert, became heir presumptive to a moribund earl, and by the suicide of Glender he was enabled to marry a lady who had been, but had not been known to be, Glender's wife. She was an author by trade, and wrote under the astonishing name of Gal Alex. The story having been sketched in outline, it remains to indicate the part played in it by Benoni the dedicatee. This impostor was called by his acquaintances the modern magician. In order to support the title he went about in a purple velvet robe, and "on his breast burned a precious stone of unusual size and exceeding brilliancy." From time to time he flirted paternally with Gal Alex. He had met Amerton at Bouzarea, on the southern shore of the Mediterranean, and had given him to understand that he, Benoni, had been in the service of the Thibetan spookmongers for "a period numbering seven times seven years thrice told" ($7 \times 7 \times 3 = 147$), and that he perceived in Amerton unusual latent spookic capacity. In return for this compliment, when Benoni came to London Amerton introduced him to society. The poor man's occult powers were of singularly little use to him, for he had to have a house just like any one else, and could not, or did not, use his power of appearing and vanishing except for momentary trick effects, at long intervals. He did, however, it seems, once break through the theosophistical rule, and do a trick for the general edification. On his first introduction to fashionable circles in London, "for a while he became a lion." No details are given, but provided that, as the context seems to indicate, the scene of his exploit was a polite drawing-room, and not a den at the Zoological Gardens, it must have been an interesting spectacle. It was he who made Amerton neglect his wife, which he did by introducing him, with much mummery, and for a few minutes only, to the astral principle of his "master," one Amuni, of Thibet. This person talked a little very commonplace twaddle out of the works of Paracelsus, Blavatsky, Olcott, and Co., and Mr. Maskelyne would have done the thing quite as well. When Amuni was gone Benoni told Amerton that if he would study hard and mortify the flesh the power of detaching his astral principle would be given to him. The wretched man thought of nothing else for a long time, but determined to devote himself to the occult life. At the end of the book Benoni told him that he was plucked, so that the net result of Amerton's searchings after the higher life was the escapade of Mrs. Amerton, who left him solely because he preferred his chelaship to her. Benoni gave only one other performance, and that was when Amerton was unlawfully at large on bail after being remanded on the charge of murdering Colonel Tarbert. They repaired to Wimbledon Common, where the murder had taken place, and with divers commonplace incantations they raised the spook of Colonel Tarbert. It was very reluctant to come away from the pleasant occupation of haunting the murderer, and all but escaped without telling them who he was. Benoni, however, by frantic exertions, just persuaded it to mention that Glender was the man. It may be mentioned that when Mrs. Amerton ran away Benoni was not of the least use to Amerton in his pursuit of the errant pair. He had to rely on the mundane assistance of Inspector Collins, who found out that they had gone abroad. Amerton said he would follow them to Paris. "In that case," said the inspector, "you cannot do better than consult Monsieur Tango. He is a man of genius, with the eye of a hawk and the instinct of a bloodhound." This passage is introduced only to show that Mr. Molloy is not less at home in describing the speech and manners of everyday policemen than in the exposition of occult mysteries.

The immediate causes of the Indian Mutiny have been much discussed. They remain to some extent obscure, but Mr. Arthur Lillie has now explained satisfactorily how it was that Lucknow was not stormed just before Havelock's arrival. He tells the story in An Indian Wizard. Adèle de Noirmoutier was "brought up in the frivolous Court of Louis XV., and taught to worship tinsel and glitter." While still young and beautiful she went to India, and married a heroic Englishman called George Pickering, who had "studied the Indian Yoga," and wore a salagrama. There was in the neighbourhood a wicked kinsman of hers, also called Noirmoutier, who by sinful practices had collected enormous quantities of priceless jewels and gewgaws. With the help of these he seduced Mrs. Pickering. Mr. Pickering was killed in the massacre at Patna, but just before going to his doom he had an interview with his wife. She warned him to escape, but he refused, and said:—"Amongst the tinsel trinkets for which you have bartered your honour you are destined to remain until you can find a human being as true as the one you have betrayed, and can conjure up in him a love as pure as the love you have outraged. Till then YOUR KISS WILL MEAN MASSACRE AS IT DOES TO-DAY." So he was massacred, and she became a vampire. Also she got hold of his skeleton, and set it up in a secret grotto among the gewgaws, and made poojahs at it on every anniversary of his death. On the first anniversary he appeared, and explained that the meaning of his curse was that she would continue to live and be a vampire, her kiss meaning massacre, and the salagrama enabling her to do what she pleased, until somebody loved her purely enough to give her a kiss with full knowledge of her story, and then she would be allowed to die. So things went on. "There was a strange and mysterious being walking through the [eighteenth and nineteenth] centuries." She loved, and presumably kissed, Stephen Lascelles, and there was a massacre at Vellore. She loved, and presumably kissed, Major Ashburnham, and there was a massacre in the Khyber Pass. Finally, in 1857, she loved and kissed Frank Lascelles, a kinsman of Stephen, and the Mutiny immediately broke out. He was at the siege of Lucknow. She told him all, and, further, that he could save the garrison only by treachery. He loved her with a love as pure as the one she had outraged, kissed her, and bolted. A sentry shot him in the knee. Mrs. Pickering, who had just appeared, and was in his arms at the moment, was shot through the heart by the same bullet, and died in the ordinary way. He thought he was sold, but he was not. He observed that an unforeseen attack was being executed by the mutineers, and that Lucknow would be taken in five minutes. He called out, and gave the alarm to the garrison. The attack was consequently repelled, and Havelock, with his army, came round the corner. As he did so Frank Lascelles fell asleep, and dreamt that he dwelt in marble halls, "and by his side was a gentle being with a beauty not of the earth." Pickering's place in the tableau is not mentioned, but "From this dream Frank never woke up." That is the story of An Indian Wizard, so far as it explains history. There is a vast deal more concerning Yoga, which is the same thing as what Mr. Sinnett and his friends call occultism. Ghosts and mysterious personages pervade the romance, some being Mrs. Pickering and some not. Among the latter is a particularly horrible old Hindoo priest, whom Lascelles puts to death for being about to immolate Mrs. Pickering at the shrine of Kali. This he would, apparently, have been able to do because he had somehow got the salagrama away from her, and it is not clear what would then have become of the curse. It is a pity Lascelles interfered, because if the lady really had been killed the Mutiny, then in an early stage, would probably have collapsed. After the priest was killed he haunted Lascelles in the most unpleasant, Cheshire-cat fashion. He would come and say "Ha! Ha!" in the dark, the ghost of his white waistcloth glimmering weirdly at a suitable height above the ground, though nothing else was visible. The least comprehensible thing in the story is why Mrs. Pickering chose to die. She must have had a very pleasant time as a beautiful lady captivating hearts, sucking blood, and wielding a salagrama; and, if she had not relented, she might have walked through many more centuries.

Any person wishing to realize what a dull thing a ghost story is in itself, and apart from the extrinsic attractions it may derive from qualities common to all fiction, can do so by giving an hour to the perusal of any part of any one of the three substantial red volumes published under the title of Dreamland and Ghostland. An anonymous editor has collected no less than thirty-five stories having some claim to be considered ghostly or dreamish. There is a good deal of monotony about them. We should guess that they do not contain less than thirty old-fashioned "four-poster" beds, with hangings. Some of the stories lack this article of furniture, but no other sort of bed is permitted to occur. The Ghosts of Cottenal Court may be described as an example. Some people take a fine old-fashioned country-house, and invite a party of friends to visit them. They are very much annoyed at night by a number of obtrusive spectres. Some are made up as nuns, and one as a walking corpse with a face "in the last stage of decomposition" (the italics are in the book). A peculiarly offensive smell is from time to time observed in particular bedrooms. The visitors leave in disgust, and after a few weeks the lessees give up the house, which no one else takes. All this is told in detail, and that's all. Perhaps the freshest story is that there was once a mysterious lady who used to ask her acquaintances what sort of mark they supposed the brand of Cain was, and to express a guarded sympathy with the first murderer. It turned out that whenever she was photographed the photograph came out all over spots, and each spot, on examination, was discovered to be a little picture of the face of a dead man. One would have been inclined to advise her not to be photographed. Some of the stories are asserted in head-notes to be true, and others are not. No reason appears for the distinction.

Can It Be True? is the story of a young man who was poor, came into a fortune of half a million, spent some of it, lost the rest by the discovery of a later will, and eventually married his only love, who had in the course of the story married and survived a peevish but wealthy ruffian. The people talk like this:—"A few tears will relieve you, Flora. You need not restrain yourself in my presence. I wish you to look upon me as your true and attached friend, and not to withhold your feelings." (This is called "a soothing strain.") The author talks—and he talks a great deal—like this:—"We shall enumerate one by one the wounds inflicted upon his heart, until at last, pierced through and through with the arrows of treachery, it will be a marvel that he arises and lives." The whole of each of the two volumes is dull as anything real could possibly be, and as unlike reality as anything profoundly dull can possibly be.

THE UNEMPLOYED PROBLEM.*

MR. HAKE has undertaken a bold and difficult task, that of reviving interest in some of the points settled for nearly half a century by Sir Robert Peel's banking legislation of 1844 and 1845. Economists generally are now agreed that that legislation was to a large extent based upon misconception. Sir Robert Peel adopted the opinion, then very prevalent amongst English economists, that over-issue of bank-notes was the main cause of financial crises. Experience has since abundantly proved that inflation of credit is the real cause, and that crises may occur with or without over-issue of notes. The question, however, has for nearly half a century been regarded as dead and buried, and public interest in it has ceased. It will require all Mr. Hake's philanthropic zeal to revive that interest; for, though Mr. Hake uses economic arguments, his real motive is philanthropic. Rightly he holds that the cause of the scarcity of employment, now unfortunately so general, is under-consumption, and not over-production. General over-production, indeed, is a contradiction in terms; and, though it is quite true that under-consumption implies over-production, since there cannot be under-consumption without an excess of production, yet that over-production is an effect, and not a cause. It should be pointed out, however, that, though general over-production is impossible, there may be, and there probably is, over-production in particular cases. At all events, there is undoubtedly misdirection of capital and labour. As examples we may cite the fostering of the iron industry in the United States and on the Continent, and also the development of the beetroot-sugar industry in most Continental countries by means of protective tariffs. Had industry and labour been left to themselves they certainly would not have gone into those industries. Iron could have been obtained in sufficient quantities from this country, and much more cheaply, and sugar in the same way could have been obtained from the cane-sugar producing countries. Legislation stepped in to divert from their natural channels capital and labour. There is thus a misdirection of industry and consequent waste and loss. For his immediate purpose it was not necessary that Mr. Hake (who, it should be stated, acknowledges his indebtedness to Mr. O. E. Wesslau) should point out all this, and it is undoubtedly true that, speaking broadly, under-consumption is the cause of trade depression. We are particular in dwelling upon this point, for the right statement of the proposition is of great practical importance. If we say that over-production is the cause of depression, it seems to follow that the true remedy is restriction of production. If, on the contrary, we recognize clearly that it is under-consumption which lies at the root of our difficulties, then we perceive that the true course is to stimulate production. Under-consumption is the result of poverty, and poverty can be removed only by such an increase of production as will enable the poor to pay for the commodities which they want. There is only one legitimate and effectual way, as Mr. Hake truly observes, of increasing the purchasing power of the poor—and that is by increasing the employment of labour. Again, apart from new inventions which man cannot command, there is only one way of increasing the employment of labour, and that is by affording a means to the poor man of character and ability of getting the capital which he requires in order to give employment to the labouring poor around him. Here it is that Mr. Hake's interest in the banking legislation of Sir Robert Peel arises. He holds that the only way in which poor men of character and ability can be provided with capital is by facilitating credit—in other words, by giving to the banks the right of issuing notes without restriction and without Government regulation; and he points in proof of his proposition to the experience of Scotland before 1845.

It is unquestionable that Scotland advanced relatively more rapidly even than this country between the Revolution of 1688 and the middle of the present century; but her relatively more rapid progress was due to a variety of causes. In the first place, previous to the Revolution Scotland was much more backward than England. The Highlands had not yet emerged from the clan system; feudalism reigned supreme in the Lowlands; the Government was out of accord with the great body of the people, and anarchy prevailed almost everywhere. The Revolution gave Scotland a Government according to her desire; order was gradually established, and industry consequently progressed. Further, the Act of Union opened to Scotchmen a new and very profitable field of enterprise. And, lastly, popular education was much more widely diffused, much better endowed, and much more efficiently organized in Scotland than perhaps in any other European country. The great majority of Scotchmen, by their superior education, were, therefore, better qualified to take advantage of the new opportunities afforded them than were ordinary Englishmen. But, while all this is true, it cannot reasonably be denied that the Scotch banking system did contribute very powerfully to the development of material wealth; and the reason is not far to seek. The Scotch banks were free to issue notes without keeping against them an equivalent amount of either coin or bullion, and it was their interest to issue and keep in circulation the greatest possible amount of notes. Suppose, for example, that a bank manager found that 10 per cent. of his note-circulation in coin was sufficient to secure the exchangeability of his notes, he kept no more than that 10 per cent. in coin, and the remaining 90 per cent. of his note circulation cost him only the paper upon which the notes were printed and the expense of printing; but for this almost costless money he obtained as good rates of interest as he did for coin itself. The notes were accepted freely in all commercial transactions, and it was, therefore, indifferent to the borrower whether he received notes or coin. The great object of a Scotch bank manager, then, was to get the greatest possible number of his notes into circulation, and to keep them there; and no one was so likely to increase the circulation as the poor man of character and ability. He had little or no capital but what he obtained from the banks, and he was watchful to seize every opportunity of profit that offered itself; and his industry and enterprise were consequently untiring. Therefore, the Scotch banks adopted the plan of cash accounts; the whole country was covered with branch banks, and the currency became almost entirely a paper currency. There is obviously, however, not the same inducement to push notes into circulation when the amount of the circulation is restricted, and when beyond the authorized issue an equivalent amount of gold must be kept. If gold has to be kept against the notes, it is as profitable to the banker to lend the gold itself as to lend the notes, though it is much more wasteful, of course, to the community. Under our present system, in fact, all the note-circulation beyond the authorized issue is valueless to a bank manager, except in so far as it serves as an advertisement. There can be no doubt, then, that a banking system which gives to the banks the right of issuing notes without restriction and without Government regulation does supply a motive to the banker to supply poor men of ability and character with capital which is not afforded under our present system.

Nor does there appear any countervailing disadvantage in the system of free note-issue. A rash manager may, of course, try to force into circulation more notes than the country requires; but, on the other hand, under a deposit system a rash bank manager may lend the deposits of customers recklessly, as indeed we have seen in various recent instances. Rashness will always result in evil; but there is nothing to show that it would be more mischievous under a system of free note-issue than under the deposit system. And, so far as the general public who accept the notes in commercial transactions are concerned, there is no greater probability that they would lose than there is under our present system. Indeed, the failure of the City of Glasgow Bank, the greatest disaster of quite recent times, shows that both depositors and note-holders suffer little or nothing; it was upon the shareholders that the whole loss fell. If we had a good Joint-stock Company law, and if precaution were taken that a sufficient capital paid-up or callable was provided, there seems no reason to anticipate more loss under a system of free note-issue than under our present system. Yet, as we have observed above, it will be extremely difficult to revive interest in this question. Currency questions under all circumstances are distasteful to the general public, and their interest in them can only be aroused if it can be very clearly shown that a great advantage will follow; but we cannot truly say that Mr. Hake succeeds in showing that a great advantage would follow if free banking, as he calls it, were adopted. Of course, as we have been admitting, poor men of character and ability would find it more easy to obtain accommodation under such a system than they do at present, and that would be undoubtedly an advantage; but it would not be such an advantage as would lead to a very great and sudden increase in the amount of employment to be given. The effect would be slight and gradual, and to inflame the popular imagination it is necessary to show that the advantage would be greater than this. It is to be recollected, too, that all vested interests are against such a change. Since Sir Robert Peel's legislation our banking system has grown to a magnitude never witnessed in any other country, and most people will be satisfied that the legislation has been proved successful when such a result has followed it. Further, the banks themselves would probably not welcome the change. They have attained their present prosperity without free note-issue; and that, as matters stand at present, they do not greatly care for the right of issuing notes is proved by the fact that some of the greatest English country banks have given up the right of issue for the sake of obtaining admittance to London. Moreover, country banks with the right of issue are gradually dying out; and, indeed, even in Scotland and Ireland some of the banks do not keep in circulation even their authorized amount of notes. Mr. Hake, then, will find the banks either apathetic or opposed to his plan, while the public will regard it with indifference. His zeal may succeed in arousing interest, but he will have a very uphill fight.

FRENCH LITERATURE.

THE best criticism we can give of M. Lockroy's Ahmed le boucher (1) is that we took it up, intending to give it a merely sufficient examination, and read every word of it. It is not quite faultless. It ought to have been longer (that is not a common fault, certainly); it ought to have had references to authorities, of which there is not a single one of any precise kind in the book; and its chronology is of the vaguest possible kind. So seldom is a date mentioned, that M. Lockroy has been misled by his own looseness in this respect into saying on one page that his hero was "about fifteen years old in 1750," and on another that he was "nearly eighty" in 1799—things which agree not together, and which yet are among the very few chronological statements in the book. On the other hand, it is, though with no attempt at fine writing, very lucidly and agreeably written; there are no faults of taste, except some quite unnecessary Biblical comparisons, while the subject is extraordinarily interesting, and, we should think, must to many readers be, except in its later parts, almost entirely novel. "Ahmed the Butcher" is, as the second rather than the first name will make some readers guess beforehand, the famous Djezzar Pasha who shared with Sir Sidney Smith and Phélippeaux the glory of the great siege of Acre, and who enjoys quite to himself the credit of having deserved the name of Djezzar, or butcher, better probably than any man who ever lived, while he was in the main an excellent fellow. M. Lockroy has not exaggerated or much dwelt upon the horrible side of the story, except in one instance, which is horrible enough for anything—the hideous vengeance which Djezzar took (of course not on the really guilty party) for the violation of his harem. But the book in general is much more like a romance of chivalry than like a butcher's bill. Since the middle ages there has probably been nothing like the state of Syria during the last quarter of the eighteenth century, at any rate so near Europe. The Pashas of Damascus, Tripoli, and Cairo, with their Mameluke and Maugrabin mercenaries, the Emirs of the Druses, the great Bedouin Sheikhs, of whom the most powerful was the nonagenarian Dahers of Deir Hanna, the chiefs of the Metualis, and for a great part of the time the Russian fleet of Orloff (which, under guise of carrying on war with the Porte, simply buccaneered at large and let out its services, under Levantine adventurers, to the highest bidder), fought among themselves incessantly. It was in this welter of constantly dissolving and reuniting alliances, raids, sieges, routs, that Djezzar raised himself from being a private Mameluke and the executioner of the Pasha of Cairo to the position of almost absolute ruler of Syria. This he held for years, subject only to the necessity of looking out carefully for the bearer of the bowstring, and, before that functionary could read his firman, taking him off and sending his head in an ebony box to the Sultan, who, according to the laws of the game, was bound to accept this as satisfactory. If the firman was once read, the Pasha was done. In the course of his rise two episodes hardly less miraculous and even more romantic than his defeat of Bonaparte happened—his early defence of Beyrout against the Russian fleet and the combined land forces of the Druses and the Bedouins, and the almost unbelievable exploit (very well told here) of his overthrowing by night, under the walls of deserted Acre, with three hundred desperadoes and two guns only, the great army with which his revolted favourite Selim was advancing to take his government and his life.

The plot of M. Theuriet's latest novel (2) is exceedingly simple. It has always been recognized, even in France, as one of the chief prudential arguments (putting religion and morality aside) against making free with your neighbour's wife that your neighbour's wife seldom has the good taste to retire gracefully when you are tired of her and wish to range yourself with a young woman of adorable candour. That is the situation of Philippe Desgranges, Camille Archambault, and Mariannette Diosaz—a situation complicated only, as the title indicates, by the fact that the hero is elderly. But M. Theuriet's hand is so admirable, both in drawing scenery and in drawing character, and his picture, in particular, of Mariannette (who is a much more masterful young lady than most French unmarried heroines) is so fresh and spirited, that he has made the old theme new. M. Rabusson is also clever, as he always is; but his new study in the Feuillet manner (3) will not please all readers. Far be it from us to palliate the practice of pledging securities with which you are entrusted and gambling with the proceeds. It is highly wrong in every way, and the laws of civilized countries provide extremely unpleasant penalties for it. But we do not think that it is one of the faults which, if a woman really loved a man, would destroy her love for him when she found it out. However, these things depend on taste. Of Une Ève nouvelle (4) we can only observe that the characteristics of the new Eve appear to be priggishness and frigidity. Long live the old! The tales in Mme. Calmon's Cœurs droits (5) are estimable, but not particularly interesting. As to Prince Lubomirski's book (6) (which appears with two sub-titles, "Tatiana" and "Schelm," for its two volumes) he explains that it is only in part a new one. The Prince is, we think, better as a traveller than as a novelist.

NEW BOOKS AND REPRINTS.

IT is the hard fate of Professor Freeman to be perpetually putting himself right with the public. Never was writer so misapprehended. Thus it happens that two of the Four Oxford Lectures, 1887 (Macmillan & Co.)—those on "Teutonic Conquest in Gaul and Britain"—are largely occupied with what is known in Parliamentary circles as personal explanation. There is a tentative air about them. They are preparative in aim, the scaffolding of a structure that is as yet only to be dimly discovered by the speculative eye. It is not Mr. Freeman's fault, as he is eager to show, that he has to lecture of himself, to quote his own writings, till progress is stayed for a while by the perverse influences of current controversy. When Mr. Huxley writes to the Times and declares the doctrine that "the English nation is almost wholly Teutonic" is a "baseless notion," no other course is open to a Professor of History generally credited with the invention of the "Teutonic theory." Mr. Freeman and the "eminent man of science" regard the matter from wholly different points of view; and, if people would only be at the pains to understand Mr. Freeman, "there would be found little or no difference as to facts" between them. In the same agreeable spirit Mr. Freeman deals with Mr. Sayce's British Association address at Manchester, and with the theories of Mr. Seebohm and that "wrong-headed scholar" Mr. Coote. It was a misfortune perhaps that he should be driven to discuss the evidence of anthropologists as to the considerable survival of the Celtic element in Britain, despite the victorious Teutons, though even here Mr. Freeman is convinced he has been seriously misread by the theorists who deal in types and skulls. When he wrote of the Britons as exterminated by Angles and Saxons, it was in a Pickwickian sense only. Moreover, one of the few branches of knowledge in which Mr. Freeman's equipment is deficient is this same application of physiology to history. "I am not, I must confess, good at what are called types," he ingenuously insists, and presumably he is also not good at skulls. Perhaps, after all, Mr. Sayce will return from foreign parts and, moved by this touching confession, will protest he never meant to reflect on the teaching of his historical brother. To adopt the logical and picturesque language of Mr. Freeman, it is absurd to suppose that the extermination of the Briton throughout the whole of England should have been set forth by "one whose house is on the slope of Ben Knoll, who looks on *Pen*hill and *Pen*nard, on Creech Hill and Crook's Peak, to whom the Cetic combe is as familiar a word as the Teutonic dale is to a Yorkshireman."

Various attempts have been made to solve The Mystery of Edwin Drood, but no solution has appeared in print at once so ingenious and convincing, and so satisfactory in the inductive treatment of the existing material, as Mr. Richard A. Proctor's Watched by the Dead (Allen & Co.) Mr. Proctor is perhaps inclined to underestimate the number of those who endorse Longfellow's opinion of Dickens's unfinished story, and there must have been many readers besides himself who detected Edwin Drood under the disguise of Datchery. The distinctive merit of Mr. Proctor's clever study of the problem lies in the cumulative reasoning by which he shows that Datchery must needs be Drood. His argument is advanced step by step in the analytical examination of the book with remarkable skill, and is attended by an anticipation of objections that is quite as remarkable and quite as favourable to his theory.

Mr. F. R. Stockton's delightful extravaganza, The Dusantes (Sampson Low & Co.) is a continuation of the unparalleled adventures of those estimable widows, Mrs. Lecks and Mrs. Aleshine, and unlike most sequels in being more than equal to the original conception. Indeed, we are disposed to award it the first place in Stocktonian humour. Its quality of humour is far more generic, and yet far less American, than that of Rudder Grange, and as a work of art it is incomparably superior. No reader of the Casting Away will have forgotten the desert island and its well-provisioned house, in which the ex-missionary and his shipwrecked companion were involuntary boarders for a season. The return of the owners and the discovery of the money deposited by the scrupulous Mrs. Lecks in payment of board and lodging lead to a wild and whimsical series of events that fairly surpass the story of the wreck and the island.

The Miss Crusoes, by Colonel Colomb (Allen & Co.), though a book for children, contains sly allusions and not a little facetiousness of the kind that children cannot be expected to enjoy. The effort to be amusing is at times only too evident in the sustained jocularity of tone that characterizes this story of the casting away of two small girls on a desert island. The prattle of these ingenuous babies is, however, amusing and natural for the most part, though it is surprising that Emma Jane should perpetrate that forlorn joke about the "dessert" island. Their adventures are brought to a dramatic conclusion by a droll device, possibly suggested by Alice's Adventures in Wonderland, in which certain "forgetful mushrooms" play an important part. The book is illustrated in a diverting style by Mr. Hitchcock and Miss Emily Lees.

Messrs. Lindley and J. P. Widney are the compilers of an illustrated guide-book entitled California of the South (New York: Appleton), which ought to become popular, as it is very readable and methodical in arrangement. In his excellent introduction on the climate of California Dr. Widney insists upon a distinction not recognized by geographers, but readily appreciable by agriculturists and persons in search of health resorts. He points out that there are two Californias. The district of which Los Angeles is the central point of interest, extending from Point Conception to the Mexican frontier, is that of which the present volume treats. This portion of California, the California of the South, possesses a climate that offers a marvellous contrast with that of the northern coast, if statistics of rainfall and temperature are not altogether worthless. Much useful information is given on the natural resources of the country, especially with regard to fruit culture.

How to play Solo Whist, by Messrs. A. S. Wilks and C. S. Pardon (Chatto & Windus), is a practical handbook, with useful illustrative diagrams, to a game which the authors declare has obtained unprecedented favour. The name is somewhat misleading, for the game requires a full pack, four players, and is based on whist.

Messrs. Field & Tuer's series of "Illustrated Gleanings from the Classics" has come to an end—which cannot be regarded as untimely—in Nos. 3 and 4—Thomson's Seasons, with four copper-plate engravings of 1792, and Tristram Shandy, with six aquatints engraved in 1820. The latter are Rowlandsonian in style, and not without character. The former are extremely feeble designs, and quite unworthy of revival.

The annotation of classics for school use is variously exemplified by certain examples before us. We have seen class-books of the kind praised for mere paucity of notes, as if the question were not one of quality rather than of quantity of exposition. In his preface to an annotated edition of Molière's L'Ecole des Femmes (Cambridge: University Press), Mr. Saintsbury says, with obvious truth, that Molière demands more copious annotation than Corneille or Racine. The notes in this edition, which is one of the excellent Pitt Press Series, comprise not a few examples of the copiousness that is of the right description. Such is that upon the "Maximes du Mariage" which Arnolphe recommends Agnès to study (Act iii. sc. 2), with its citation of literary parallels prior to Molière. In other directions Mr. Saintsbury's clear and scholarly notes are rich in illustration of the valuable kind that vivifies textual comment and criticism.

Mr. A. M. Williams, in his notes to Milton's Comus (Longmans & Co.) is chiefly concerned with the explanation of grammatical points, obsolete words, etymology, and allied matters. His introduction is brief and explicit; but his examination of Milton's verse is not altogether satisfactory. His illustrations of the cesura would never lead the young to the secret of the poet's marvellous modulations, and as much must be said of his remarks on what he calls the "order of words" in Comus (p. 14).

Mr. Benjamin Dawson's edition of King John (Simpkin, Marshall, & Co.) is an unhappy attempt "to remove those difficulties which arrest and discourage the student on the threshold of his subject." The text is disfigured by needless contractions, and syllables that should be silent, in the wisdom of the editor, are printed in italics. Thus we have (p. 21):—

Now shame upon you, whether she does or no.
Ay, with these crystal beads heaven shall be brib'd.

Surely we have the "dullest most unbored ears for verse" in our New Shakespeare Society when its members edit Shakspeare in this fashion, and under the title of a "University edition."

The Rev. W. H. Hutton has made a capital little collection of extracts from Matthew Paris, Robert of Gloucester, and other chroniclers—Simon de Montfort and his Times, 1251-1266 (David Nutt)—as a contribution to the series entitled "English History from Contemporary Writers."

We have among recent educational publications Mr. Joseph Wright's Middle High German Primer in the "Clarendon Press Series"; Geometrical Drawing, an excellent text-book for examination candidates, by Mr. W. N. Wilson (Rivingtons); Ellis's Irish Educational Directory for 1888 (Dublin: Ponsonby); The Schoolmaster's Calendar for 1888, the second annual issue of an admirable manual (Bell & Sons); Dates Made Easy, by John Hugh Rawley (Relfe Brothers); and Practical Lessons in the Use of English, by Mary F. Hyde (Boston: Heath).

We have also received a new edition of The Enemies of Books, revised and enlarged, by Mr. William Blades (Elliot Stock); M. Hector Malot's Zyte, translated by J. E. Simpson (Warne & Co.); Christian Socialism, by the Rev. M. Kaufmann (Kegan Paul, Trench, & Co.); Five Little Peppers, by Margaret Sidney (Hodder & Stoughton); At Evening Time, by Lewis Lauriston (London Literary Society); Life of the Emperor William of Germany, edited by H. W. Dulcken (Ward, Lock, & Co.); the Synopsis of the Tariffs and Trade of the British Empire, issued by the Imperial Federation League; and the Report of the Public Debt, Banking Institutions, and Mint of the Argentine Republic. The CORRESPONDENCE of SIR HENRY TAYLOR. Edited by EDWARD DOWDEN. 1 vol. 8vo. 16s.

"It is so short a time since Sir Henry Taylor died, that it is difficult to believe that he was writing letters to Wordsworth in 1823. His Correspondence is now published, and, as readers of his Autobiography will anticipate, it is full of interest......He was well on the way towards ninety when he died, and for by far the greater part of that time he had known everybody best worth knowing in England."—Daily News.

"A volume which will rank high among the most interesting books of travel produced in recent years........It describes a remarkable piece of travel lately done by three Englishmen, who seem to have the true British taste for untrodden paths, together with a genuine love of hard marches and a genial unconsciousness of their difficulties and dangers........The book is a most modest record of manly travel, and is of permanent value for its careful and accurate account of the little-known country which now alone separates China from Russia."—Times.

Whoever wishes to know in simple language the gist of all that Darwin, Spencer, Lubbock, and Tylor have contributed to the common stock of thought of humanity, as co-ordinated and illuminated with endless side-lights of his own and of others by a clear and concise philosophical thinker, cannot do better than read for himself this admirable digest of modern evolutionism."—Pall Mall Gazette.

LORD SALISBURY AT CARNARVON.

IT was, perhaps, not absolutely necessary for Lord SALISBURY, in his speech at Carnarvon on Tuesday, to refer to the absurd reproaches of community or even identity between his foreign policy and that of Lord GRANVILLE; yet it can hardly be said that he was ill advised in doing so. The unfortunate efficacy of what has been more bluntly than politely called "hard lying" in reference to this matter has been demonstrated over and over again during the last ten years, and Lord GRANVILLE brought down a certain amount of castigation on his own head by his utterances the night before. If resistance to the advance of Russia in Asia is the same thing as neglect and almost courting of that advance; if the consolidation and fortification of the North-West frontier of India is the same thing as the disarrangement and the denuding of that frontier; if the upholding and extension of the sovereignty of the QUEEN in South Africa as a protection against the filibustering of a handful of Dutchmen is the same thing as the Majuba convention; and if the countenance given to the League of Peace, of which Austria is the most deeply interested member, is the same thing as hints, or rather open declarations, that Austria is the greatest foe of freedom in Europe, then Lord SALISBURY'S foreign policy is the same as the GLADSTONE-GRANVILLE policy. And if not, not; as the schoolbooks say. But the assertion of the identity of scuttle and stand has become such a commonplace with Gladstonians that it is perhaps worth while to contradict it now and then, lest those who say the thing should come honestly to believe it. After all, as no man who knows anything about foreign policy is ever likely to defend Lord GRANVILLE'S, it may well be that honest ignorance is at the back of the defence. It requires a surgical operation of a kind not yet invented to get understanding of foreign policy into the heads of genuine admirers of Mr. GLADSTONE, and the effect even of such an operation could only be that they would cease to be Mr. GLADSTONE'S admirers.

A newer, and therefore a more noteworthy, form of the same tactics perhaps not merely invited, but positively required, the similar treatment which Lord SALISBURY gave it. He might have compared, though it does not seem that he did compare, the declarations, to which he referred, that the last Reform Bill killed the Conservative party with the new declarations that Mr. RITCHIE'S Bill will kill it again. To judge by the assertions of its enemies, Toryism must have even more than the vitality which is popularly attributed to other low and evil organizations in the natural world. We all know how sorely it surprised those who had proclaimed its death by the extension of the county franchise a few months after the execution; and it is at least possible that the wicked squires (who are in a large number, if not a majority, of cases also merchants, lawyers, and practitioners of every profession and most of the higher trades) will also repeat the provoking performance of JOHN BARLEYCORN. Meanwhile it is perfectly certain that, as Lord SALISBURY pointed out, and as all intelligent commentators had pointed out before him, the omnipotence which is supposed to be passing away from the owners of land is an omnipotence about as unlimited as, let us say, the powers of a constitutional monarch or the tyrannical effects of the "Law of Primogeniture." Between the powers of the central departments of Government, on the one hand, and the powers of elected Boards of Guardians, on the other, the margin of positive authority left to justices as justices—though it is apparently thought by some Gladstonians that a squire, merely as a squire, has some strange and feudal privilege—suggests bridges in even another sense than that of Lord SALISBURY'S jest. It is about as wide as the celebrated and uncomfortable Brigg of Dread which the devout Moslem traverses at the Day of Judgment. But here again the assertion is the obvious policy of a party at its wits' end how to accomplish that change of Government which, as Mr. BRIGHT neatly observes, "the disappointed "and the hungry are anxiously looking for."

It must further have annoyed certain Gladstonians to find that Lord SALISBURY took up very cordially Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL'S suggestion—no new or surprising one, of course—that the policy of repression in Ireland is not exhaustive of the Government plans in reference to that country. No rational person believes that it is; but, as in the other cases, a considerable number of people, into whose rationality it is perhaps charitable not to inquire too narrowly lest their reason be established at the expense of their honesty, assert the fact. And, indeed, it is extremely curious and instructive to note how large a part of the time of every Unionist speaker nowadays has to be taken up in simply refuting or contradicting different varieties of those things which no one but Mr. BRIGHT is permitted to describe by their simplest name. No one expects that the people of Ireland can be redeemed from the miserable state in which they have been placed by the instigations of agitators to crime and the continual bribes of the English Government through the agency of coercive methods simply. No one doubts that great part of the discontent in Ireland is due to the unfortunate confinement of the country to one kind of employment only or mainly. It is necessary, in the first place, to establish order, and to see that peaceable and law-abiding citizens shall, at any rate, not incur the risk of the fate of FITZMAURICE or QUIRKE without a considerable and very uncomfortable risk on the other side; that seditious citizens shall not assemble to cheer sedition without a reasonable chance of getting their heads broken if they go too far. But it is undoubtedly necessary to provide good employment as well as to discourage bad. And it may be added that some day or other Government will have to take up the question of Irish local government very seriously indeed. At present the Nationalist corporations which, in some instances, control it are applying the lessons they have learnt in American municipalities to the task of misgovernment and malversation with very remarkable success. They are useful in a way, because they show in comparatively vile bodies what a Parnellite Parliament would do for the whole island; but that experimental usefulness can hardly excuse the long continuance of a gross scandal.

The last part of Lord SALISBURY'S remarks which invites comment is the part about Wales itself. Such a meeting as Tuesday's in the most Gladstonian part of the country is of good augury, if it be taken as an augury merely. There is no sort of reason why the Principality should continue to belong to the stupid party of present politics; except that that party, which tempers its stupidity with some practical cunning, has contrived assiduously to court, flatter, and play upon the weakest side of Welsh character and feeling. The heavy vote cast the other day for Mr. LLEWELLYN in the Gower division shows that it is perfectly possible for Welsh Tories who go the right way to work to recover the position which they never need have lost. It is exceedingly unfortunate, no doubt, that the tithe question should have presented itself as a handle, which unscrupulous agitators could work, despite their own knowledge that the grievance is an entirely imaginary one; and it is also unlucky that the extremely modern and, had it been wisely managed, quite manageable Nonconformity of Wales should have been permitted to foster the political Dissenter. The neglect of years, and indeed of centuries, cannot be repaired in a day; but there is nothing, or at least very little, that is irreparable in politics if the repairing of it be set about with due trust in Sir HENRY JAMES'S three gods—energy, faith, [illegible] Whatever faults they may have, Welshmen are [illegible]ute of intelligence, and it is perfectly easy to make [illegible] understand that Particularism of the kind which their seeming flatterers and real ill-wishers press on them must, in the long run, do them far more harm than it can do them good. It is not long since an amiable but unwise Gladstonian, in the fulness of his heart, protested that he wanted "Home Rule for England" as well as for Ireland, Scotland, and Wales. Let any Welshman think out what this means, and then ask himself if he likes the prospect.

THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BILL.

AT the Quarter Sessions which were held last week almost all the Chairmen abstained, with the approval of their colleagues, from threatening opposition to the Local Government Bill. The consideration of the details of the measure has been generally referred to Committees of Justices, and their Reports will probably contain useful suggestions. The great majority of those who decline to oppose the Bill entirely disapprove of its principles; but men of business accustomed to regard practical results seldom waste their energies in protesting against what they know to be inevitable. It is from a different quarter that the most formidable opposition is to be apprehended. The borough Corporations resent, as might be expected, their novel subordination to the authority of their respective counties. Mr. Ritchie has prudently consented to extend the list of large towns which are to be erected into counties; and it is almost certain that he will have to make further concessions in the same direction. A population of 100,000 may reasonably be thought to be entitled to municipal independence; but reference to the Census of 1881 seems to furnish but an arbitrary ground of distinction. If Sir E. J. Reed is correctly informed, the borough of Cardiff, which is excluded from the list of privileged towns, has now a population of more than 120,000; and for local reasons, it is likely to grow more rapidly than any other town in the kingdom. The inhabitants may reasonably object to be governed in municipal affairs by possible majorities of Welsh-speaking miners from the mountain valleys of Glamorganshire. The same county contains the important town of Swansea, which will advance similar claims to municipal independence. Many other boroughs of the second or third magnitude will be dissatisfied with their proposed position, and their objections will not be discountenanced by their official advisers. The paid staff of a Corporation will not be disposed to allow either ceremonial or practical precedence to the officers of the county in which their borough happens to be situated. Malcontent bodies of townsmen will be more difficult to deal with than disestablished justices, especially as the Courts of Quarter Sessions are but indirectly represented in the House of Commons. It has not been explained whether there is to be any interference with the jurisdiction of borough magistrates.

Some Quarter Sessions Chairmen advised their colleagues to retain, if possible, in another capacity some part of the authority which has hitherto been exercised by their class. Lord Spencer, at the Northamptonshire Quarter Sessions, appealed more especially to the younger justices, who may with less inconvenience than their elders become candidates for seats in the Local Councils. It is rather desirable than probable that his advice will be generally followed. Perhaps it may be found expedient to allow, in the first instance, another class of competitors to assert their claims. Aspirants to local influence and notoriety will be naturally disappointed if they find that the new governing body consists, in great part, of the same persons who have been superseded by the provisions of the Act. A series of contests in which the gentry might be opposed to candidates of the middle class is, on every account, to be deprecated. The more numerous section of the community would be almost everywhere successful, and political and social divisions would tend to coincide. Mr. Morley's speech at Newcastle shows that no exertion will be spared to embitter local feeling by incessant agitation. He objects to the retention by the justices of any part of their present functions, and he proposes to make good municipal government impossible by the institution of parochial Councils. It is not impossible that a short experience may discourage municipal ambition. The inconvenience of attending meetings at the county town will be severely felt by persons engaged in business. It is also probable that the almost certain increase of local taxation may suggest to the ratepayers a contrast between the new representatives and the frugal administrators of the past. The country gentlemen will not hesitate to respond to the call, if their services are required. In other departments of local administration members of the bench of justices have, by the choice of elected colleagues, taken a considerable part. Many Chairmen and Vice-Chairmen of Unions are ex officio Guardians. In all cases they must have been selected for their posts on the ground of their experience and ability, and perhaps to some extent on account of their comparatively greater leisure. The same result will not necessarily follow in the election of County and District Councillors. The voting power of the constituencies of Boards of Guardians and of Local Boards is more equitably distributed than under the Municipal Corporations Acts, which were necessarily copied in the Local Government Bill.

The absorption of the existing Local Board districts under the provisions of the Bill by the counties or the new districts is, in those parts of the country to which it will apply, a more serious blow to property than the disestablishment of Quarter Sessions. It is in the highest degree reasonable and just that the larger ratepayers should have a larger number of votes than their poorer neighbours. The county vote, like the present borough vote, will be uniform and nominally equal; and consequently it may happen in extreme cases that the local revenue will be raised and spent by the nominees of a majority which pays no direct rate. The Courts of Quarter Sessions, if they had not preferred a dignified reticence, might have defended their privilege of administering the local revenue on the ground that, as landowners, they ultimately bear the main burden of the rates. They have nevertheless judiciously abstained from resisting the divorce of taxation from representation. There can be little doubt that, sooner or later, Mr. Morley's proposals will be adopted by the transference of the administration of the Poor Law to the District Councils. The democratic sense of equality is offended by the franchise which at present furnishes a security against extravagance. There is, as Mr. Morley shows, an obvious absence of symmetry in the present arrangement; yet perhaps it is better that areas of administration should overlap than that the money of the ratepayers should be intentionally or carelessly squandered. When these points are better understood, there may perhaps be some reaction of feeling, though not of policy, in favour of the squires and their invidious privileges. Any such current of opinion will be more likely to display itself because the justices have offered neither opposition nor remonstrance. They know that their administrative functions would not be enlarged, and that the rural district would be itself entitled to the powers which have long been possessed by the towns. They consequently neither blame nor oppose the Government because it has arrived at the same conclusion. They will have some reason for dissatisfaction if Mr. Ritchie yields to clamour by depriving the justices of a share in the control of the police and of the appointment of chief constables.

It is nearly certain that under the new system local taxation will be largely increased; but expenditure prudently undertaken for public objects is not necessarily an evil. Courts of Quarter Sessions could not, if they had wished, have emulated the expenditure which has resulted in the accumulation of vast municipal debts. The urban Corporations have much to show for their outlay in the form of local improvements; but some of them have been too sanguine; and facility of borrowing has sometimes encouraged injudicious enterprise. There is a defect in institutions which prevent the application of public funds to useful or remunerative purposes; and the approval of the contributors is, when such questions arise, perhaps the only practicable test of expediency. The consent of the Local Government Board will be, as in the case of Corporations, required before a new loan can be contracted by a County Council. It is assuredly not superfluous to provide some external check on the power of numerical majorities to impose burdens on the larger ratepayers. In some places large additions to local taxation have been found not unpopular where it has been expected that part of the amount would be expended on labour. The opponents of the Preston Docks and of the Manchester Ship Canal assert that both undertakings have been recommended to municipal constituencies in the supposed interest of the working classes. The charge, whether it is well founded or erroneous, indicates a danger which is not imaginary. The deputation which lately waited on Mr. PLUNKET for the purpose of remonstrating against the low rate of Government contracts openly avowed the principle which the Corporation of Preston is, with or without reason, accused of applying in practice. Mr. BROADHURST with surprising candour denounced the habit which he attributed to the Government of letting contracts on terms which, as he alleged, prevented the engagement of workmen at the highest rate of wages. He openly condemned the economical grounds on which the public departments discharge their obvious duty to the taxpayer. It is not improbable that a democratic Parliament will ultimately concur with the representatives of the workmen, not in consideration of the justice or plausibility of their demand, but as a recognition of their electoral power. The logical consequence of the concession of Mr. BROADHURST'S demand will be the establishment of national workshops in accordance with the French precedent of 1848. When the Government undertakes public works, or overpays the workmen whom it employs, County Councils and borough Corporations will almost necessarily follow its example. The ratepayers will then look back with regret to the thrifty and modest administration of the Justices in Quarter Sessions. Perhaps at some remoter period taxation and representation will be once more brought into connexion.

POLICE MAGISTRATES AND POLICE CONSTABLES.

MR. BRIDGE seems to appreciate more clearly than Mr. PARTRIDGE the fact that Sir CHARLES WARREN'S myrmidons are also Queen VICTORIA'S subjects, and as such entitled to the protection of the criminal law; but it is to be feared that he is not absolutely free—as every magistrate should be—from the taint of the gutter opinion that the evidence of policemen is always to be regarded with distrust, and hardly to be believed when uncontradicted and inherently probable. A man who was charged before him the other day with assaulting a constable in the execution of his duty by kicking him, apparently with considerable roughness, was convicted, which is satisfactory, as the offence seems to have been clearly proved, but was suffered to depart on the easy terms of inducing two persons to become sureties for his keeping the peace in the modest sum of 5l. The reason for this leniency was that Mr. BRIDGE thought the policeman might have erroneously supposed the defendant to have been more deeply implicated than he really was in a street disturbance which had been occurring at the time, and might have "moved him on" in consequence of that mistake. It is a curious doctrine that a man in the neighbourhood of, but not in, a row may resent the natural suspicions of the policeman by kicking him in the face. Howbeit, the defendant was convicted, which indicates a healthier condition of the magisterial mind than that which afflicted Mr. PARTRIDGE in the matter of the lawless rescuer of the arrested African recorded a fortnight ago.

The affair of Mr. MONTAGU WILLIAMS and the Wandsworth police is very much more serious. It is imperatively necessary that, in some way or other, this matter should be as far as possible elucidated. Mr. WILLIAMS has expressed himself satisfied that a constable, having made a mistaken charge of assault, supported it by perjury, in which he was backed up by his comrades and by the inspector on duty at the police station, by whom, or some of whom, the prisoner was further assaulted while in custody. The accused policemen have been suspended from duty, and their conduct is now engaging the attention of Sir AUGUSTUS STEPHENSON. In justice to them the whole matter must of course be thoroughly investigated. A large part of the public will await the final result of this investigation with much interest, and, it is to be hoped, without making up their minds about it beforehand too confidently. In the first place, the question would present itself to the student of HUME in the guise of the following somewhat delicate problem—namely, to determine whether it is more probable that an inspector of police and three constables conspired together to oppress the innocent by means of perjury, in order to conceal the fact that one of the constables had made a mistake, or that Mr. MONTAGU WILLIAMS expressed himself with a degree of haste, want of judgment, and prejudice against the police which render him unfit for the post he holds.

This, of course, is a question of real importance for the people of the Wandsworth and Hammersmith districts, and it will have to be decided one way or the other. If Mr. WILLIAMS was right, the police ought to be, and probably will be, punished with the utmost severity. If he was wrong, he ought to be relieved of his present functions, which every one would greatly regret for various reasons. The relations between a police magistrate and the police of his district are so close and so constant that, unless they can work together with a considerable degree of mutual confidence, the existing arrangement must be changed, and the only possible way of changing it is the substitution of a different magistrate. If the police of Wandsworth think, rightly or wrongly, that they will not get justice from Mr. WILLIAMS, they will simply refrain from arresting and charging people whom it is their duty to arrest and charge. It is not difficult to imagine the most serious consequences following rapidly from such a state of things. The affair is the more to be regretted because Mr. WILLIAMS'S relations with the police in the Greenwich district were not by any means satisfactory.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL AT BIRMINGHAM.

THE Government ought to feel itself flattered, and the Conservative party to be gratified, by Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL'S unqualified approval of the conduct of affairs during the Session. The House of Commons has, he says, under the new Procedure, reverted to its best precedents; and even the Nationalist members have, according to the statement of their unexpected eulogist, observed strict conformity with Parliamentary rules. Having resumed its control of its proceedings, the House has proved its competence for the work of legislation. The routine business is in an unusually forward state, and many important measures are in progress, with every prospect of ultimate success. The conversion of Three per Cent. Stock, the Local Government Bill, and the Budget were in turn enumerated to the admiring Conservatives of Birmingham. A criticism on one of the proposed new taxes showed that Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL has not lost the faculty of sarcasm; and perhaps his just comment on the bottled-wine duty may have pleased any Free-trader who may have been present at the meeting. There were perhaps also a few Conservatives who wondered why so eminent an optimist should have separated himself from an almost faultless Administration. A year ago Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL'S secession seemed to be partially explained by the tone and tendency of his public speeches; but since that time either the Government has made good all its shortcomings, or its habitual critic has become more tolerant, if less severely just. His version of past events and his anticipations of the future could not be more cheerful if his party had just emerged in triumph from a general election. Mr. CHAMBERLAIN would scarcely agree with Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL in his claim on behalf of the Conservatives to the allegiance of the Unionists who perhaps form a majority of the Birmingham constituencies. The opposition of the Liberal Caucus was passed over with silent contempt. It is natural and right that a professed Tory should recognize the merit and the resources of his own party, especially as the Liberal-Unionists are able and willing to expatiate on their own services to the common cause. Lord RANDOLPH allows them only the modest function of checking excessive confidence which might tempt the Government into neglect or indolence. They may congratulate themselves on having risen in the estimation of their lively critic. No long time has passed since Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL treated the Liberal contingent as a mere incumbrance on the Unionist alliance. When his political position is more fully consolidated, he will probably be less ready to disclose rapid changes of opinion. His consistency has hitherto been confined to uniformity of method and of temper in dealing with different sides of great questions.

Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL still adheres to the creed which is vaguely described as a belief in Tory democracy. The notion, if not the name, was invented by Mr. DISRAELI, who perhaps sincerely thought that he had made a valuable political discovery. At the date of the Reform Bill of 1867 he had persuaded himself that there was a stratum of Conservative feeling below the shopkeeping constituencies of 1832. It is certain that he was surprised and disappointed by the result of the experiment at the first election held under the new franchise. The great body of ratepayers proved itself in 1868 more Radical than the ten-pound householders; but when the accumulated blunders of Mr.

Mr. Gladstone's first Administration produced the reaction of 1874, sanguine Conservatives began to think that their leader's judgment had been sounder than their own. Tory democracy was supposed to have come to an ignominious end when Mr. Gladstone returned to power with an overwhelming majority; but Lord Randolph Churchill, who was then beginning a political career of his own, picked up the discarded title, and he may perhaps succeed better with it than its original author. The phrase may apply to democratic measures proposed or supported by the Tory party, and Lord Randolph Churchill has some reason to represent the Local Government Bill as an acceptance of his own political doctrine. If he could induce the democracy to support Tory principles he would accomplish a more difficult task. He has scarcely an equal or a rival in the art of conciliating a popular assembly. His indifference to consistency may probably have been aggravated by his knowledge that multitudes have short memories. Lord Randolph Churchill's eloquence and energy, and the sincerity of his convictions at the moment, are not the less appreciated by his numerous admirers because he may not yet have settled down into some regular course of political action. It is satisfactory to find that he at present gives a hearty support to the Conservative Government, and it is to his credit that he abstained for once from denouncing the expenditure of the War Office and the Admiralty. It would, perhaps, be unfair to inquire whether he at last shares the general conclusion that he made a mistake in resigning office. When he next enters a Cabinet he will probably have learned the necessity of deference to the judgment of his colleagues. Devotion to Tory democracy need not stand in his way. The words will admit of a convenient variety of interpretations.

The wide difference between abstract theories and legislative or administrative measures is well illustrated by some of the consequences of Lord Randolph Churchill's retirement. His appointment as Chancellor of the Exchequer was generally and rightly regarded as a paradoxical selection. It was not a sufficient reason for placing the finances of the country in the hands of a novice that his immediate predecessor had been as notoriously deficient as himself in special knowledge. He had the advantage of being younger than Sir William Harcourt, who is equally clever, and perhaps, therefore, he might have learned his business more quickly. There could be no doubt of his general intelligence or of his aptitude; but it is impossible to believe that he could have conducted such an operation as the conversion of the Three per Cents. Lord Salisbury took occasion in his speech at Bangor to pay compliments both to his present and his late colleague; but it would have been absurd to compare them in fitness for the place of Chancellor of the Exchequer. The only reference which Lord Randolph Churchill made to economical considerations consisted in a judicious warning against the concession to the County Councils of undue facilities for contracting debt. He suggested that it might be advisable to submit to a Select Committee of the House of Commons every proposal on the part of a municipal authority to raise a loan. The Bill, as it is drawn, provides a security against the risk of undue burdens on the local finances. Before it can contract a loan the Council must obtain the sanction of the Local Government Board. This department will probably prescribe the general conditions on which the Councils will be allowed to borrow, and it will also exercise a discretion in each particular case. As Lord Salisbury said, there is little risk of extravagance in the employment of annual income. An efficient check on the exercise of borrowing powers will be sufficient for the purpose of enforcing economy. At the same time, it must be remembered that the professed object of the Local Government Bill was to transfer to municipal bodies the greater part of the powers and duties which have been hitherto reserved by Parliament. A minute and stringent interference with their discretion would create not unreasonable disappointment. If the Councils are to engage in large undertakings, their rating powers will not be sufficient for the purpose. It may be necessary to require in all cases of borrowing the sanction of the Board; but when the amount of proposed loans is small, and when the proposed outlay is obviously useful or necessary, no vexatious opposition would be expedient.

It was not unnatural that the prophet of Tory democracy should claim for himself or his creed the merit of having obtained a large concession in the municipal franchise which has been proposed by the Government. As it happens, the question was virtually decided before Tory democracy had been born or christened. There could be no sufficient reason for rejecting, in the case of counties, the suffrage which had for fifty years been established in boroughs. Lord Salisbury explained the grounds on which he disapproved of the introduction of ex officio members. They could scarcely propose themselves as candidates for election when they had already seats in the Council. As associates of elected members they would have occupied an invidious position, and probably they would have found themselves in a permanent minority. If those justices who have really managed county business become successful candidates for seats in the Council, Lord Salisbury's Government will in a certain sense have made a concession to Tory democracy. The other kind of democracy now represented by Mr. Illingworth and his associates will in the present instance not be formidable. Mr. Chaplin as the spokesman of the country gentlemen, who are none of them democrats, will accept the Bill, though some of his friends may not really like its provisions. The attempt which Lord Salisbury described of the ultra-Radicals to discredit the measure by their adhesion appears to have been abandoned. It is now to be opposed, though scarcely by the leaders of the Liberal party, on the ground that it is not sufficiently democratic. The protest of a faction will perhaps reconcile any malcontent Conservatives who may dissent from the general opinion of their party to a measure which is at least not so obnoxious as Mr. Illingworth's demands. The Tory democracy in the person of its chief or only representative has already adhered to the policy of the Government. Lord Randolph Churchill has on this and on other occasions cleared himself from the suspicion which was raised by his unwise retirement from office. It is now known that his expressed reasons, however insufficient, were the same which really determined his conduct. He has not indicated any purpose of deserting his party; and, indeed, he is able, in his detached position, to give it independent support. It may be hoped that in due time he will become tired of wasting his considerable powers by separating himself from his natural allies and possible colleagues. Events have proved that he is not indispensable to his party; and the co-operation of an organized party is indispensable to every candidate for political success.

SI VIS ME FLERE——

The author of All Sorts and Conditions of Men, unbosoming himself concerning the secrets of his art to the austere young readers of Atalanta, was rash enough, after quoting the example of George Eliot (who, it is currently reported, "actually wept over her own creations"), to inquire if anybody exists who supposes that "a moving "situation was ever yet depicted the writing of which did "not cost the writer anguish and tears?" By this time, we should say, the iron has entered into his soul, and he must incline to wish that he had kept his curiosity to himself. 'Tis an age of plébiscites, and it presently occurred to the Editor of the New York Critic to put the question to America's greatest novelists all round, and in this way collect a set of data which should settle the matter once and for evermore. The result is curious and instructive.

Mark Twain, who can hardly have done much weeping over his published works, replies to the Editor of The Critic with a "simple 'Yes'"; Dr. Eggleston "cannot imagine "that any author capable of creating a work of art ever "shed tears over his own inventions—that is, if he were "not in his cups"; a third writer "privately proclaims "Mr. Besant's contention 'bosh'"; Mr. T. B. Aldrich will "take Horace's word for a thousand pounds"; Mr. Charles Barnard has not only "been moved to not un-"manly tears over the imaginary trials of an imaginary "girl," but also has "seen many an audience furtively wipe "its collective eye" at the end of the third act.

Perhaps the most learned and eloquent of the Besantine-Horatian faction is Miss (or Mrs.) Baylor (Frances Courtenay), who writes at some length and with a certain parade of other tongues than her own. "I am very glad," says this accomplished L.L., "to be able to say that I agree "with Mr, Walter Besant, who agrees with Horace, and "so" (she adds with a solemnity that is none the less imposing for being a trifle obscure) "by another remove to place "myself as far as possible from all conflict with august autho-"rities of unknown powers, besides shifting the responsibility "where it belongs, has been assumed, and can well be sup-"ported, and preventing"—here the lady unexpectedly grows prudent—"all complications with another, powerful shade," "DIDEROT." She is sure that "HOMER wept over the "Iliad"; she "knows" that when THACKERAY killed THOMAS NEWCOME he had, if anybody were in the room with him, "to invent a most terrible fib to account for the tears "that dimmed his honest eyes"; she supports her case with an anecdote about DICKENS, a reference to "all the "humourists from ARISTOPHANES to LAMB," and a quotation (in the original) from ESPRONCEDA. Mrs. BURNETT agrees with HORACE, too, but she does so quite simply and in five lines of type. Another Horatian is Mr. CABLE, who opines that, though "writing is one thing; playing—acting—is "another," DIDEROT and Mr. BESANT are both right, and neither actor nor author can draw tears down the iron cheek of his public, till themselves have wept on their own account. Miss WOOLSON "agrees with HORACE "with all my heart," and instances THACKERAY, GEORGE ELIOT and TURGUENEFF—"in my estimation the greatest "of modern novelists"—as cases in point. "I am pleased "to say," writes Mr. TROWBRIDGE, "that I agree entirely "with HORACE"; and he proceeds, by way of justification, to relate that "HAWTHORNE wrote The Scarlet Letter with "perfect self-control," but that when he came to read it to his wife "even his granite nature was broken up and melted "by it." This is also the experience of Mr. NOAH BROOKS, whose "work has not been largely directed to the depicting "of moving situations," and to whom "the emotion has come "afterwards," when, says he, with as it were an austere confusedness, "with the critical coolness of a disinterested "reader, I have scanned my own lines." Mr. ROBERT GRANT, while admitting that "authors should undoubtedly "have broad sympathies," is yet prepared to believe that "not "many become either lachrymose or hilarious over their own "creations." Mr. R. M. JOHNSTON gives quite a learned little lecture on the Epistle to the Pisos, and "suspects that "Mr. BESANT may have interpreted HORACE's meaning too "literally." Mr. SIDNEY LUSKA thinks that "HORACE told "just one half the truth," inasmuch as—"practically"—he "has to chop himself into two" Mr. SIDNEY LUSKAS, one to feel and the other to write; Mr. STIMSON, bringing down HORACE and DIDEROT at a single shot, opines that "the "Maker and the Mummer do not work alike"; while Mr. JULIAN HAWTHORNE, greatly daring, admits that while he "knows nothing of these esoteric matters," he can so far put himself in the position of his own public as to surmise "that the evolution of tragic principles would be attended "by a distinctly pleasurable emotion—and vice versâ."

GOSSIP IN EXCELSIS.

THE foreign correspondence columns of most European journals during the end of last week and the whole of this have presented a spectacle peculiarly tempting to any one who plies, or wishes to ply, the dreadful and disgusting trade of the cynic. La haute politique often condescends to curious occupations; but she has not often condescended lower than to the gossip which during all the time just mentioned has been concocted and discussed about the "CHANCELLOR crisis." The first announcement, that Prince BISMARCK was going to resign because the German EMPEROR proposed to allow his daughter to marry somebody whom she is supposed to regard with affection, might have been thought piquant enough even for a generation which has invented Society papers. But this plain matter of fact, or of something not wholly different from fact, only stirred the activity of the gossips to new efforts. We have been told exactly how many folio sheets of paper were required by Prince BISMARCK to state his objections to the marriage of Princess VICTORIA of Prussia to Prince ALEXANDER of Battenberg. One industrious purveyor of tittle-tattle has gone so far as to set himself (it is true without any apparent prospect of coming to any answer) the really interesting sum in Rule of Three or Rule of Four, If it takes a hale old diplomatist thirty pages to write to an Emperor with a tube in his larynx, how many days may reasonably be expected to elapse before the Emperor replies to the diplomatist? Nay, this comparatively harmless, if somewhat disgusting, chatter has been outdone by the impertinent fibbing which has represented a German Empress and an English Princess Royal as a kind of Mrs. PROUDIE, requested to "leave the room" while her Imperial husband talked to Prince BISMARCK. And somebody seems to have thought the contemptible babble worthy, not only of a formal contradiction, but of an elaborate explanation of the circumstances, with the aid of which the Mrs. CANDOUR or the BACKBITE in question fabricated his or her slander. Such things are, of course, to be expected from the caterers for vulgar appetite, who alternate between the abuse of monarchy as an institution and the painful collection and retailing of the smallest trifles that may gratify snobbish curiosity as to Royal persons; but the conductors of respectable and important newspapers might have been expected to show a little more discretion. All the more might this have been expected as, after all, the amount of certain knowledge communicated is extremely small; and the tattlers confess themselves unable to say whether, in their own language, the EMPRESS or the CHANCELLOR has prevailed.

It would be pleasant if all this chatter could be dismissed as being not less unimportant and unsubstantial than it is undignified and uncertain. That, however, can unluckily not be done. There is enough practically confessed in the matter to make a certain amount of certainty possible. Nor can it be said that any one comes well out of the affair except the two persons whose happiness (as the phrase goes) is principally concerned, and who are, of course, to be condoled with simpliciter, and the Royal and Imperial ladies whose names have been dragged into the affair. For the gossips and scandal-mongers who have magnified it and gloated over it no language is too strong. They are among the not very numerous orders of creature which give some faint colour to the Manichæan heresy. But, unless Prince BISMARCK has been suffering evil to be imputed to him with extraordinary patience, he has himself behaved by no means well. Nor yet is it possible for any tolerably fair-minded critic, however little he may love Russia, to think that the project of the alleged marriage at the alleged time was judicious or statesmanlike. The conduct of the CZAR to the sometime Prince of Bulgaria is one of the basest and most disgraceful chapters of recent history, and the black of it was not made white by Prince ALEXANDER's pusillanimous apologies and his more pusillanimous abdication. The motives which prompted the CZAR to act as he did act were baser, though not more criminal, than the action which resulted from them. That is agreed by every one except Russian enthusiasts and Russian hirelings. But whether the CZAR is a bad man for hating and persecuting Prince ALEXANDER or not, it is certain that he does hate and persecute Prince ALEXANDER. And, this being so, that a Prussian Princess should be given to Prince ALEXANDER immediately after the death of her grandfather, and as almost the first act of the new reign in Germany, would, as matters are understood between Continental sovereigns, be a distinctly disobliging act to the CZAR, if it did not signify direct defiance of him. It is all very well to desire and applaud the annihilation of diplomatic and dynastic space, time, and etiquette in order to make two lovers happy. But Prince BISMARCK might very well say, "If that is the way your Majesty "carries out the sentiments of my famous speech on the "Army Bill, all I can say is that my duty as a gentleman "makes it impossible for me any longer to direct the foreign "policy of the Empire. I cannot hold out an elaborate "olive-branch to Russia one moment and flick her in the "face with it the next." And, however glad any one might be to see the necessary and inevitable antagonism between Germany and Russia express itself, he ought to see that such an expression must have consequences.

At the same time the way in which the PRINCE has at least allowed it to be supposed that he has acted shows him at his worst in every respect except cleverness; while it does not require even very much cleverness to get the better in a fight when you have any amount of fighting weight to spare and are utterly careless whether you hit below the belt or not. Prince BISMARCK's admirers as well as his enemies have been saying, in accents of admiration or disgust as the case may be, that he was determined to force on a match with another person whose influence with the present EMPEROR was popularly believed to rival his own, and that he has selected this particular question for the purpose. And so much is certain that, whether the occasion was of his seeking or not, the esclandre at least could hardly have taken place without a certain amount of what can only be called connivance on his part. Nobody else had any interest in making the thing public; and, if some singular indiscretion on the other side had let it out, it would have been easy for the PRINCE to guide the incident into a very different course, if either his good feeling or his good taste had equalled his great abilities and his dauntless courage. But neither good taste nor good feeling is largely present as an element in what somebody calls the German paste, and Prince BISMARCK, great man as he is in many ways, has about as little of them as any man living.

As usual, in these cases of personal politics, the really political consequences are likely to be smaller than is expected, or at least than some persons affect to expect. Supposing the tale to be in the main true, no one can suppose that, though Russia has apparently scored a point by the renewed intervention of her "Fourth Plenipotentiary," she has gained any real advantage by it. She has served the CHANCELLOR as a stick to beat somebody else with; but in such cases a man is not particularly grateful to the stick, nor should the stick be particularly grateful to him. Such public feeling as has been aroused on the same side in Germany has been aroused, not in the least on behalf of Russia, but by quite different and well-understood motives. If any august personages have had their desires frustrated in this matter, and have been compelled to yield to Russian sensibilities because of Prince BISMARCK's threats, they may owe Prince BISMARCK no very great grudge, but their affection for the Power which the PRINCE ostensibly champions is not likely to be kindled. The PRINCE himself, after making this effort for Russia, will expect repayment of some kind—of course to Germany, not to himself—and may very well say at the next pinch that he cannot be always fighting Russian battles. And last, but not least, the German people, according to historical experience and anthropological probability, are not likely, in the long run, whatever sentiments or prejudices may have been skilfully played on in such an affair, to relish the idea of Russian susceptibilities playing the first part in the settlement and decision of German matters.

JETTISON JUSTICE.

THE administration of the criminal law ought before all things to be speedy and certain. The case which Mr. FENWICK brought under the notice of the House of Commons on Tuesday deserved attention and fully justified the course which he took in moving the adjournment of the House. The HOME SECRETARY, as Mr. FENWICK admitted, was not to blame, and had no responsibility whatever in the matter. But the magistrates and police at Alnwick must have committed between them a rather stupid and very unfortunate blunder. Two men, named JOHN DOUGLASS and JOSEPH WOLFENDALE, were convicted at Alnwick on the last day of the year 1886 for having in their possession without sufficient excuse some timber recovered from a shipwreck on the coast. They were fined two pounds each, with the alternative of a month's imprisonment. They could not pay, but they were not at that time sent to gaol. Last month, considerably more than a year after the sentence had been passed, they were suddenly arrested, and are now in prison. The time allowed them to pay the fine was a month, but fourteen months elapsed before the alternative penalty was enforced. There was then a strike in operation, and of course the Northumbrian miners are saying—very likely without foundation, but naturally enough—that they were finally apprehended at the instigation of their employers. The facts, as set forth by Mr. FENWICK, and not substantially disputed by Mr. MATTHEWS, scarcely seem to have called for more than a caution and a reprimand. On the 31st of December, 1886, a vessel was stranded on the coast of Northumberland. The miners and fishermen came down to assist in saving the crew. The timber with which the ship had been loaded was jettisoned or thrown into the sea for the purpose of lightening her and getting her off more easily. Then the fishermen and the miners parted company, and it must be admitted that the fishermen followed the more prudent course of the two. They stacked their timber on the Ratcliff links. The miners took theirs home and there left it in full view of the public eye. It might naturally be supposed that if an individual miner wanted to steal some of this timber he would have privately removed what he could get to his house, and disposed of his spoil in a quiet way at the first convenient opportunity. The open and concerted action of the whole body seems to show either that they appropriated the cargo in ignorance, or that they had no intention of appropriating it at all, though it is fair to say that there was a suggestion that the miners had helped themselves from the fishermen's stacks. The magistrates were probably bound to convict, but they might well have contented themselves with ordering the restoration of the wood and the payment of costs. To fine a working-man more than a pound is practically a sentence of imprisonment. Mrs. WOLFENDALE did, indeed, offer an instalment of twenty shillings, which she afterwards increased to thirty-five, but it was not accepted, and suddenly, on a warrant dated the 1st of March, the two culprits were seized in their own homes at an early hour of the morning. There must be very little serious crime in Northumberland.

Mr. FENWICK's own Parliamentary position is so insecure that it would not be altogether surprising if he created opportunities of pushing himself to the front. The recent vote of the miners to continue his salary and Mr. BURT's was passed by a very small majority, and is directly in the teeth of a previous decision. Threatened men not only live long, but are apt to live fast. In this case, however, Mr. FENWICK cannot be accused of obstruction, and no such charge was ever made against Mr. BURT during the many years he has sat in Parliament. The very brief space of time occupied by the discussion of Mr. FENWICK's motion was by no means in excess of what the subject fairly required, and, as Tuesday belonged entirely to private members, the Government had no interest in the order of business. The HOME SECRETARY made what defence he could for the magistrates and the police, who are not under his control, and of whom he need not have made himself the advocate. Mr. MATTHEWS did, in fact, read a statement drawn up by the magistrates' clerk, which explained nothing except what did not require explanation. The men were, it appears from this document, prosecuted by the Receiver of Wrecks, under the proper section of the Criminal Law Consolidation Act of 1861, for having illegal possession of "articles "belonging to a ship or vessel in distress, wrecked or "stranded." They might have been fined twenty pounds each; they were only fined two pounds. The Summary Jurisdiction Act of 1879 gives the justices power to extend the time for payment, and this course was taken by the justices of Alnwick in favour of the defendants. "One of the oldest and most experienced of the Metro-"politan police magistrates" told Mr. MATTHEWS that the same thing was often done in London, and certainly the public have long ceased to be surprised at anything which a London magistrate does. In this case the two prisoners told a police-sergeant that they would rather go to gaol at once than remain for an indefinite period in suspense; but this communication the worthy sergeant did not give himself the trouble to forward. The result is that more than a year from the commission of their offence, and just as they are getting employment after a strike of seventeen weeks, WOLFENDALE and DOUGLASS find themselves put under lock and key. It is a cruel thing to administer the law in this arbitrary and capricious manner. The Receiver of Wrecks was quite right to prosecute, especially as notices had been published in the neighbourhood to warn people against carrying off the cargoes of stranded vessels. The fault lies with the magistrates and police for making an unreasonable use of reasonable powers. Although Mr. FENWICK withdrew his motion at the suggestion of Mr. JOHN MORLEY, Mr. MATTHEWS will, if he is wise, order the immediate release of the men.

IRELAND.

IT is not for the despised Saxon to teach the Irish agitator his business, and the sentiments therefore which his later tactics are calculated to inspire on this side of St. George's Channel ought no doubt to find only diffident expression. But thought is free, as a profound thinker has remarked, and we cannot doubt but that the Parnellite performances of Sunday last in Ireland have excited in most English bosoms a feeling of profound if respectful wonder. It has been usual among the more thorough-going Gladstonian patrons of Irish anarchy to swagger about the immense numerical superiority of the forces of disorder over those of order in Ireland, and to boast that it was only through the admirable forbearance of an injured but self-controlled people that the "coercion "policy" was possible at all. The LORD-LIEUTENANT proclaims a meeting in this or that part of Ireland; but, say our Gladstonians, it is only by bringing large forces of police and soldiery to the spot that he is able to make his proclamation respected. What would he do if Nationalist meetings were to be announced and to get themselves proclaimed in a number of different places at once? If this operation were carried out on a sufficiently large scale he would find himself at the end of his constabulary, if not of his military resources, and what would he do then? This has appeared a very telling inquiry to a certain portion of the English Parnellite press; and hitherto we had always admired the wisdom of the Irish Parnellites themselves in being content to echo the question with a "What indeed?" without making any attempt to put the Irish Executive upon their answer. This, however, is exactly the attempt which they seem now to have made in a mild way on Sunday last. It could only have been due to concerted action on the part of the leading agitators that so many meetings at so many different places were all fixed for the same day. At Kanturk, at Macroom, at Ennis, at Scariff, at Kilrush, at Miltown-Malbay, and at Loughrea, advertisements had been put forth inviting the attendance of the people on Sunday at the performance of various London "stars." Mr. HEALY and Mr. FLYNN were announced to appear at the first of these places, and Dr. TANNER at the second; DAVITT was "billed" for the third, and Mr. COX for the fourth; the fifth and sixth were to be respectively signalized by the presence of Mr. JOHN REDMOND (not the melodramatic brother) and Mr. ABRAHAM; while at the last-mentioned place the celebrated Mr. O'BRIEN was to tread the boards. All these entertainments were forbidden by proclamation; energetic attempts were in every case made to hold them; but not in a single instance did any of them come off. Mr. HEALY was easily caught and suppressed at Kanturk; Dr. TANNER, who "is stated to have held a meeting in a field at "4 A.M.," was unable to repeat even this ridiculous feat two hours later, and was conveyed to his hotel by two policemen when he attempted to hold a real meeting at two in the afternoon; DAVITT'S performance at Ennis was stopped, though here the breaking of a head or two supplied the plot for a later theatrical performance at Westminster, and Mr. REDMOND'S at Kilrush was disposed of on the same terms. At Scariff Mr. COX'S was quietly snuffed out; the assemblage got together at Miltown-Malbay by Mr. ABRAHAM and Mr. JEREMIAH JORDAN had three minutes given them to disperse, and did it in the time, perhaps beating the record; and though at Loughrea Mr. O'BRIEN spoke "for fully ten minutes," it was to a meeting who throughout that space of time were being actively dispersed. We can only repeat that, were it not for our conviction that the Irish agitator knows his business, we should have thought it the height of folly on his part to show his countrymen with what perfect ease, in this matter of suppressing meetings, the Irish Constabulary can carry out the orders of the Executive in seven different districts at once.

To turn to more important matters than these, we have to record a continuance of the successes of justice in the battle with Irish agrarian crime. Two of the perpetrators of another of those cruel and cowardly murders which have disgraced County Kerry have been convicted at the Wicklow Assizes. The crime of which JAMES KIRBY and PATRICK COURNANE have been guilty is now five months old, and the recollection of its circumstances may have in many minds become indistinct. It was the murder of an old man named PATRICK QUIRKE, of Liscahane, near Tralee. His house was entered early one morning last November by Moonlighters, who dragged him from his bed and shot him in the leg. QUIRKE lingered for a few hours in agony and then died. His offence, if we recollect rightly, was that of having been caretaker on a farm upon which there had been an eviction. The man KIRBY who was tried for this crime last Saturday was, after three hours' deliberation on the part of the jury—a time less likely to have been spent, perhaps, in weighing the merits of the prisoner's case than in considering the safety or otherwise of convicting him—found guilty. PATRICK COURNANE'S trial was concluded last Wednesday, the jury in this case arriving at their verdict after a retirement of only forty minutes, and recommending the prisoner to mercy on account of his youth and position. Both were sentenced to death; and we can see no reason why the sentence should not be carried out in the one case as in the other. The age of the victim may well be set against the youth of the murderer. English juries, however, are often not less weak in their recommendations to mercy, and the fact that Irish juries no longer shrink from giving the verdicts which their oaths dictate on the main question of guilt or innocence is of itself gratifying enough to excuse any minor hesitations. What remains to be done, now that the juries have recovered courage, is to support those other servants of justice who always run the greater danger of the two—the witnesses for the prosecution. We expressed a hope the other day that the girl NORAH FITZMAURICE, whose evidence brought her father's murderers to justice, would be protected from the treatment inflicted upon the CURTIN family; and it seems that the warning was not unneeded. It has been found necessary to make an "appeal to the justice and benevolence of the loyalists of "Great Britain and Ireland" on behalf of this girl and of her mother and sister. The lives of FITZMAURICE'S widow and daughters are, it appears, in so much danger that they are continually guarded by police. They find it impossible to get a labourer to work for them, and have not funds to employ men from a distance. Subscriptions are accordingly solicited, and will, we trust, be liberally forthcoming for this unfortunate family. But this case is not one to be dealt with by private benevolence alone; it is a matter of concern to public justice also, and as such demands the instant attention of the Government. By proper action on the part of the police with the view to the procuring of evidence it has been found possible to apply the boycotting clauses of the Crimes Act with very salutary effect in other parts of Ireland. Why is no effort made to put them in operation in the neighbourhood of Listowel?

And while on this subject we may add that examples of this offence appear to be cropping up in parts of Ireland which certainly ought to be kept free from it. The case of JOHN CROWE, of Blacklion, in the county of Fermanagh, is almost as bad in its way as the worst which occurred at Woodford at the time when Mr. MORLEY admitted guardedly that "a bad state of feeling" prevailed there. CROWE, who has long been boycotted by the League, and whose house was the object some time ago of an attempt at arson, has recently lost his daughter, for whom he could obtain no nurse during her illness, and whose funeral he only succeeded in carrying out after the usual difficulties. His persecution having lasted for two years he has at last given way. He had been in possession of a little farm from which the tenant had been evicted, but a fortnight ago he gave up the land and informed the local branch of the League to that effect. He was, however, actually told that he would not be pardoned by them unless he relinquished all claim to a sum of 40*l.* awarded him by the Fermanagh Grand Jury for the malicious burning of his dwelling. The unfortunate man was allowed a fortnight to choose between his 40*l.* and a League ticket, and by this time probably has, no doubt, submitted to his tyrants' terms. It is a serious matter to meet with such a state of things as this in a northern county; and it seems to suggest that the powers of the Crimes Act are enforced with less vigour in that part of Ireland where surely it is for obvious reasons desirable that the Act should be administered as energetically as possible—namely, in the province of Ulster. We confess, too, that we should like to see more prosecutions instituted generally throughout Ireland for the offence of boycotting. The Radical predictions of the failure of these provisions have been absolutely falsified in every case, so far as we are aware, in which proceedings have been taken under them; and we find it difficult to understand why operations so successful thus far have not been more systematically pursued.

THE CASE OF MAJOR TEMPLER.

THE acquittal of Major TEMPLER was to have been foreseen even before the case for the Treasury had been completely stated. It was already obvious that the only evidence on which a charge of the most dishonourable kind was brought against this officer was the unsupported word of two witnesses of the most dubious character. The Court doubtless wished to give Major TEMPLER an opportunity of describing the absurdity of the charge brought against him in adequate terms, or else it might well have declined to hear any more when the case for the prosecution was ended. Nothing had been produced against him except the statement of the ACKLANDS, unless, indeed, the extraordinary mental process which seems to have gone on in the head of Major ELSDALE is to be called evidence. This officer appears to have argued that, because a certain thing had been discovered, it must have been betrayed by a fellow-soldier and old friend who had every motive for keeping it secret. Military gentlemen reason in an extraordinary way. It is little more than a year ago since another distinguished officer lavished charges of corruption on what turned out to be no better evidence than his own private conviction that corruption must exist to account for various things of which he disapproved. After the example made of these accusations and the officer who brought them by Sir JAMES STEPHEN, it is a scandal to find the same sort of thing being done again, and this time with the support of the Treasury. Now that the whole story has been told, it appears almost incredible that the War Office, which ought to be able to obtain competent legal advice, should have allowed the court-martial to be held. It must have known that the so-called evidence against Major TEMPLER had only been obtained by offering pecuniary aid to very shady witnesses. We have no desire to quarrel with the Court for adding a rider to acquit Major ELSDALE of ignoble motives. Justice to one officer can be done without attacking another; but if the public is inclined to reason in what seems to be the military way, it has some justification for suspecting the existence of a mess-room feud and service jealousy at the back of this accusation.

Personal questions may, however, be left out of the matter altogether. There is quite enough in it without them to supply a subject for comment. It is absolutely certain that if the Italians have discovered the secret of making balloons on what our War Office thought was its own peculiar system, the very simple explanation is that the War Office showed them how to do it. During the Soudan expedition Italian officers were attached to the staff, "but instructions "were given that they were to be shown everything and "have all information given them they required." After that the War Office is surprised that they knew all about it! At home, too, Major ELSDALE shows Italians round, and "fences" when they ask undesirable questions. The art of fencing is a delicate one, and requires great skill, long experience, and a good natural faculty. It is at least conceivable that the Italians fenced also, and found the Major's doubles and disengages highly instructive. In mechanics, too, as in the sister art of conjuring, the difficulty is not so much to know how to do a thing as to know what to do. When a machine or a trick has been invented, a clever workman can generally reproduce it. He reasons back from the thing done to the process; and, if it were not so, we might dispense with laws to protect patents, to the not inconsiderable relief of the press of work in the High Court of Justice. Therefore it is wiser not even to say what you are doing. Of course, when the possible imitator is allowed to see nine parts out of ten of the patented machine, it is all the easier for him to pirate it. If the War Office had reflected on these rather obvious truths, it would have long ago seen the folly of allowing the carefully chosen experts of a foreign Government to see its machines. The secret could not remain long hidden after their inspection. It may be a liberal and courteous thing to permit everything to be shown and explained to foreigners; but it is a course which is quite incompatible with secrecy. The War Office may perhaps be of opinion that a foreign Government which is well served by good mechanics can always make a machine to rival ours, and that it is useless to attempt to hide our inventions. In that case, however, the whole effort to maintain secresy is absurd. Certainly it is ridiculous to throw the doors of our workshops wide open to the foreigner and to close them to our own people, and it is imbecile to jump to the conclusion that our mysteries have been discovered by the treason of our officers when they have been shown to any foreigner who asked to look at them. The matter cannot rest here. The War Office has practically been convicted of betraying its own secrets, and it ought now to be called upon to alter its whole method of dealing with foreign visitors.

THE CRUEL GREY GREENYARD ROAN PONY.

A REMARKABLE set of artistic, biological, physiological, legal, historical, and geographical problems have arisen in quadrupedal shape in the City of London. Their existence is announced with official brevity and compression of style in the following advertisement, which has appeared this week in the "agony column" of a daily contemporary:—"A GREY ROAN PONY GELDING, taken by the "City Police for cruelty. If the owner does not claim it, it "will be destroyed to defray the City Greenyard expenses." It is rare to meet with three lines of print suggesting so many and such diverse topics of human inquiry as are here provided for the benefit of the moderately thoughtful.

What is a grey roan pony? Two sorts of roans are generally recognized—blue roans and red roans. What they have in common is that they are equally grey, and equally different from greys that are not roans. Answer, then, artists and veterinary surgeons! Explain what a grey roan is; we shall be one step on the long road towards the complete understanding of this short but singular announcement.

Next comes a more difficult subject. "Taken by the "City Police for cruelty." The questions which arise here are of somewhat diverse character. First, can a pony—apart from its colour—be cruel? Secondly, what right have the City Police to arrest or "take" it if it is cruel? Cruelty is a moral quality which men sometimes have, which is generally attributed to children in their relations to the lowest animals, and of which some writers have professed to observe traces in women. But how can a pony be cruel? And how did this pony testify to its cruelty? Did it bite and worry the passers-by with its teeth, and pound them with its hoofs? And, if so, how do the City Police know that its remarkable conduct was not the result rather of mania, or some temporary alarm or irritation, than of cruelty? And why have its onslaughts failed to attract the attention of the energetic reporter? But perhaps the pony was cruel to its own kind. Perhaps it ungratefully deserted its parents. It seems less probable that, by unfriendly or inconstant behaviour, it broke the heart of some other pony. Nevertheless, one would like to know what sort of cruelty on the part of a pony induces the City Police to capture it and submit it to the horrible danger presently to be observed upon. And on this point it is to be noticed that no part of the common law justifies the City Police in taking the cruellest pony living. Under what statute or what bye-law, or—which is more vraisemblable—by what obscure custom of the City of London, do the City Police exercise this vague and surprising jurisdiction? There is certainly no public Act for the Prevention of Cruelty by Animals. It seems almost fantastic to suggest that "taken for cruelty" means that the City Police mistook the grey roan for the personification of cruelty in the abstract.

"If the owner does not claim it, it will be destroyed to "defray the City Greenyard expenses." Where and what and wherefore and by whom and how managed is the City Greenyard? What or who is a Greenyard? Are there many in the City? What are its or his or her expenses? And how, in the name of all that is bewildering, can they possibly be defrayed by the destruction of a grey roan pony gelding taken for cruelty by the City Police? If the creature were to be sold, it would be more intelligible, because a beast of such an odd colour, remarkable disposition, and surprising history would probably, if properly advertised and put up for sale by a competent auctioneer, fetch a sum sufficiently considerable to defray for a long time all the expenses that could reasonably be incurred by even the most extravagant Greenyard. But destroyed! Suppose the black-hearted and grey-roan-coated animal is burnt to cinders or cut up by machinery into a billion pieces and spread out in the sun to dry, in what degree can the claims of the City Greenyard's creditors possibly be thereby appeased? It is impossible to say that any one of these stupendous mysteries is more insoluble than any other. The whole advertisement is so difficult to make out, that the task is rather facilitated than otherwise by the suggestion that perhaps pony, cruelty, and Greenyard may have no objective existence, and that the whole thing may be merely a more than usually ingenious amatory cryptogram.

A FAMILY PARTY.

IT is pleasant to see brothers dining together in unity at all times, and particularly when they happen to have a serious family quarrel which must not be referred to without the most careful management. Some dexterity is required on such an occasion to avoid stirring the traditional hot ashes, and, as the history of some Liberal Clubs has shown of late, it has not always been forthcoming when wanted. The Devonshire has set an example to the younger and more ardent institutions of the party. Last Monday it gave an illustration of how the thing ought to be done. When in future a Gladstonian Liberal has to propose the health of a Unionist-Liberal he will do well to take Lord GRANVILLE'S speech as a model. The gentleman whose health is drunk cannot do better than follow the lead of Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. On neither side was there any attempt to burke the existence of that "gulf which divides the Liberal "party," or ignore the "difference which attempts to "destroy have rather accentuated." So did Lord GRANVILLE put it, skirting very dangerous matters in the neatest way. Mr. CHILDERS, with whom we deal at greater length elsewhere, again spoke of quarrels among Tories and even Whigs in ancient days, which had been made up, as an encouraging reminiscence. Nobody spoke of the surrenders which had soldered up those old-world disputes. Mr. CHAMBERLAIN said enough for the other side. He made his profession of faith in good general terms. When the Colonies are one's ostensible subject, it is safe to say that one "will never willingly admit of any policy that will tend to "weaken the ties between the different branches of the "Anglo-Saxon race which form the British Empire, the "vast dominion of the QUEEN." His hearers may have instantly bethought them of the threatened weakening of the tie between the British Empire and a branch of the Anglo-Saxon race nearer home than Canada; but they said nought of that matter. It was indeed a dignified scene.

It was found safer to talk about America. There was nothing but what was agreeable to be said about that, and Lord GRANVILLE produced his share of the niceness which befitted the occasion with his accustomed finish of style. He was well justified in his comments on the change which has come over the tone of English remarks about things American. It was appropriate that he should couple his remarks with the name of Mr. LOWELL, who had something to say in his time about the protecting tone some Englishmen thought fit to assume "in writing "about our great rivals across the sea." We are glad there is less of that, and even that what "protecting tone" there is in our mutual comments is apt rather to be heard from the other side. There seems to abide with us some memory of remarks made by Mr. LOWELL on the burning question tabooed at the Devonshire Club, not altogether unlike those comments which set his pen to work in other days. Mr. CHAMBERLAIN's praise of America was in another key, and one which, on the whole, we like better. There was so much between the lines of it capable of direct application to the "burning question of domestic politics." It was truly pleasant to hear devotion to the Constitution and unquestioning obedience to the law praised so heartily in that company. The illustrations chosen were American—and so much the better for America—but, after all, it was the praise of the thing which was the essential. And it was particularly good to hear it from Mr. CHAMBERLAIN, whose great merit in this, as in most things he has done for two years past, precisely is that he is a Radical. If one "of ours" had introduced that reference to the draft riots, and their summary treatment in New York, or the praise of order and law, it would have been a matter of course, but from the member for Birmingham it is rather more. Would Mr. CHAMBERLAIN have praised the use of the militia and of grape-shot to support "the "authority of Government" ten years ago? Hardly. If he does it now, that is a sign among others of the reaction against the once popular, though only half-avowed, creed of the Liberal that every violent mob is "the people," and ought to be allowed to have its way. There were other excellent things in Mr. CHAMBERLAIN's speech, and particularly his counterblast to Mr. BRIGHT's last pronouncement on Imperial Federation. Contradiction and revolt have brought some good out of the evil of Gladstonian supremacy. Notably a decided revival of old habits of respect for law and of patriotism in quarters where they were not wont to be conspicuous. If his visit to America has strengthened Mr. CHAMBERLAIN's faith in them, it is not the least good it has done. He was to be envied the pleasure of praising them across the table to Lord GRANVILLE.

MR. GLADSTONE ON THE SITUATION.

WE do not know whether Mr. GLADSTONE's followers are satisfied with the result of Sir BALTHAZAR FOSTER's well-meant attempt to "draw" their chief on the political situation and prospect; but, if so, even the most indulgent of opponents will find some difficulty, we should think, in understanding their satisfaction. Of the banquet itself it will surely not be denied, even by Gladstonians themselves, that it was rather a dreary function. One point of difference—we do not say that there are not others—between Mr. GLADSTONE and the husband of JULIET's nurse is that the former is not naturally a "merry man." He does not shine on convivial occasions, and he is on no occasion a particularly good hand at cheering the spirits of the depressed. He has not the invaluable art of making light of political misfortunes with a good grace. He is nothing if not argumentative; and, if he cannot successfully explain away disaster, he has not the knack of skilfully trifling with it or of coolly passing it by. His heroic habit is to grapple with it, and to attempt, however hopeless may be the task, to destroy its significance by reasoning, or, if that fails, by assertion; and, of course, when, as at present, the attempt in question is hopeless, his efforts must necessarily have a dispiriting effect upon his hearers. What colder comfort, for instance, could be offered to a party than the allegation that, "maimed and mutilated as they were supposed to be and as "in some sense they have been, yet that, as decided by "results, their elections in the main during the last fifteen "months have been more successful, and they have com-"manded more victories, or more advance at the polls in the "country, than any party in a minority," so far as Mr. GLADSTONE's recollection goes, "have ever done previously"? And what can an opponent reply to this extraordinary allegation except that, if Mr. GLADSTONE is satisfied, so most undoubtedly is he; that he asks nothing better than that the elections of the next fifteen months should be as "successful" for the Gladstonian party as those of the last fifteen, and that, in respect of "victories" and "advances" (especially of the Doncaster and Deptford description), this party is welcome not only to maintain but to increase the lead it has taken over any previous party in a minority within Mr. GLADSTONE's recollection?

It is just possible that a ray of hope may have dawned upon his followers when, from discussing the situation of the party, he went on to examine the Parliamentary prospect. Yet those who have considered, by the light of the morrow's reflection, the line of tactics which he appeared to be foreshadowing will not, we think, be likely to find it a very hopeful one. Mr. GLADSTONE has apparently persuaded himself that Mr. SMITH's answer to the "wobbling" Sir EDWARD WATKIN the other night has given him and his party an opening, and that it contained an unintentional disclosure of Ministerial policy in Ireland out of which the Opposition may make capital in the country. For not only did Mr. SMITH say that it was not the intention of the Government to proceed with a Local Government Bill for Ireland this Session, but he actually added that "there will "be no indisposition to extend to Ireland an Imperial "system of local government, suited to its wants, when "it is made clear that her people are prepared to receive "and work it in a spirit of loyalty to the Crown and "Constitution." This, says Mr. GLADSTONE, with his characteristic want of humour, is a deliberate declaration of policy of the broadest, most menacing, and most formidable kind. Prodigious! The Irish are actually threatened with the possibility of being refused an improved system of local government, until they are prepared to receive and work it in a spirit of loyalty to the Crown and Constitution. Or, to put it the other way, the Government have put forward the "menacing and for-"midable declaration" that, if the Irish demand an improved system of local government for this purpose, "working it in a spirit of disloyalty to the Crown and "Constitution," they won't get it. And Mr. GLADSTONE actually believes that a protest against this unconscionable refusal on the part of the Government will make a good cry to go to the country with! He seems to think that, if the Conservative party had promised a system of local government to Ireland as unconditionally, in fact, as he groundlessly alleges them to have done, they would be sternly called to account by the nation for having subsequently limited their promise by the dishonourable condition that its fulfilment must be consistent with the national welfare. Of course if this is so, and if the English are really more bent upon setting up County Councils in Ireland than of preserving the Crown and the Constitution of the realm, Mr. GLADSTONE has really discovered a Parliamentary and electioneering policy, and his followers ought to be greatly cheered by his speech at Sir BALTHAZAR's dinner. But, on the whole, we should not be surprised if the bulk of his followers misdoubted the policy and were not much enlivened by the speech.

THE PROGRESS OF GENERAL BOULANGER.

FOR the present, and for some time to come, French politics are likely to consist of the doings of General—or, as some of his more pedantic critics persist in calling him, M.—BOULANGER. In this last week there have been three events in the history of Boulangism. A constituency has returned the General at the head of the poll with a crushing majority; another attempt has been made to ruin him by the publication of documents which prove his limited regard for truth; and a Moderate Republican opponent of character and ability has endeavoured with some spirit to organize a general opposition to his triumphant career. The election in the Dordogne completes the proof of his great and general popularity in France. It is taken on all hands as a sign that he is sure of his return in the Nord. In whatever form it comes to him, he may be now considered safe to obtain power. If anything is wanted to complete the certainty, it will assuredly be supplied by his opponents. The publication of the telegrams sent by him to electioneering agents while in command at Clermont Ferrand, which was meant to ruin him, will unquestionably serve his interests. They prove, indeed, most superfluously that he is singularly lax in his statements on matters of fact; but so much was tolerably well known already, and has done him no harm. But their appearance proves something else, and it is that his opponents, who find him deficient in honesty, are capable of violating one of the strongest laws of the accepted French code of honour. Next to strict probity in money matters, there is nothing considered so sacred as the "professional secret." That a doctor should not talk about the affairs of his patients, or a notary about the business of his client, even in a court of law and when called as a witness, are matters of faith with all Frenchmen. It is equally taken for granted that a public office will not publish documents dealing with private affairs. General BOULANGER's telegrams can only have been made public with the participation of somebody in the Ministry of the Interior. Their appearance will be simply taken to prove that the politicians who sneer at the General's honour are themselves capable of committing what every Frenchman regards as a particularly mean offence. At the best they have put themselves on his level. It may be a confused and foolish theory that a Government is entitled to "tap the wires" for information, and to act on it when got, but is not entitled to publish it. Still, that is the general feeling, and the disregard shown for it is one proof among fifty of the stupidity with which the fight against General BOULANGER is being conducted.

M. RIBOT has taken a more honourable line in his opposition to the General. His appeal to "respectable "people" all over France to join in opposing Cæsarism and the dominion of the mob is at least a clean and honourable kind of warfare. It will, nevertheless, be as futile as the less creditable methods have been. M. RIBOT is a politician of unquestioned honour and considerable ability. He has always been a Moderate Republican, and has never intrigued to gain office or upset others. Such a man ought to be a formidable opponent; but there is probably no public man whom General BOULANGER can afford to hold cheaper. M. RIBOT, in truth, belongs to the party which in French politics is destined to be always beaten—the sober men who dislike extremes. If there were a general respect for the Constitution in France, and a disposition to hold all things as of less importance than good government; if there were few parties, and politicians could sink minor differences in order to carry out a common policy, then M. RIBOT would be listened to; but—it is almost absurd to go on. If that were the state of things in France there would be no need for his appeal. General BOULANGER would still be a zealous cavalry officer, and the Republic would be in no danger either from the sabre or the street. M. RIBOT is asking the Orleanist to join with the Opportunist, who exiled the Princes and has allowed the attacks on the Church, and the Bonapartist to help his worst enemies against a man who he believes is serving the good cause though unwittingly. Only one answer can be given to such a request. As for the mass of Frenchmen who belong to no party and only desire a strong Government, why should they help the Chamber to escape the punishment it has brought upon itself by its divisions, its wrangling, and its chattering incompetence?

THURSDAY NIGHT IN THE HOUSE.

THURSDAY night's proceedings in the House of Commons supplied a curiously apt illustration of the twofold character of the tactics which circumstances have forced upon the Opposition. Mr. GLADSTONE's after-dinner speech of last Wednesday at the National Liberal Club may not be possessed perhaps of quite such militant significance as is ascribed to it in some quarters; but there is no doubt that it was to some extent designed on the part of the distinguished guest of the evening as an assurance to his followers that as a Parliamentary leader he had not quite forgotten his swashing blow. No doubt Mr. GLADSTONE's elaborate attack on the Ministerial statement with respect to the extension of local government in Ireland was intended to encourage his dispirited party by exhibiting to them their leader in a fighting mood. Nor, further, is there any reason to question the sincerity of Mr. GLADSTONE's desire to come to blows with the Government, if only he could discover a plausible or even a decent casus belli. But this is exactly the difficulty. He does not see his way to organizing a grand attack upon the Budget; while as to the Local Government Bill the strategic outlook appears more hopeless still. Nothing, of course, would be, in one sense, easier to him than to get up a magnificent pitched battle, either on the second reading of the Bill itself, or by way of substantive motion on the question whether it should or should not be accompanied by similar, or at any rate the foreshadowing of similar, measures for Scotland and Ireland; but Mr. GLADSTONE, as a good general, has no taste for magnificent pitched battles, which are beforehand certain not only to end in disastrous Parliamentary defeat, but to leave him in a worse position in the country than before he fought them. Hence, though Mr. GLADSTONE thinks it worth while to fill three parts of his speech, last Wednesday, with hyperbolical denunciations of the enormity of withholding local government reform from Ireland until the country is fit for it, he has thus far given no sign of any readiness to maintain that proposition from his place in the House of Commons. Failing such readiness, and in the absence of any serious ground of objection to the great Ministerial measure now before Parliament, Mr. GLADSTONE has been thrown back for fighting purposes on such questions as that raised by Mr. PARNELL with respect to the scuffle of last Sunday in the courtyard at Ennis. Never have the terms of the rule which confines these impromptu debates to definite matters of "urgent public importance" been more severely strained. Even the Parnellites themselves were hard put to it to make any more out of their complaint than that cavalry were employed to do work which would have been better entrusted to infantry; and out of this minute grievance, enforced by Mr. PARNELL's thoroughly conventional declamation and the windy rant of Mr. O'BRIEN, who now seems to regard every subject on which he speaks as a part to scratch a kitten in, Mr. GLADSTONE, Mr. MORLEY, and Sir GEORGE TREVELYAN were forced to provide themselves with material for a two hours' prolongation of the debate. Of the two lieutenants Mr. MORLEY does not perhaps need our compassion; for, misled by the experience of a Chief Secretary who, from the nature of his position, never had or could have had to dragoon anybody but a Belfast Protestant, he was probably supported in his criticisms by a sincere belief that disorderly Nationalist mobs might easily be dispersed by a few graceful allusions to the "union of hearts." But Sir GEORGE TREVELYAN, who has served in Ireland under totally different conditions, knows well that, in STRAFFORD's words, the work of keeping order there "needs warmer water than so"; and his eager advocacy of the Parnellite contentions can, therefore, be only regarded as marking with painful precision another downward step in his career.

It is interesting, though not perhaps very edifying, to turn from a debate of this kind to the discussion which followed on the second reading of the Local Government Bill. There, where opposition however violent, and indeed however malicious, might easily mask itself under a disguise of legitimacy, there is plainly no opening for opposition at all. Mr. STANSFELD, who, as a former chief of the department over which Mr. RITCHIE presides, would have been eminently well fitted to head an attack on the measure, if any opportunity could have been found, was obliged to make what was not really a second-reading speech at all. It was merely a speech appropriate to the motion for going into Committee, confined, as it was, to a mere expression of the speaker's regrets that the Bill should be defective in this or that detail, or should stop short of this or the other point of innovation. Mr. STANSFELD, indeed, frankly admitted that he could find no objection serious enough to warrant a motion for amendment on the second reading; and that the Opposition are forced, by the very character of the measure, to reserve themselves for the Committee stage. Sir William Harcourt again, in his speech at York, could only jibe at the Bill for having, as he contends, appropriated his London Municipality scheme—a part of the measure which undoubtedly "accuses its origin" by being quite the most questionable feature of the proposed legislation. And this is all that the Opposition can do, either at Westminster or elsewhere. It is certainly a remarkable tribute both to the legislative and administrative policy of Ministers that the Gladstonians cannot discuss the former without finding themselves in substantial accord with their opponents, or attack the latter without finding themselves arrayed also against the first principles of good citizenship and good government.

CORRUPT LITERATURE.

Among the matters to which the attention of Parliament is to be called we notice that corrupt literature is one. Mr. Samuel Smith has announced his intention of asking Parliament to look into that province of things, and presumably do something. Now of course, before undertaking to give Mr. Samuel Smith general support, it will be well to find out exactly what he means by corrupting literature. So much depends on the definition in a case of this kind. There are persons of sentiment who find the rather butcherly pugnacity of Mr. Rider Haggard's stories corrupting; and Sir Wilfrid Lawson would doubtless apply the adjective to much cheerful verse. But Mr. Samuel Smith has probably no wish to establish a censorship of an extensive kind, and if his object is what we take it to be, it is entitled to the favourable consideration of the House and the support of the decent part of the community. The Saturday Review has already directed the attention of the police to the fact that books which no shop dare expose in Paris, or even in Brussels, are to be seen in windows in London. Books which have only escaped suppression in France through the astounding laxity which has allowed some parts of Paris to become nearly impassable to decent people—on the showing of Parisian papers themselves—are translated and openly advertised. They are bowdlerized to some extent, no doubt (it cannot be very thoroughly, or else there would be nothing of them left); but that is not said in the advertisements. What the publishers of such things appeal to is the taste for obscene scribbling. We would rather not profane the name of literature by applying it to such nauseous rubbish. If this is what Mr. Samuel Smith wants to put a stop to he has our entire sympathy. It is not easy in these lax days to persuade our rulers to do anything effective in the cause of public decency. We have allowed a disgraceful liberty to native manufacturers of the stuff, but even a public protest which has no immediate practical effect is something. It will help to fix a brand, to have nastiness properly described as nastiness, and reduce the purveyors of it to their proper position. The surest of all ways of securing immunity for the abuse is to sit still and allow it to go on under the cowardly pretext that nothing effectual can be done. We have seen of late what a little tardy resolution can do to secure the liberty of the streets from mob tyranny, and a similar display of firmness would be equally beneficial in other matters.

PROFESSIONALS IN ENGLISH SPORTS.

In spite of the prophets, West Bromwich Albion—heavens, what a name!—are the holders of the Football Association Challenge Cup for the year, and the confidently expected victory has been snatched from Preston North End by the nimble fingers of the opposing goal-keeper. The result does not affect us with any feeling more lively than one of mild satisfaction that the North-country team—to the making of which both sides of the Tweed seem to have contributed—has not materially profited by its rather shabbily won victory over Aston Villa in January. The triumph of one eleven consisting largely of professional players over another similarly composed is a matter of small moment as compared with the present position of professionals in various departments of sport, among which football is conspicuous.

The professional question is complicated by the presence of a sort of amphibious animal, who must, for want of a better name, be called a "semi-professional"—a kind of amateur hireling unhappily familiar to all who have taken much part in either of the two great English games. He is a player of greater or less skill, who gradually gives to his favourite pursuit time and attention which are withdrawn from his profession, or business, or trade—for he occurs in all ranks of society—until he finds a natural difficulty in making both ends meet. Instead of frankly facing the situation, and either giving up his pastime with a sigh or joining the number of professional players, he steers a middle course. When asked to play in such and such a match, he hints a doubt whether he can afford it; he is not a rich man, and the expenses of going about the country are heavy. So he comes to receive, under the convenient euphemism of "expenses," a sum which not only defrays the cost of travelling, but leaves him with a substantial recompense for his services, while the receipt of it, by a tacit convention, is not allowed to deprive him of his position as an amateur. There is nothing apparently to prevent him from pursuing his undignified career under shelter of false pretences until failing powers make him no longer worth his fee. Avowed professionals regard him with envy, hatred, malice, and all uncharitableness; amateurs of the better sort fight shy of him; but an unworthy desire for victory at any price ensures his employment by many clubs which partly depend for their prosperity on the support of the outside public.

When the Association Challenge Cup was first offered for competition in 1871 the professional question had not arisen, and no one thought of it arising. Examples of the semi-professional, though they no doubt occurred, were not so common as in the cricket-field. Football, as a game for grown men, was in its infancy, even the rules were in a rather provisional state, and the best teams were composed mainly of players who had learned to play at the Public Schools. The Royal Engineers, Oxford University, the Old Etonians, and, above all, that redoubtable club the Wanderers, who were the winners in five years out of seven, had matters pretty much to themselves. Then the game spread; tradesmen's and artisans' clubs were founded, and so football reached the classes from which the professional element in any sport is naturally drawn. The game, as a game, cannot be said to have improved in extending from boys to men. The rules, and still more the style of play, have been modified to suit older players. Men do not play like this. One gets possession of the ball, and straightway kicks it—or in the Rugby game flings it—to another, conveniently posted for its reception; he, when beset by the foe, kicks it on to some one else who is prowling about in the neighbourhood. It will, no doubt, be urged in reply that this method of play requires great skill, and is also more successful than the other in the important object of getting goals. In the same way it may be said that a couple of wily old greyhounds running wide, and driving the game to each other, will kill more hares in a day's coursing than the winner and runner-up at Altcar; but just as the sportsman looks at the quality of the sport, not at the fulness of the bag, and prefers the style of Master Magrath to that of the farmer's brood-bitch, even so do we hold that the modern style of football is not to be compared with the game of boys; and this is the style which the existence of professional teams is likely to perpetuate, because it depends for success less on brilliancy and dash than on skilful combination and dexterous "passing."

The outcry for the recognition of professionals came loudest from the manufacturing districts of the North. Lancashire, home of manufactures and cradle of Free-trade, has been conspicuous for her success not less in importing than in producing professionals. Many of the players who have been most prominent in gaining for Lancashire its high position in county cricket are natives of other parts of Great Britain: and we have noticed that, when Manchester plays Liverpool, each team generally includes three or four ground-bowlers, though one would have thought that the rivalry between the two towns would have induced them to rely on their own resources in this match, if in no other. Still, much as the prominence now given to the professional element in cricket is to be regretted, the game is one in which amateurs cannot altogether do without it. Grounds must be kept in order, umpires and practice bowlers are needed, and the time taken up by an important match renders it inevitable that in first-class cricket much of the burden of the game should rest on men who have no other occupation—that is, on the professionals and on a comparatively small number of well-to-do amateurs. In football there is no such necessity. Professionals do not teach the game; they are not needed in that capacity, or indeed in any other, by amateurs. This is surely a sufficient condemnation of their existence. The professional in any branch of sport is, in the first place, the servant of the amateur who practises it for his own amusement. When there is no room for such service, professionals should be rigidly excluded by amateurs from sharing in their sport. Something will have to be done soon, or amateurs will, in football at any rate, find no place left for them. One is constantly hearing complaints of rough, and even of foul, play on the part of professional teams, and every year fewer and fewer of the best clubs enter for the Cup competition. It is sometimes said that they may, if they choose, establish an Amateur Cup; but why should they? The Association was, in the beginning, an amateur association, the competition was a competition of amateur players, and there is no reason why the clubs which were its original supporters should retire from the field, when strong combined action on their part would, in all probability, gain the point.

It does not require much foresight to perceive what must inevitably come of the present state of things; if, indeed, it has not to some extent come already. Enterprising speculators will hire a team of professionals, paying wages which will secure the best talent, so as to attract large crowds of spectators, and bring in profitable returns by way of gate-money. There will be eager competition among rival troupes in snapping up promising players; a brilliant half-back, or a goal-keeper of unusual manual dexterity, will be tempted from one team to another by the offer of a higher salary; and the link—often a slight one—which now exists between the player and the locality which he nominally represents will be broken.

In fact, professional football is a show, not a game; it is played for the pleasure of the spectators, not of the actors. If proof of this is needed it may be found in the circumstances of the match between Aston Villa and Preston North End to which we have already referred. On that occasion, it will be remembered that the spectators crowded on to the ground and made a fair game, in the opinion of the players, impossible. But the spectators had paid for admission, and the players did not dare to baulk them of their spectacle; so they were forced to adopt the ignominious expedient of playing on for the benefit of the crowd, with the reservation that the game should not count as a cup tie—an agreement which was, as we all know, afterwards upset by the Council of the Association. When such a state of things as this prevails the players are to all intents and purposes the servants of the spectators. Of course this is exactly what professional givers of an entertainment must be, and as such they are in most branches of sport excluded from amateur competitions, while amateurs who take part in their performances share their disqualification. So it should be in football. If the show pays there is no reason why it should not take place; but there is every reason why amateurs, who play for love of the game, for the sake of healthy exercise and the joy of battle, should refuse to take part in it. The winner of the University quarter-mile does not enter for the Easter Monday handicap held in the grounds of some pot-house; the amateur gymnast does not appear in a troupe of trapeze artists; and it ought to be recognized that the professional football-player is on exactly the same footing as the professional pedestrian and acrobat.

MR. BALFOUR SPEAKS.

MR. ARTHUR BALFOUR must have felt himself a fortunate man on Wednesday night. He had an excellent case, a favourable audience, an incomparable butt ready in Mr. Wilfrid Blunt, and if such a combination of good fortune might have seemed likely to provoke Nemesis, he had the consciousness that a sacrifice to that goddess was ready in the fact that his health was going to be proposed by Mr. Ashmead Bartlett. If the sometime member for Eye were not undoubtedly incorruptible, one really might think that Mr. Balfour had bribed him to make that Curtian reference; and we present the suggestion to the Nationalist organs. However, even Mr. Ashmead Bartlett did nothing worse than provide a comic note, and as that note did not throw Mr. Balfour out, no harm of any kind was done, and yet Nemesis, unless in her most ill-tempered mood, must have been propitiated. Mr. Wilfrid Blunt has at last got his answer from Mr. Balfour, and the best test of the success of that answer is that some Gladstonian critics of Mr. Balfour's speech have wisely left it alone altogether. It comes, of course, to nothing more than what every sensible person foresaw long ago, and what was made certain by Mr. Blunt's almost inconceivable letters on the subject in the Times. Between the intrinsic improbability of the "first version," the discrepancies between that and the others, the unimaginable farce of Mr. Blunt's posing as a "serious Liberal politician" sent from Heaven to Clouds for the purpose of making officious arrangements with the Chief Secretary, the contemptible residuum of matter which his own latest and most elaborate account left to the story, and the state of mind which interpreted Mr. Balfour's charitable and kindly declaration that, as the original statement was a lie, he did not believe Mr. Blunt made it, into the exactly contrary imputation of falsehood to Mr. Blunt himself—the whole thing had become a sheer absurdity. There was nothing more to be done with it than to point out, as Mr. Balfour pointed out with cruel amiability, that Mr. Blunt is only a feather-headed person of no importance, who is quite unaware of what he really is, thinks himself all sorts of things which he is not, and, for the most part, does not know what he is saying, much less what other people have said. And Mr. Blunt, with somewhat unusual good sense, practically "comes down" in such answer as he has given, and retires grumbling about Mr. Balfour's "lugubrious and menacing" arguments. So now we have not even got to wait for the further revelations which Mr. Blunt promised, and need only repeat the obvious moral that it is well to be very careful in talking with Home Rulers. If any blame is to be attached to Mr. Balfour in the matter, it is that he seems to have come to this useful conclusion himself rather late. It is perfectly permissible for a private person to fool fools to the top of their bent; but a Cabinet Minister is under somewhat different obligations.

It is a little surprising to find Gladstonians accusing Mr. Balfour of not being serious enough in the speech as a whole. To begin with, the great classical learning of Mr. Ashmead Bartlett would be ready, and justly ready, with a retort about ridentem dicere verum. If any one looks a little below the surface, he will find no lack of seriousness in Mr. Balfour's speech, though the seriousness may be clothed with something like that jesting air which made the nincompoops of another day so furiously angry with Canning. Certainly Mr. Balfour did not give himself the tragedy airs of Mr. Gladstone. He did not say that in serving his country he was prepared for even worse sufferings, &c.; that his career might be short, but he trusted, &c.; or that he hoped a good Providence would forgive the wicked men who, not knowing what they did, called him names. In other words, there was nothing of Pecksniff, and nothing of Chadband, about Mr. Balfour's manner; and there are, no doubt, some people who are unable to recognize seriousness unless it wraps itself in some of the familiar formulæ consecrated by these great men. A sarcastic horticulturist, ironically defending the practice of tight-lacing in the vegetable world, once remarked that, if market gardeners sent lettuces to market without strings round them, the sapient British public would say "That is not a lettuce"; and apparently there are people who, missing the familiar cant, say "That is not serious." There is seriousness enough, in all conscience, in that part of Mr. Balfour's speech which deals with the attempts of Mr. Gladstone and Sir William Harcourt to evade responsibility for their conduct before the great volte-face of Christmas 1885, and in his dealing with the newest cant—cant indulged in even by such a person as Mr. John Morley—about the union of English and Irish hearts. And how very serious both references are may be best shown by comparing with what Mr. Balfour says a short paragraph in the same number of the Times which contains the report of his speech. Every one knows that, in consequence chiefly of the bravery and devotion of Norah Fitzmaurice, the murderers of her father have been convicted and sentenced to death. According to some Gladstonians, who must enjoy the possession either of the greatest ignorance or the greatest effrontery, this trial had nothing to do with the League or the Parnellites at all. It was a case of ordinary crime in which everybody must rejoice at the punishment of the criminal. And now we hear the usual story that the lives of Norah Fitzmaurice, of her sister, and of her mother are being made intolerable because this girl helped the law and avenged her father upon the scoundrel emissaries of a scoundrel association. That is the kind of thing that Mr. Gladstone, Mr. Morley, Sir William Harcourt are fighting and striving to help, protect, enforce, make general in Ireland. And that is the kind of thing that Mr. Balfour, and the Government of which Mr. Balfour is a member, are determined, at whatever cost, to put down with the help of the English people. Without such practices as those now being applied to the Fitzmaurices, the Parnellite terror could not be kept up for a month, and it is no wonder that the conviction in two cases of Parnellite murderers has alarmed the party. For five years (and all credit to them) Mr. Gladstone and Sir William Harcourt, if not Mr. Morley, saw these facts clearly enough. They have not yet answered Mr. Balfour's simple and quite serious question, Were they tyrannical and wicked oppressors when they saw, or not?

The chief interest, indeed, of Mr. Balfour's speech is the possibility it gives of submitting in a brief and intelligible form a criterion of the present state of Ireland to almost any intelligent person. Take it and set it side by side with Mr. Gladstone's delivered on the same night, with Mr. Morley's at Newcastle the other day, with any other recent or not-recent deliverance of a Separatist, and the difference must surely be obvious at once to any one who ever possessed, or who at least has retained, a faculty of cool judgment. Mr. Balfour is probably the last person who would thank Mr. Ashmead Bartlett or any one else for representing him as a Heaven-born politician. What he does, and by doing has eminently justified his selection for his present post, is to apply to its business the cool common sense of an educated Englishman. This is the quality which, appearing in the days of the first Cecil and those of his son, obscured during the civil wars and religious troubles of the seventeenth century, was shown again on each side of politics by Godolphin, by Harley, by Walpole, by the two Pitts, by Canning, by Lord Palmerston. Some Passionate Pilgrim of Gladstonianism has mournfully expostulated with Mr. Balfour for his indifference to "the passion and the pain of the Irish people"—that is to say, apparently, to the passionate desire which some Irishmen feel for inflicting on other Irishmen's daughters the pain of being fatherless. Mr. Balfour is not deaf, and snuff-taking has gone out of fashion, else the parody would be easy:—

> When they talked of their passion, their pain, and their stuff,
> He shifted his trumpet and only took snuff.

And that is the way to govern Ireland.

Meanwhile it is only necessary to commiserate that unhappy country on the kind of champions which she prefers to Mr. Balfour. Mr. Parnell, with his contracts for supplying Dublin with stone and his forty thousand pounds of testimonial; Mr. Gladstone, with his eighty-six votes bought at the price of pronouncing the whole of his own fifty years of public life to have been an unprotesting acquiescence in brutal injustice; Mr. Blunt, with his solemn mountebankeries; Mr. O'Brien, abiding by, if not in, his breeches—these are the major prophets that Ireland prefers, and the minor prophets are like unto them. One passage in Mr. Balfour's speech about the inconveniences of Irish patronage might be illustrated by an incident which has had little notice in the English papers, but which is filling the Irish Nationalist organs every day. Not long ago the managing director of one of the Irish banks died, and Mr. Childers is the official candidate for his place. It cannot be denied that Mr. Childers, whatever we may think of his statesmanship, is a practical and skilful man of business; he has, we believe, had experience of banking; he has

(at what price his conscience knows best) obediently followed his leader and become a Home Ruler. But all this is nothing. The people who used to make loudest outcry against the phrase "No Irish need apply" are now shouting "No English need apply," just as they shouted "No Welsh need apply" when the Welsh quarry owners competed with Mr. Parnell. We need hardly say that we have no desire to see Mr. Childers (who is a politician for whom we have uncommonly little respect) put into any good thing merely as being Mr. Childers. But it is clear that the outcry is made against him, not because he is Mr. Childers, but because he is not an Irishman. This is Home Rule in a nutshell—that is to say, a Childers—and together with the Fitzmaurice business it supplies matter which cannot be too well meditated by everybody. Mr. Morley may be especially requested to meditate on it in reference to the "union of hearts," which is clearly not to include a union of purses, except on peculiar terms. Ireland shall dip into England's purse when she likes; but gare à Childers qui touche the sacred crumena of Hibernia!

THE WIFE'S SECRET.

THERE is an archaic air, an atmosphere of insincerity, about The Wife's Secret that it is perhaps impossible to disguise, but that certainly is not disguised with success at the St. James's Theatre. The plot is too slight for expansion into four acts. Lady Eveline Amyott, wife of a Roundhead, gives shelter to her Royalist brother, Lord Arden, who is flying from Cromwell's troops; Sir Walter is convinced by his steward, Jabez Sneed, that a man is hiding in the house, and suspects that the secret visitor must be a lover, while Lady Eveline cannot tell the truth because Arden has sworn her to secresy. That is the whole plot, and it has to be attenuated sadly to do duty throughout four acts and six scenes. The tendency of the day is to produce plays the plots of which are complicated and involved; and if critics can make them out and piece them together at all, there is a disposition to praise the works for their ingenuity. We hesitate, therefore, to condemn this old play for its simplicity, because that is infinitely better than complication; but The Wife's Secret is spun out not only tediously but foolishly. Anything more fatuous than the proceedings of Lady Eveline is not to be imagined. She knows that her husband's suspicions have been aroused as to the reason why she keeps a certain "bower-chamber" locked up; she knows that the vigilant and malignant Jabez Sneed suspects and watches her; and yet, notwithstanding this, she goes in the evening to the mysterious room, permits it to be brilliantly illuminated, meets her brother close to the window, and embraces him with the utmost warmth. Could anything be madder? Of course she did not know that her husband and his steward were watching, but the chances of some one noticing that the locked chamber was lighted up, and furthermore seeing what passed within, were so great that discovery was, in truth, inevitable. It seems that when the play was first acted by Charles Kean, only the shadows of brother and sister were seen on a blind by the jealous husband. This was sufficient to show that Lord Arden and his sister were an extremely incautious couple, but the embrace at the St. James's Theatre is more reckless still.

It is in the last act, however, that the artificiality of the plot is chiefly exhibited. Lady Eveline knows—she cannot help knowing—the grounds and nature of her husband's suspicions; but the pair of them are both equally determined on being indefinite, and they remorselessly carry out their determination. She cannot speak; her oath prevents her; but she might, could, and inevitably would beg her husband to trust her, and assure him that an explanation would be forthcoming in time. Neither of them will come to the point, and the tedious ingenuity with which they avoid it is exasperating. A great deal of the blame certainly belongs to the author; but some, no doubt, should be apportioned to the players. Whatever seemed likely to be for the moment theatrically effective with an unreasoning audience was quite enough for Mr. George Lovell, the author of the play. Thus, in the last scene of reconciliation, it is generally accepted as a fact that Jabez Sneed has behaved villanously; but if his conduct is analysed it will be seen that, on the contrary, he had the most excellent reasons for the doubts of Lady Eveline's honour which he had expressed, and deserved great credit for his wariness. Sir Walter's treatment of the Roundhead officer who comes to search the house is equally ridiculous. In the first place he encourages the soldier to insult Lady Eveline, and then suddenly turns round on the unfortunate man and abuses him for doing his duty. A better actor than Mr. Kendal might have done these things with an air of something approaching to plausibility; but he is ill suited with the character of Amyott. Mr. Kendal's delivery of blank verse is astoundingly bad for a player who fills a leading part at a leading theatre. He pauses at the ends of his lines, irrespective of the meaning of sentences, committing the very first fault that youthful actors are taught to avoid. His grief is totally without manliness or dignity, though here, again, it must be confessed, in justice to a representative of Sir Amyott, that the author is very feeble. The inconsistency of Amyott's behaviour to Sneed would try an actor of far greater resource. The Lady Eveline of Mrs. Kendal, though somewhat more successful, is far from convincing. The actress does not seem to know to what extent she may venture to try to be natural, and so there is neither a hearty plunge into the conventional with all its tricks and devices, nor a careful endeavour to interpret and realize character. A mannerism which Mrs. Kendal has permitted to grow upon her is more conspicuous than it was formerly, and should be checked before it further increases. This is a curious habit of twinkling the eyelids in emotional passages. The twinkles are graduated according to the depth of the emotion to be expressed, and when Amyott, speaking of the hidden man, mentions the word "paramour," the rapidity of the twinkling becomes ludicrously extreme. Perhaps the funniest thing in the drama is Amyott's proceeding when, after energetically exclaiming to his wife "Now we part for ever!" he goes to the door of the room and placidly waits there till the cue comes for his return; but this admission is without detriment to Miss Fanny Brough, whose vivacious and genuinely humorous performance of Maud, Lady Eveline's attendant, is altogether excellent. Full point and effect are neatly and quietly given to every line. Mr. Mackintosh as Sneed, Mr. Lewis Waller as Arden, Mr. Hendrie as Baroque (a French smuggler charged to aid Arden's escape), and Mr. C. Burleigh as Keppel, a page of traditional pertness, all acquit themselves ably, and the scenes, designed and painted by Mr. Harford, deserve the most unqualified praise. The interior and exterior of Sir Walter Amyott's house are models of picturesqueness. We remember nothing of the sort better done, and only regret that so admirable a setting is wasted on so poor a performance.

A FORGOTTEN CRUSADE.

VISITORS to Lisbon always remark upon the Oriental appearance of the people, and upon the number of purely Arabic words in the local nomenclature. It may be a question whether there is any connexion between Morocco and Mogharb, but there can be none as to the meaning of Algarve, "the West," the name of the south-western corner of Portugal. Alcantara is a suburb of Lisbon and a station on the Suez Canal. The Alcaçarias of Lisbon may be compared with Al Ahzar in Cairo. There are numberless common words of pure Arabic still in use, and the wonder is that the whole character of the Portuguese language was not changed by the Moorish occupation of three centuries. Even after Northern Portugal had been rescued from the Moslems, they held on to Lisbon and Algarve. It was not until 1147 that the city was taken from them, and more than forty years elapsed before Sancho I. could add "King of Algarve" to his other titles. It is curious in the East to hear oranges cried in the streets under the name of Bordowan or Bordugan, indicating an Arab tradition that they were first brought from Portugal. The Moors left Portugal reluctantly, and even as late as 1190 the Londoners were concerned in a crusade against them; but the taking of Lisbon in 1147 was, as Bishop Stubbs remarks, the only real success of the second crusade, and it was accomplished, according to Henry of Huntingdon, not by nobles, but by men of middle rank. Fortunately, though the later expedition has been but little noticed, there are ample details of the earlier one. The crusaders consisted of Flemings, Germans, and Englishmen, and set sail from Dartmouth on the 23rd of May, in one hundred and sixty-four vessels. There were contingents from Norfolk and Suffolk under Hervey Glanville, from Kent under Simon of Dover, and from London under a certain Andrew, who may perhaps be identified as an alderman in an early but undated document at St. Paul's. Bishop Stubbs seems to think he was the same as Andrew Bucquinte, or Bocuinte, a merchant of Italian origin living as early as 1115. They sailed across the Bay of Biscay, which did not exhibit its usual aspect, for the fleet was becalmed for two days; nevertheless, they reached the mouth of the Tagus just in time. They had delayed a few days at Oporto; but the Bishop hastened their departure owing to a letter from King Alphonso, when he had preached them a long sermon, which the chronicler, Osbern, gives in full. They attacked Lisbon as soon as they landed, built engines, saw portents, dug mines, and otherwise went through the regular routine of a mediæval siege. Osbern's account is printed in the first volume of Bishop Stubbs's Memorials of Richard I. The Moors capitulated on the 22nd of October. There is an odd episode about the Alcalde's mare, which the German leader coveted; and there are various moral observations as to the greediness of our foreign allies. The Moors were permitted to depart. Gilbert of Hastings, one of the crusaders, was elected Bishop of Lisbon, and everything ended happily, though Osbern does not tell us how the ships got home again. The history of the siege of Lisbon is described also in a letter to Miles, Bishop of Terouanne, written by a crusader named Arnulf; and in another letter by a priest named Duodechin, whose account is nearly the same as Arnulf's. From this it appears that Alphonso gave lands in the neighbourhood to as many as chose to settle in Portugal, and the rest embarked for Palestine. Among the few names of individuals we have those of a certain "Willelmus Vitulus." Bishop Stubbs calls him William Calf; and Mr. Hunt, in his Historic Bristol, says that the Calf family flourished in Bristol in the fourteenth century, so that we may suppose William and Ralf, his brother, or one of them, got safe home. Mr. Hunt prudently abstains from mentioning a priest of Bristol who figures discreditably in the narrative; but he does not disguise the fact that William Calf was neither more nor less than what we should call a filibuster or buccaneer.

If Andrew of London can hardly be identified, there is no doubt as to the leaders of the second of these curious expeditions. In the newly issued volume of the Rolls Series, Chronica Rogeri de Wendover, edited by Mr. Henry G. Hewlett, there is a very full account of the crusade against the Moors in the Algarve province by William FitzOsbert and Geoffrey the Goldsmith in 1190. They suffered much from a storm in the Bay of Biscay, in the same month, apparently, in which their predecessors, half a century before, had been becalmed. But an apparition of St. Thomas of London, "beatus martyr, Thomas Cantuariensis archiepiscopus," comforted them thrice, and when he had vanished the tempest ceased. This expedition passed by Lisbon, "et caput sancti Vincentii," and made for Silves, which Roger describes as an outpost of Christianity in Spain, as it had only been taken from the hands of the pagans in the previous year. The Londoners do not seem to have done much, though they strengthened the forces of Portugal against the emperor "de Maroch"; and, as Bishop Stubbs observes, "saved the infant kingdom." Very soon after we find both William and Geoffrey back in London. The vision of St. Thomas in the Bay of Biscay shed a halo of sanctity about them, and especially about William, who is best known in history by his nickname of "Long Beard." His father, Osbert, had an even more ridiculous name, "Drinkpin," but he was an alderman and became a canon of Aldgate in 1125. William is also sometimes described as an alderman. His subsequent rising and "martyrdom" in 1196 have been too often described to be worth repeating again, though there are some variations in the version given in Mr. Hewlett's volume, such as that William was hanged in chains at Tyburn.

RACING.

THE Great Northamptonshire Stakes did not bring out a very brilliant field, although no horse could be better bred than the winner—Sir W. Throckmorton's Oliver Twist, by Isonomy out of Célérité by Breadalbane. He had not, however, been at all a successful racehorse, and so much was he distrusted that Abu Klea, whom he had run to a head on many pounds worse terms last season, was made the first favourite. Oliver Twist carried the heaviest weight in the handicap and won by half a length from Decision, a four-year-old colt, that had been purchased by Lord Penrhyn for 2,500 guineas last December. The Althorp Park Stakes for two-year-olds produced a dead-heat between Mr. L. de Rothschild's Eros and Mr. W. Burton's Decoit, both of whom had run unsuccessfully at Lincoln. Eros won the deciding heat by half a length, after a severe race.

The Portland Stakes at the Leicester Meeting was the most important two-year-old race that had taken place in the history of the turf. To give some idea of the truth of this, we may observe that the Middle Park Plate, which used to be looked upon as a sort of two-year-old Derby, even in its best days was never worth more than 4,840*l.* (it was only worth 2,235*l.* last year), whereas the Portland Stakes was worth 7,000*l.*, of which 6,000*l.* was given to the winner, 750*l.* to the second, and 250*l.* to the third. Twenty-five horses started, a number which has only once been beaten, or equalled, by a field that has run for any of the twenty-two Middle Park Plates. The race produced a great deal of betting, and the first favourite was Mr. C. Perkins's Chitabob, a splendid-looking chestnut colt, by Robert the Devil out of the Oaks winner, Jenny Howlet. He was reported to have been very highly tried, and only 10 to 3 was laid against him, whereas 8 to 1 was laid against Donovan as well as Spoleta, both of whom had already won races. After a long delay, caused by the fretfulness at the post of some of the party, the favourite jumped off in front of his opponents. When he had run a quarter of a mile, the good-looking Gay Hampton, a colt that had cost 3,000 guineas last year, was beaten, it is said, however, that he got a very bad start. Chitabob held the lead almost as far as the distance, where he was passed by the Duke of Portland's Donovan, the winner of the Brocklesby Stakes at Lincoln. Mr. D. Baird's El Dorado, a remarkably good-looking colt by Sterling that had not done very well in the early part of the race; Mr. A. W. Merry's Your Grace, a promising filly by Galliard that had started at the extreme outside price of 50 to 1; and Baron de Rothschild's Crinière, by Robert the Devil, also passed the favourite inside the distance. Donovan kept in front to the finish without difficulty, and won in grand style by three lengths; El Dorado, Your Grace, and Crinière finishing close together in the above order. The question is, whether Donovan is the sort of colt that is likely to train on and to continue to improve. Some people say not, as they consider him too straight on his forelegs. Be this as it may, he has already won 7,034*l.* in stakes alone in two races, and if he should never win another race he could not be called a failure. It is, of course, extremely doubtful how far any two-year-old form shown so early in the season is to be trusted with regard to future events. Before the day of the Portland Stakes, much was made of the fact that fifteen of the horses entered for it had cost 18,400*l.* as yearlings. It was still more remarkable that of these expensive and presumably super-excellent youngsters only one went to the post, and that he did not finish among the first dozen. It may be worth adding that the first four horses in the race had been bred by their owners.

On any other occasion the Excelsior Breeder's Foal Stakes of 1,000*l.*, that was run for an hour after the Portland Stakes, would have been considered a two-year-old race of high importance. The favourite, "Mr. Abington's" Maynooth, a grand-looking chestnut with a good deal of white about him, in the opinion of some critics was scarcely fit; but odds of 6 to 5 were laid upon him. He seemed to become tired at the finish, and he was beaten a neck by Lord Zetland's colt by Springfield out of Pinta by Adventurer. As Maynooth was giving the winner 3 lbs. there was not very much to choose between the performances of the pair. Most people preferred the appearance of Maynooth; but it was doubted whether he did not show a want of gameness in the final struggle. On the Saturday, the Leicestershire Spring Handicap of 1,000*l.* brought out a field of a dozen, and gave rise to a great deal of gambling. "Mr. Wardour's" Oberon, who had been for some time a strong favourite for the Lincolnshire Handicap, was again made first favourite here; but, as at Lincoln, he went back a little in the betting just at the last, and at the start Lisbon was fractionally the best favourite, while King Monmouth, Bessie, and Tib were all backed at within a point and a half of the odds laid against Oberon. The Duke of Portland's three-year-old colt, Johnny Morgan, got a good start, and kept in the front rank throughout. A quarter of a mile from home he was leading, with Tib and King Monmouth in his wake. As Tib was only giving him 1 lb., instead of the regulation allowance of 23 lbs., for two years, it looked as if he might overhaul him, and King Monmouth had a 10 lbs. advantage over him at weight-for-age. Oberon also held a good place, and so did Kinsky, who was giving a great deal of weight to everything in the handicap, including 12 lbs. more than weight-for-age to Johnny Morgan. Tib was beaten before reaching the stand, and the next to give way was Oberon. There was a gallant struggle for a few yards between Johnny Morgan, King Monmouth, and Kinsky; but the three-year-old had the best of it, and the trio finished in the above order, Johnny Morgan winning by a length from King Monmouth, who was only a head in front of Kinsky, with whom, considering the weight he carried (9 st. 6 lbs.), rested the honours of the race. It will be remembered that he won this handicap a year ago, as well as the Leicestershire Jubilee Cup, of 1,875*l.*, over the same course in July. Excellent, however, as was the form now shown by Kinsky, Johnny Morgan's victory was a highly creditable one, even allowing 12 lbs. for the beating by a length which he gave to Kinsky. Last year he won three races, worth more than 1,200*l.*; but he was then very inferior to Crowberry, Orbit, Ossory, Sandal, Senanus, Acme, and Cardinal Mai; so, unless he has improved immensely on his two-year-old form, which is neither impossible nor improbable, the three-year-olds just mentioned ought to be flyers of exceptional merit. It was the general opinion that he had grown a great deal since the autumn, and it may be that he has a great career before him, for he is by Springfield out of a mare by Scottish Chief, out of Lady Morgan by Thormanby, while his great granddam was descended from Bay Middleton on one side and from Venison on the other. Without wishing to depreciate the merits of his performance in the Leicestershire Handicap, it may be judicious to keep in mind that King Monmouth was unusually fretful and nervous before the race, kicking and sweating in a manner that made it doubtful whether his form on that day could be safely trusted in making calculations for the future.

Three days after Leicester came Epsom. Some of the interest of the Metropolitan Stakes was taken away by the scratching of Humewood, the winner of the Cesarewitch, and several other good horses were put out of court through want of condition. The severe weather of this spring has affected some training grounds far more than others, and at two very large stables the horses are exceedingly backward. Chippeway had lost all the twelve races for which he had ever started, yet on some of his form, such as his second for the Epsom Grand Prize, it looked as if he might some day win a good handicap under a light weight. The Cob was said to be short of condition, but he had won this race last year, and Tissaphernes obtained support on the strength of his easy victory over a field of eighteen at Manchester in November. The horses merely cantered for the first mile and a half, and, when they began to race in earnest in the straight, the Duke of Beaufort's The Cob and Mr. H. T. Barclay's Tissaphernes came away together, the latter winning by three lengths. Like his owner's other Irish horse, Bendigo, Tissaphernes did not run as a two-year-old.

Merry Hampton was made an early favourite for the City and Suburban Handicap. Second, or even third-rate as he might be as a winner of the Derby, it was thought that he was leniently treated at 8 st. 10 lbs., especially on a course which had been proved to be to his liking. Eiridspord was another horse that had won a great race at Epsom, so he also was expected to run well over that course again, although the 11 lbs. which he was now to receive from Merry Hampton would scarcely have put the pair on an equality on either their Derby or St. Leger form. Sir Frederick Johnstone's Candlemas was another competitor that had been successful at Epsom, having, like Eiridspord, won the Grand Prize. Then there was Sir George Chetwynd's Fullerton, in alluding to whom we will merely say that there are some horses which persist in running inconsistently, in defiance of the most strenuous efforts of their owners and trainers. A City and Suburban would be incomplete without the presence of a smart three-year-old, and on this occasion there were one or two which had the reputation of being at least as smart as usual. One of these was the Duke of St. Albans' Galore, a bay colt by Galopin, who could not only boast of having won two good races in grand form last season, but also of a very high private reputation. Another was "Mr. E. Wardour's" Mon Droit, a chestnut filly by Isonomy, that had cost 2,900 guineas, and won five races, worth 2,657*l.* as a two-year-old. Mr. D. Baird's Woodland had won the Electric Stakes of 1,843*l.* last year at Sandown, on which occasion he beat Rêve d'Or. Martley had been third for the Derby, six lengths behind Merry Hampton, and only 7 lbs. were now allowed to bring the pair together, although Martley had never won a race since he was a two-year-old, and had run badly this spring for the Lincolnshire Handicap. He had, however, given Gloriation, the winner of the Cambridgeshire, 7 lbs. and run him to a head in his last race of 1887; and, if he had returned to that form, he might, it was thought, be capable of winning the City and Suburban even under 8 st. 3 lbs. A handicap field that included a winner of a Derby and two winners of the Epsom Grand Prize could not be considered a very poor one, and the fact that these successful horses were now to meet on the scene of their former victories added greatly to the interest of the race.

Merry Hampton's old rival, The Baron, got the best of the start, but the lead was soon taken by Oliver Twist, the winner of the first race noticed in this article, and he held it for the first mile. Then Woodland went up to him, and the pair appeared to be fighting out the race between them at the distance, when Fullerton dashed up, gave them the go-by, and won by a couple of lengths. Abu Klea, who was meeting Oliver Twist on 7 lbs. better terms than at Northampton, made a rush at the finish and got to within half a length of Oliver Twist's head. Merry Hampton, who started first favourite at less than 4 to 1, was never prominent in the race from start to finish.

HISTORY AT THE DEVONSHIRE CLUB.

THE dinner of reconciliation which was given to Mr. Chamberlain at the Devonshire Club on Monday testified to the bitterness of an unhealed quarrel. The speeches of the representatives of the two sections of the Liberal party were marked by extreme civility and an abundant lack of cordiality. The orators on both sides seemed conscious that, if they were not elaborately polite, they would be frankly acrimonious. As an example of the art of skating upon thin ice and of picking one's way between pitfalls on the one side and snares on the other, the speeches were highly ingenious and interesting. Apparently, Mr. Chamberlain's diplomatic success in America, and the contribution which he has made to a good understanding between this country and the United States, have suggested to Lord Granville, or probably have suggested to Mr. Gladstone, of whom politically Lord Granville is the shadow and instrument, the desirability of claiming a share in that success through such share as they may have in Mr. Chamberlain. The member for West Birmingham is alternately denounced and embraced, as suits the tactics of the Separatist leaders. It may be doubted whether the dinner and the speeches which followed it made any real contribution to the union of the two fractions of the Liberal party.

Mr. Childers encouraged himself by falling back upon precedents. "Towards the close of the eighteenth century and the beginning of the nineteenth, he informed his fellow-banqueters, the Liberal party had been divided upon a question as vital as that which now disintegrates it. But permanent reunion speedily followed temporary separation. Mr. Childers's historic views are original, and exhibit a generous independence of facts. He did not base his consolatory conclusion as to the speedy healing of existing differences merely upon Whig precedents. He found grounds for hopefulness in the history of Toryism. Mr. Pitt, as he informed his wondering or credulous listeners, "was separated from his party and connexion for more than three years, between 1801 and 1804, and yet that great breach was healed." Mr. Childers did not inform the Devonians of St. James's Street that Mr. Pitt came into office in 1804, not because the split in the Conservative party was healed, but because the divergence between its different sections had become wider than ever. The letter which he wrote to the King, saying that he could no longer support the Government of Mr. Addington, brought about the fall of that Minister. Mr. Pitt's wish and aim were not to reunite the divided sections of the Tory party, but to form a coalition with the Whigs. He desired to include Fox, Grenville, and their friends in the Cabinet. In the autograph list of his proposed Administration, of which Lord Stanhope has printed a facsimile, the Foreign Office is assigned to Fox. The King's rejection of Mr. Fox's name and the refusal of the other Whig leaders to enter the Government without him defeated this project. At a later period of his second Administration Mr. Pitt made another overture to Fox. Its failure alone led him reluctantly to have recourse to Mr. Addington (now created Lord Sidmouth), whose Parliamentary contingent, in default of the Whig support, which he would have preferred, became indispensable.

The other instance which Mr. Childers has taken of the tendency of the divided sections of political parties speedily to reunite is not more to the point. "In our political party," he says, "you will remember that in 1794, under the advice and influence of Mr. Burke, a large portion of the Whig party separated from Mr. Fox, and carried over the heads of many of the great families, including four or five great statesmen of the time, and adding greatly to the strength of Mr. Pitt's Government. And yet not many years after every one of those great statesmen, with one exception, were members of the Government headed by Mr. Fox, and remained good Liberals to the end." Mr. Childers forgot to remember that the Grenville-Fox Administration was not a duumvirate, but a triumvirate. It was a Grenville-Fox-Sidmouth Administration. Lord Sidmouth and Lord Ellenborough, Tories of the Tories, had seats in the Cabinet. The Government depended for its existence on the forty or fifty votes which Lord Sidmouth commanded in the House of Commons, and when he withdrew from it it fell to pieces. The Fox-Grenville Administration of 1806-1807 was not a purely Liberal Administration. It was essentially a Coalition Government. Even if it had been exclusively Whig, it would not have borne out Mr. Childers's contention that the divisions of the Liberal party which he dates from 1794 were speedily healed. Between 1794 and 1806, as Mr. Childers is arithmetician enough to be able to compute, there were twelve years of Whig separation and exclusion from office. We fear that, if the existing divisions last as long, very few members of the Gladstonian party will live to see the reconciliation to which they look forward.

The fact is that the Whig divisions, which Mr. Childers dates from 1794, had their origin twelve years earlier. They began in 1782, when the Fox Whigs broke off from the Shelburne Whigs; and the disunion of the Liberal party which was then effected, instead of being as shortlived as Mr. Childers alleges, was not healed for nearly half a century, during which time the Whigs remained, with two partial and little more than momentary exceptions, permanently excluded from office. If events had followed their natural course the coalition with Fox, which Pitt made repeated efforts to bring about, would have been accomplished. It was prevented only by an influence which is not now exercised in politics—by the personal intervention of the King. The tendency of opinion and events was not to the reconstruction of the old parties on their original basis, but to a coalition between them, a coalition which was more than once essayed by Lord Wellesley and Lord Moira, and which, after many years, was realized under Mr. Canning. The moral to be drawn from the facts of the case is precisely the opposite of that which Mr. Childers derives from his imperfect and erroneous recital of them. Mr. Fox, as even Mr. Childers, we suppose, must be aware, was by no means the party Puritan which some persons suppose him to be. He was ready to coalesce with anybody for the sake of the Parliamentary strength which an alliance would give him. The seventy or eighty votes which Lord North commanded were the motive of his union with that statesman in 1783, as the forty or fifty votes which Lord Sidmouth disposed of led to his admission into the Cabinet of 1806, of which Fox was the real, though not the ostensible, chief. Possibly if Fox lived now, he would have found the eighty-five Irish votes, which have proved too much for the political virtue of Mr. Gladstone, a temptation too powerful for him to resist. We admit that parallelism, though Mr. Childers does not insist on it. Lord Granville assumed at the Devonshire Club on Monday that the Liberals who follow Lord Hartington and the Liberals who follow Mr. Gladstone are divided only upon one question. If this were so, this one question, involving the unity and integrity of the Empire, would be enough. But the fact is not as Lord Granville represents it to himself. The Parliamentary disunion of Ireland and England, involving, as it does, ultimately the total separation of the two countries, is not the only nor even the main point at issue in what was once the Liberal party. The authority of law and the first principles of morality are in controversy. By open statement or clear implication, or by disingenuous silence, or by timid deprecation which practically grants under the form of weak protest what it ostensibly affects to withhold, Mr. Gladstone and his followers have made themselves parties to the extremest doctrines of French Jacobinism. The condition of things in Ireland now exhibits upon a smaller scale the precise counterpart of the disorder which characterized France nearly a hundred years ago. Rebellious Ireland is revolutionary France looked at through the minifying end of the telescope. Mr. Childers would do well to remember that Fox did not succeed in obtaining in 1806 a few months' tenure of office until he had disavowed the sympathy with French principles and methods which so long excluded him from place; and that the Liberal party gained firm hold of power only when it once more recognized the supremacy of law, and re-adopted constitutional maxims of conduct. When Mr. Gladstone makes a similar retractation, and not until then, may the Liberal split be healed.

DRAMATIC RECORD.

AT the "National" theatre Mr. Augustus Harris, disappointed in his arrangements by the sudden illness of Miss Sophie Eyre, whereby neither She nor Nitocris could be produced, fell back for the holiday season at the last moment on an old success—Messrs. Pettitt and Harris's stirring drama A Run of Luck, which was originally produced in the autumn of 1886. It is perhaps the best constructed and most interesting of the long series of plays of its class which have been represented at Drury Lane of late years. The characters are sketched with vigour, and are less exaggerated than usual. Then it is excellently placed upon the stage. Horses and hounds—and not a few of them, but many—enter largely into its spectacular scheme. Mr. Harris has given us nothing better than the Goodwood scene—the ball-room, the paddock, and the "meets"—in this play. A few changes in the cast call for remark. Miss May Fortescue now plays the heroine, originally created by Miss Alma Murray; and displays, in the stronger scenes especially, a remarkable improvement in her style of acting and in her sincerity of histrionic purpose.

Mr. George Giddens and Mr. T. G. Warren have taken the management of that rather capricious house, the Novelty, in hand, and with apparently a chance of making fortune smile at last upon one of the prettiest and really most commodious theatres in London. They selected, by way of opening novelty, a fair but by no means remarkable translation of François Coppée's charming little piece Le Luthier de Crémone. Mr. Jerome K. Jerome is the adapter, and he has succeeded well enough in rendering into English the graceful and quaint lines of Coppée, but he has failed to catch the true spirit of the piece, and frequently startles us by commonplace expressions. Mr. Giddens has done so much excellent work that one feels loth to condemn him in an ambitious undertaking; but frankly, his Filippo is not interesting. Mr. Dawson is delightfully genial as Ferrari, and contrives with much ability to subdue the over-exuberance of the character as expressed in the translation into harmony with its refined surroundings. Miss Measor as Giannetta was charmingly modest and refined. Nita's First is a lively farce by Mr. Warren, which was produced successfully some years ago at this theatre. It turns mainly upon the adventures of an unhappy baby, who tumbles throughout from pillar to post in an amusing manner, and provokes incessant laughter; for there is nothing that so greatly delights an average audience as a baby which cries or a stray cat upon the stage. Nita's First, however, has other merits, and it is very well acted, notably by Mr. Giddens, Mr. Stewart Dawson, and Miss Kingston.

A little farce, a sort of old-fashioned French vaudeville, with "couplets" and other incidental musical pieces introduced, marked the "opening" night for the holidays at the Prince of Wales' Theatre. It is entitled Warranted Burglar Proof, words by Mr. B. C. Stephenson, and music by Mr. Ivan Caryll and Mr. H. J. Leslie. The plot—which is borrowed from M. Remo's Le Pays des Brouillards, if we mistake not—is not strikingly original, but affords much amusement from the complications which arise from the purchase by a certain nervous gentleman named Beeswing of a famous apparatus warranted to keep out burglars. This trifle is remarkably well acted by Mr. Peachey, Mr. King, Mr. Le Hay, and by the Misses Chapuy, Angarde, and Rayner. The music is pretty and tuneful, but not remarkably original. It is, however, "catchy"—some of the numbers will probably be ground to death ere long on Signor Verdi's mortal enemies, "gli organi di Barbaria"—the street organs.

Mr. Burnand has done nothing better for a long time than his burlesque upon Mrs. Campbell Praed's extraordinary melodrama, Ariane. He has entitled his travestie Airey Annie; and has mercilessly boiled down to one short act the entire intrigue of the Opera Comique's "latest success." That piece, however, is none the less remarkably well satirized in all its details, and not a "point" is missed. The ludicrously improbable plot is satirized with almost malicious adroitness. The strange ethical code in vogue among its dramatis personæ is quizzed with unflagging spirit. The dialogue is bright, although, of course, ephemeral, catching the idiosyncrasies of "the passing show" perfectly with good taste and kindliness, so that the author of the play should be the first to laugh at this graceful exposé of her own absurdities. The acting does full justice to the parody. Miss Alice Atherton's make-up as Chevalier Marius de Valence is uncanny in its realism. She looks so exactly like M. Marius that until she begins to sing the illusion is quite amazing. Equally clever is Miss Margaret Ayrton's capacity for imitating Mrs. Bernard Beere. Her study of this distinguished actress's dress, voice, and gesture is so extraordinary, that in scenes in which she acts with apparent earnestness Mrs. Beere herself seems to be before the spectator. Mr. Willie Edouin is almost as happy in his imitation of Mr. Henry Neville Lomax of "boozing proclivities." Miss Grace Huntley is a double of Miss Laura Linden as Babette; and the "society characters" are quite as diverting, though they have very little to do.

The Alhambra has been entirely redecorated, and was formally reopened on Saturday last, although the elaborate works were conducted so skilfully that the house was not shut for a single night. Mr. Campbell Smith has produced nothing more tasteful yet than the embellishments of this fine theatre. Without interfering at all with its Oriental character, he has introduced a scheme of colour which, even if it is not particularly Asiatic, is, all the same, very fairy-like and elegant. The colour-key is pale blue, shaded to indigo, and relieved with dead gold. The electric light has been effectively arranged everywhere, even in lanterns fitted with prismatical-hued glass. The whole theatre, although it glitters with gold, has an air of repose which is simply charming.

There have been several matinées at various theatres during the past week, but none of merit. Mr. J. F. Nesbitt's play, Dorothy Gray, was a singular instance of incompetence, possessing neither dramatic interest nor literary worth. Its vulgarity was not redeemed even by the conscientious work of the artists who endeavoured to interpret it, and who, from Miss Hawthorne herself to the telegraph boy who had but a line to speak, did their best for the piece, only to be pitied for their pains. Miss Ward, too, appeared in a matinée performance of a play called The Loadstone. We think this really clever actress must wish by this time she had never heard of it. It was only a trifle superior to Dorothy Gray.

THE NEW ENGLISH ART CLUB.

THE exhibition of the New English Art Club at the Dudley Gallery looks more varied in appearance this year. It began as an exposition of the views of a clique; it now tends to express tolerably fully the revival of art in England amongst the younger men. Still it cannot yet be taken to cover the whole field of progress; we miss the names of one or two men who can see justly and paint elegantly or effectively. Whatever eccentricities may surround a movement, it must be judged a healthy one if it causes artists both to pay attention to what they personally see and feel in nature, and to seek to render it on the principles of the broadest and most thorough technique. Some exception may be taken to certain of the subjects and styles of composition in favour here, but no one who knows anything of drawing, modelling, style in brushwork, and atmospheric unity of effect, will deny that a very high level of knowledge and skill is reached by this group of artists. When we think of the false values, feeble niggling, and childish modelling which meet the eye in most galleries, we feel inclined to say that there are no bad pictures at the New English Art Club. It is true, at any rate, that there is no picture which does not show that its author has been trained in that large part of his art which can be learnt as a craft. Most of the canvases show, in addition, some quality or other carried up to the level of really good spontaneous art. Hardly one of these painters, if he caught an inspiration of genius, need feel himself tongue-tied by lack of the means of expression. A cultivated realism is the most common basis of their art. Among its chief principles are fidelity to the large impression of tone made by a whole scene, definition of objects according to their real importance in the ensemble, and the use of technique to enforce the sentiment and complete the unity of feeling. But personal feeling and a gift of original vision are not to be had at command; and this has given rise to certain hypocrisies which hide themselves under the badge of the sincere. One or two pictures in the gallery cover a certain want of sincerity, more or less gracefully, with the technique of a school as with a uniform. It should be said that in most cases this dress is sufficiently elegant to admit of their appearing in good society. In a gallery so good as this one it becomes invidious to pick out a few pictures for special remark. Generally speaking one is glad to pass over the bulk of a show, but here it is with regret that one feels obliged to leave unnoticed many canvases as good as those that are mentioned. We must, therefore, speak only of those which happened to strike us most at a first visit. A quiet style of portraiture, not without breadth and dignity, obtains here. Mr. H. S. Tuke's "Mrs. Fox" (81), by its perfect modelling and its beautiful reserve and sobriety, impresses one gradually, it is true, but in the end more strongly than more showy work. Mr. Walton's "Portrait" (43), also a likeness of a lady, is painted in quiet tone, but with a harmonious dignity of style that reminds one of an old master. Mr. Francis Bate's "Gaslight and Matchlight—Portrait of G. Léon Little, Esq." (11) is less reserved and unaffected; well as it has been rendered, we are not certain that such an out-of-the-way effect of light does not tend to disturb the repose of a portrait. Open-air subjects with figures seem very favourite compositions, and for the most part they are composed naturally and without much ostentation of art. Such are Mr. H. S. Tuke's picture of a boy and girl under an apple-tree, "The Promise" (39); Mr. Fred Brown's "When the setting sun is low" (41); Mr. Alexander Harrison's "Nude Studies" (108 and 113); Mr. Francis Bate's delicate arrangement of light creamy tones, "Idle Gossip" (13); and Mr. J. E. Christie's less realistic but fanciful and charming group, "A Sunny Shower" (57). Mr. Tuke's picture pleases one by the complete absence of parade with which he has conveyed both deep feeling and a wonderful truth of tone and colour. Mr. Fred Brown's effect of light has been sincerely studied, and it is painted without any wish to startle or surprise; as a matter of composition, perhaps the isolated figure on the right might be removed with an advantageous effect of concentration. Mr. Harrison's "Nudes" are very interesting on their own merits of observation and handling, and as showing his method of study for his large "Arcadia" of a previous year. To our mind the oppositions of the masses of colour tell better on this small scale than in the big canvas. Of several interiors with figures none seems to give the shock of fresh truth so vividly as Mr. Norman Garstin's "Iron Master" (103), though the multiplication of stiff objects belonging to the blacksmith's forge interferes with the suavity of the composition. Works from a more eccentric point of view abound, and they are not, as a rule, without discrepancies of style or fact. For instance, Mr. Steer's "Summer's Evening" (74), a coast scene with nude figures, seems to us a much too large and somewhat unintelligent essay in the "impressionisme" of Claude Monet. The sky and the distance are not truthfully enveloped in air, and the colours in these large quantities fail to produce the illusion of light. Mr. Raven-Hill, in "Combat with the Bear, Ancient Britain" (32), goes no further in the way of imagination than placing well-drawn figures in a clever, realistic, ordinary landscape. He has even felt no pangs of conscience in introducing a pollarded tree. Mr. Whistler's "White Note" (98) cannot with justice be called eccentric. He has attained so admirable a style and so ravishing a quality of paint that one cannot help regretting that any careless touches should anywhere suggest false drawing or modelling in what would otherwise have been a complete work of the highest art. The landscapes are numerous, and most of them excellent. Careful attention is due to Mr. Walton's really noble study in water-colour of a tree against the sky, "Landscape" (49), a work eminently original, and yet treated with all the grandeur of the fine schools of France and Holland; to the rolling sky and truly aerial envelopment of Mr. James Paterson's "Happy Valley" (30); to the low, luminous tone, soft, wavy, well-massed reeds, and exquisite sentiment of Mr. W. J. Laidlay's "Duck-shooting on the Broads" (102); to the rich, velvety, yet perfectly true colouring of Mr. Charles's freely painted and unaffected canvas, "The Lost Cap" (34), and to the conscientious but somewhat grim realism of Mr. A. Mann's carefully finished "By the Findhorn" (121). Mr. Aubrey Hunt's "Evening on the Marne" (69) is a charming effect daintily handled, and Mr. G. D. Curtis's "November Day" (78), a little gem of grey colour and suggestive workmanship. Mr. Peppercorn gets a refined and decorative quality of colour in "Afternoon" (71), and Mr. T. F. Goodall's "Return of Spring" would admirably recall the sad tranquillity of nature but for the foreground, lily-pads, reeds, water, which hardly equal the rest of the picture. Messrs. Percy Belgrave, G. Clausen, H. Simpson, F. W. Jackson, and others send good open-air work. Amongst contributors of figure-work of various sorts, whose merits or whose reputations entitle them to consideration, are Messrs. Degas, Hubert Vos, Stanhope Forbes, T. Roussel, J. E. Blanche, and F. Bramley.

THE DISCUSSION ON THE BUDGET.

ALTHOUGH Mr. Gladstone on Monday evening reserved his freedom of judgment respecting the new taxes, he expressed approval of several parts of the Budget, and his approval is more significant than his reservation. The other speeches, with the exception of Mr. Goschen's two replies, are hardly deserving of notice. There were, of course, the inevitable grumblings in regard to the new taxes; but members generally felt with Mr. Gladstone that it is premature to criticize these until the Bill imposing them is before the House. There were also the usual taunts that the Budget is a rich man's Budget, favouring property at the expense of labour. But to this taunt the Chancellor of the Exchequer's answer was complete. It is true, of course, that the Income-tax is not paid by the great bulk of the working classes; but it falls heavily upon the lower middle class, and very heavily indeed upon the professional class. A reduction of a penny in the pound in the Income-tax is, therefore, a very material advantage to classes quite as deserving of consideration as any in the community. And the relief given to ratepayers is also a relief given to struggling classes. It was argued by some, indeed, that the relief would go entirely to the owners of property; but, as the Chancellor of the Exchequer pointed out, if the relief will go entirely to the owners of property, then it follows that the owners of property pay the whole of the enormous amount of the rates, and it can hardly be contended that upon one small class, the owners of property, the whole burden of the rates should fall. But we return to Mr. Gladstone's speech, the only one really deserving of consideration. Apart from the new taxes, as to which he reserved his freedom of judgment, there were three points, respecting which much interest was felt as to the views Mr. Gladstone would take; the transference of half the Probate-duty to the local authorities, the reduction of the Income-tax without a corresponding relief to the general consumer, and the raising of the Succession-duty. By all his antecedents Mr. Gladstone was bound to approve of the getting rid of grants in aid. They take away the one great check upon the extravagance of public bodies of all kinds—namely, the necessity of themselves finding the money which they spend, for the grants in aid have to be found by Parliament while they are spent by the local authorities. Moreover, the grants in aid appear twice in the national expenditure—first in the Imperial Budget, and secondly in the Local Budget, and thus seem to make the expenditure larger than it really is. This, of course, is a mere matter of bookkeeping; but good bookkeeping is of the essence of good finance. And, lastly, the grants in aid were admittedly made only as temporary arrangements pending the reform of our local administration. For all these reasons Mr. Gladstone was bound to approve of the withdrawal of the grants in aid. He was also bound to approve the relief to the rates by a contribution from personalty. Parliament after Parliament has affirmed that personal property ought to contribute to the rates, and in the face of such affirmations Mr. Gladstone had no option but to approve of the action of the Government. Still, it was open to him to object to the transference of half the Probate-duty; and, in truth, a very respectable argument could be advanced in support of the objection. For it might be urged that the transference continues in another form the grants in aid. The Probate-duty must continue to be imposed by Parliament, for it would never do to have one rate of duty in one part of the country and another rate in another. And the Probate-duty must also be collected by the Imperial authorities. Yet half the duty will be spent by the local authorities. Nevertheless, Mr. Gladstone emphatically approved of the transference; conclusive evidence of the difficulty of finding any other means of satisfying the demand for a contribution from personalty in aid of rates. Since the two greatest financial authorities in the House of Commons are thus at one upon the point we may assume that this portion of the Budget will be carried without serious opposition.

Mr. Gladstone, again, was bound by his antecedents to approve of the reduction of the Income-tax. In principle the tax itself has been strongly condemned by him; indeed, he proposed to get rid of it altogether. And it is admitted by all parties that the tax should in ordinary times be kept at a low rate. Recently, however, it has been at a very high rate; and, as we have just been pointing out, it falls with exceptional severity upon professional men. Although their incomes depend upon their lives, and in the majority of cases, indeed, upon their health, they have yet to pay the full rate of the tax upon their whole incomes, just as the owners of property do whose incomes live after them. It is manifestly unfair that a tax so anomalous in many respects, so severely felt by struggling tradesmen and the professional classes, and necessitating inquisitorial powers, should be maintained at a higher rate than is imperatively necessary. Therefore it could safely be predicted beforehand that Mr. Gladstone would not venture to oppose the reduction of the Income-tax. But hitherto he has argued that the relief to the Income-tax payers ought to be accompanied by a relief to the general consumer, and there was much curiosity felt as to whether he would oppose the Budget on the ground that the general consumer is not now benefited. He did not venture, however, to take up an actually hostile position, though he intimated some dissatisfaction that the interests of the general consumer have not been consulted. We venture to think, however, that in this matter the action of Mr. Goschen is to be preferred to the theory of Mr. Gladstone. The Income-tax was imposed by Sir Robert Peel for the express purpose of enabling him to reform our fiscal system. That reform has consisted in relieving the general consumer from burdens that were unduly oppressive, and in also relieving industry. The reform is practically now complete. There are, of course, many points that yet need adjustment; but, so far as the general consumer is concerned, he has exceedingly little to complain of. Duties have been taken off all but a very few articles of general consumption, and many even of these are luxuries rather than necessaries. On the necessaries of life taxation is light. There is really, therefore, no just claim on the part of the general consumer for relief; while, as we have just been pointing out above, the Income-tax payer has a very just and a very strong claim. He has borne the expense of all the relief that has been given to the general consumer for nearly half a century; and yet in too many instances he is as ill able to bear the burden as the general consumer himself. The Chancellor of the Exchequer retorted that the general consumer is, in fact, relieved by his Budget, since a very large measure of relief is given to the ratepayers, and the ratepayers comprise all householders. The answer is ingenious, but it is not quite satisfactory. Compound householders—that is to say, the very poorest classes of householders—do not pay rates, and neither do lodgers. The real defence for Mr. Goschen's Budget is that the time has come when Local Government reform must be attempted; that Local Government reform makes necessary a readjustment of Imperial and local taxation; that the surplus at Mr. Goschen's disposal does not permit a reduction of the Income-tax and a relief to ratepayers, together with a remission of taxation in favour of the general consumer, and that the Income-tax payer has a better claim to relief than the general consumer.

The greater part of Mr. Gladstone's speech, however, was devoted to the question of the equalization of the Succession and Probate duties. It will be in the recollection of our readers that the Chancellor of the Exchequer proposes to hand over half the Probate-duty to the local authorities. At present the Probate-duty amounts to 3 per cent. There will remain, therefore, only 1½ per cent. payable to the Imperial Exchequer. As half the Probate-duty is transferred to the local authorities so as to equalize the burden of the rates upon real and personal property, so the Chancellor of the Exchequer proposes to equalize the contributions from real and personal property to the Imperial Exchequer by raising the Succession-duty from 1 to 1½ per cent. Both the Probate-duty and the Succession-duty, so far as Imperial taxation is concerned, will, therefore, in future pay 1½ per cent. Mr. Gladstone, however, argues that the equalization thus attempted is not real. In the first place, he points out that the Probate-duty is levied on the full value of the legacy, whereas the Succession-duty is levied only upon the capitalized value of the life interest inherited—a very different thing, undoubtedly. If, for example, an old man inherits an estate his life interest is necessarily small, and yet it is only upon the capitalized value of that life interest that the Succession-duty is paid. Further, Mr. Goschen proposes, while raising the Succession-duty 50 per cent., to extend from four years to eight years the time within which the duty may be paid. On this Mr. Gladstone observes—firstly, that the Probate-duty has to be paid at once, and that an immediate payment is much more onerous than one extended over eight years, even if the total amounts in both cases were the same; and, secondly, he objects that, if the person liable to Succession-duty dies before the whole duty is paid, the balance unpaid is wiped out; that even during the four years which are now allowed for payment deaths of inheritors are frequent, and that they will be much more frequent when the period of grace is extended to eight years, and that consequently the loss to the Imperial Exchequer will be considerable. He gives notice, therefore, that, when the taxing Bill comes up for discussion, he will bring forward a counter proposal for really equalizing the Succession and the Probate duties. Mr. Goschen was cautious in his reply, allowing it to be seen that to a very large extent he agrees in principle with Mr. Gladstone, although just at present he is not prepared to carry out Mr. Gladstone's views. Those views have often been expressed before, and all parties have practically adopted them. The late Lord Iddesleigh, while Chancellor of the Exchequer, made a very considerable change in the Death-duties, and it is understood that Mr. Goschen is in favour of a much more sweeping change. But a Minister can do only a certain amount of work in a given time. This year the Chancellor of the Exchequer has had to prepare and carry through his Conversion scheme. He has not, therefore, been able to elaborate with the necessary care a plan for a satisfactory reform of the Death-duties. But doubtless the reform is only postponed. Meantime he argues that the equalization of the two duties is more complete than Mr. Gladstone admits, and he vouchsafed to the House the interesting piece of information that the average number of years for which Succession-duty is paid is 13½. This undoubtedly would seem to show that deaths do not take place so frequently as Mr. Gladstone seems to believe. And, further, the Chancellor of the Exchequer successfully defended the extension of time for paying Succession-duty by pointing out that land cannot be readily sold like personal property. He might have added that a part of an estate sometimes cannot be sold at all. It is evident, however, from Mr. Gladstone's speech that he intends to wage upon the Death-duties the main battle concerning the Budget. Respecting the new taxes he has not yet made up his mind. He is not quite sure whether the country generally is for or against them. But upon the Death-duties his views are distinct and strong. On them, therefore, he will take issue with the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

CRYSTAL PALACE CONCERTS.

LAST Saturday at the Crystal Palace Weber's introduction to Oberon was beautifully played, especially the "Adagio sostenuto." The splendid orchestra of the Crystal Palace fully justified their reputation by a most delicate rendering of the instrumental colouring which throws an air of romantic mystery over this opening section of the Overture. One seldom hears horns sounded with this smooth evenness, this mellow quality of tone. Effective as was the general feeling of agitation impressed on the "Allegro con fuoco," an occasional indistinctness of detail and a want of nervous force here and there made it a less wonderful performance than the "Adagio." Mr. Dvorák's Symphony No. 3, in F Major, though lately published, was composed in 1875—that is to say, before the two we have already heard. It is said with truth in the programme that this work belongs to Dvorák's "transitional period from the natural and national to the classical," that "in the first two movements we find the Bohemian musician Germanized and working in classical forms," and that in the third he gives us "an extended Slavonic dance-movement," while in the "Finale" his "fancy" is "unrestrained" by the "trammels" of the classic. Still, the ordinary concert-goer, if not of the "advanced" creed in art, must expect to find in this Symphony none of the clearness and serene dignity of the real classic, and, it is fair to add, none of the formal and colourless dulness of an imitation. It is only by comparison that the first two movements seem classic, and then in the lines of their structure rather than in their spirit. Mr. Dvorák has used, perhaps at times abused, every resource of orchestration before the Symphony is finished. At the very outset, however, he deals in lively rhythms and original melody; the instrumentation of the second movement is an improvement upon that of the first in picturesqueness and unity of idea. The third movement is built on tunes of marked character, and is very direct and unmistakable in its aims and intentions. All ornamentation or development tells; and there is no waste of sentiment or effect. The last division may be a little long, but it teems with noise, strangeness, and riotous abandonment to orchestral colour. The performance, as far as one could judge of the interpretation on a first hearing, did full justice to the work.

Spohr's name again appeared on the programme; but his Concerto No. 7 for Violin in E Minor did not seem so dull as the "Power of Sound" last Saturday. Its solo interest, and the fact of its not being under the shadow of Beethoven, as that Symphony was, decidedly told in its favour. In itself, too, it is unquestionably light and graceful music, occasionally showy, but well suited to the instrument which, by the way, Herr Hans Wessely handled to excellent purpose. The sentimental sorts of melody which abound in the work the soloist played with feeling and good technique. In a few of the more jerky passages, had he played in broader style, he might have lessened the poverty of the effect. The second movement, an Adagio, is the most pathetic; the Final Rondo the most sparkling and brilliant. On the whole, however, Herr Wessely's best achievement was his beautiful rendering of Wieniawski's Fantasia for Violin and Orchestra on airs from Faust. Here he displayed to the full his tenderness of touch and his apt and pathetic turn of phrasing. The singer was Mme. Valleria, and she gave Wagner's air "Elsa's Dream" from Lohengrin, Mendelssohn's "Winterlied," and Schumann's "Widmung" in her usual style. The concert was brought to a close by a fine rendering of Wagner's Overture to Tannhäuser.

THE SUMMONS TO RISE.

O MEET me by moonlight alone,
Since our meetings by day are proclaimed,
And by day every movement is known,
And the place of our rendezvous named.
But what though the day we must yield
To our tyrants? The night is our own;
We are sure to be first in the field
If you meet me by moonlight alone.

Soft wrapped in embraces of sleep
When the Rile Irish Constable lies,
And the dews of forgetfulness steep
The removable magistrate's eyes;
O! 'tis then that contempt of the law
May with singular safety be shown,
For they can't say you hold it in awe
If you meet me by moonlight alone.

I have tried circumventing the foe
More than once when the sun was on high;
But I own I have found it no go,
And I think it is useless to try.
To go racing about in a car,
To be jolted, perhaps to be thrown,
Is absurd; it were better by far
That you met me by moonlight alone.

In the morn, at three-thirty or so,
See the patriot ready to start.
'Tis a frost; but his breast is aglow
With the warmth of his patriot heart.
There is rime on his whiskers and hair,
And his feet are as cold as a stone;
But no matter; he's bound to be there,
For a meeting by moonlight alone.

O! divine is the spirit that routs
Up a hero betimes from his bed;
And sublime the devotion that flouts
Such a risk of a cold in the head.
Sure, freedom must spring as the crop
Where the seeds of such valour are sown;
And no perils are likely to stop
One who meets you by moonlight alone.

It is true that your numbers are scant;
And it happens too often, I fear,
That I'm rather too sleepy to rant,
And that you are too drowsy to hear.
But, although you don't know what I say,
You can cheer and give B-lf-r a groan
In the dark just as well as by day,
If you meet me by moonlight alone.

Awake, then, ere daylight is here,
And the foes of our nation surprise,
Who are wont at the Irish to sneer
As a people unable to "rise."
We shall hear such derision no more,
They'll perhaps take a different tone
If you're ready to get up at four
And to meet me by moonlight alone.

REVIEWS.

THE first remark we wish to make about this book is that it is beautifully got up; the paper is excellent, the type is large and clear, and it is profusely, brilliantly, and amusingly illustrated. It is just the sort of thing to put into a friend's hands if one has to keep him waiting, and it is equally suited to a drawing-room and a smoking-room. Yet, with all its virtues, it is a difficult book for an Englishman to review fairly, as the style of horsemanship extolled by the author is not popular in this country. We may be wrong in our ideas on the subject, and the happy day may at length arrive when an Englishman will consider it a compliment to be told that he rides like a Frenchman; but it is not as yet. On the other hand, Baron de Vaux, while he thinks it all very well to recognize their qualities, is "bien loin d'accorder aux Anglais une supériorité qu'ils n'ont pas." He may be right; we may be wrong. In any case, we gladly record the fact that he has produced a very readable book.

M. de Vaux divides all horsemen worthy of the name into two classes—the followers of M. Baucher and the followers of Le Comte d'Aure. These illustrious founders of the rival schools of French horsemanship he calls "Les deux grands maîtres." Those who belong to the school of Baucher he calls Bauchéristes; Auristes is rather an awkward word, but he uses it at least once.

* Les Hommes de Cheval, [illegible] siècle. Par Baron de Vaux. Paris: J. Rothschild. 1888.

Having divided the world—that is to say, the horsey world—into Baucherists and Aurists, he goes on to say that "C'est très curieux, mais chaque fois que je rencontre un homme de cheval de quelque valeur, je suis sûr que j'ai devant moi un baucheriste." Was Fred Archer a Baucherist? Surely, he was a horseman of some value! The question of the rival merits of the Comte d'Aure and M. Baucher recurs again and again, from one end of the book to the other. To an English reader this is a little wearisome, nor is he fitted to express a definite opinion on the subject, for neither of these great masters of equitation rode in a style that recommended itself to British tastes, although no one could have denied that both were fine horsemen in their own way. It would be irrelevant, in reviewing the Baron de Vaux's beautiful book, to point out the advantages of the English style of riding, difficult as it may be to resist the temptation. It is undoubtedly a fault in Englishmen to imagine that they can learn nothing about horses or horsemanship from foreigners, and while we cannot agree with Baron de Vaux in his excessive admiration of the style of Baucher, we candidly admit that there is a great deal of what may be described as "untidy riding" in Rotten Row, and that many of the riders might be none the worse for a little Baucherism. Indeed, we are inclined to think that the ordinary Englishman's pride at never having had a lesson from a riding-master is carried a little too far. It seems that there are not only Baucherists, but Baucherized horses. We infer from what the Baron de Vaux tells us that even a certain celebrated French horseman sneers at the latter, avowing, moreover, "que les chevaux baucherisés sont incapables de franchir le moindre obstacle." After all, it seems that one of the greatest living exponents of Baucherism is an Englishman—Mr. Mackenzie-Grieves. "Je suis certain," says Baron de Vaux, "que, s'il n'était Mackenzie, il voudrait être Baucher," and Baron d'Etreillis, in his book on horsemanship, speaks of him as "l'homme de cheval le plus remarquable de notre époque." Baron de Vaux, again, says, "Je l'ai vu faire exécuter à Billy, un cheval rouan, qui lui fut acheté par la duchesse de Fitz-James, une de nos horsewomen les plus célèbres, des figures de manège d'une et de deux pistes, en changeant de pied à chaque foulée de galop et où son immobilité était tellement grande qu'il se faisait presque oublier." Surely this is something to make every John Bull glow with pride! Yet it is possible even for a French horseman to exist and to be esteemed without being a Baucherist. Le Duc d'Aumale, "qui occupe une des premières places dans le monde équestre," is not a "partisan de la méthode Baucher." Indeed, it is even hinted that, in his heart of hearts, he looks upon that hero of heroes as a "saltimbanque." Nevertheless, "par respect pour le talent de ce maître des maîtres, le duc d'Aumale, lorsqu'on l'interroge sur cette méthode, vous répond qu'il ne se trouve pas assez compétent pour en juger." It is awe-inspiring to read of the Duke's hunting "dans le Worcestershire," "une contrée difficile, hérissée d'obstacles sérieux," in which "pour 'rester aux chiens' il fallait de rudes sauteurs." "Il y chassait, avec les princes ses frères et ses neveux, tous les deux ou trois jours, tantôt le lièvre, tantôt le renard."

Les Hommes de Cheval is, to all intents and purposes, a portrait gallery of horsemen. We have not time to take our readers through it, nor would many of the celebrities therein portrayed be known to the average Englishman. "Ce serait difficile," says the author, "du reste de handicaper des hommes de cheval comme ceux dont je vais parler." But he does his best, and his little biographies are bright, clear, concise, and entertaining. All kinds of riders are described, from a perfect Baucherist who used fearlessly to entrust himself to a "cheval entier de Tarbes, méchant et mordant, n'était monté que muselé," to a horseman who "laissait flotter les rênes" in a manner that might well make Baucher rise from his grave. One of the characters depicted is a perfect sportsman. Here is the definition of a perfect sportsman:—"Un écuyer remarquable, il n'est pas moins brillant cocher. Il a fait des armes avec distinction. C'est en un mot un parfait sportsman." There is another who is "dans le monde un des sportsmen et des gentlemen les plus accomplis." The account of the Duc de la Rochefoucauld-Bisaccia is quite alarming:—"Sa magnifique prestance, son allure dégagée et son grand air décèlent tout de suite un de ces hommes de race, devant lesquels on ne demande pas mieux que de s'incliner." In many of these personal descriptions there is a considerable quantity of what Englishmen are wont to call "butter," and about the most serious fault that is found with any of the characters is that they are not Baucherists. We are told that a certain French horseman of exceeding brilliancy was ordered, during the last years of the Empire, to study riding in all the schools of Europe. Accordingly he visited successively Wurtemberg, Austria, Prussia, Hanover, and Russia—but not England! We do not complain; we merely note the fact. One of the greatest virtues, again, of another famous rider is the following:—"L'équitation anglaise, quoique ayant sa raison d'être, ses principes et ses règles parfaitement définies, n'a jamais séduit le marquis de Talleyrand." In the section comprising Les Steeplechasers, we should like to have found a few more subjects; but, on the whole, the selection of names in each division is a good one. Not the least interesting portion of the work is the Introduction by Lieutenant-Colonel Guérin, every word of which is worth reading. He is in favour of carrying the system of riding-schools to an extreme point; but many of his suggestions are admirable. If he could have his way, France would indeed become a nation of horsemen.

It is time now that we looked at the pictures. Of portraits and illustrations of one kind or another there are no less than one hundred and sixty, by more than forty artists, from the Princess Terka Jablonowska downwards, and exceedingly clever many of them are. Before looking at any of the others, everybody will, of course, feast his eyes upon the portraits of the Comte d'Aure and M. Baucher. Our eye dwells with greater pleasure on the portrait of a nobleman who, we are told, fails to see the merits of Baucherism; if, however, we had been dressing him for his sitting, we should not have put him into a frock-coat and butcher-boots, as we own to an insular prejudice against that combination. There is a picture of another man, who looks a capital fellow—un sportsman et gentleman, in fact—in full hunting costume, topped by a white hat with a black band round it. We do not wear white hats with black bands round them out hunting in England, but that is no reason why people should not do so in France, and the sportsman in question looks very happy as he gallops among the branches of a fallen tree after a pug-faced hound. There is another edifying hunting picture, which represents a number of red-coated men, with great horns, mobbing a stag to death in a cover. This, of course, is quite right, according to French ideas; and, if it is worth mobbing at all, it is worth mobbing well, as these gentlemen are evidently doing. A lady in a scarlet body, a white skirt, and a white hat, riding a grey horse, adds lustre to the scene. A small sketch of a battery of Horse Artillery coming at a gallop towards the spectator, although rather indistinct, is, in our opinion, one of the most spirited illustrations in the book. Let not the reader fail to notice the red and yellow horse, jumping a low rail, on the illustrated title-page. His fireworklike tail is a thing, once seen, not to be forgotten. Several of the smaller illustrations represent a French manner of horse-breaking which is repugnant to our notions. The horse is placed between two strong upright posts, which are sometimes padded. From the upper parts of these posts hang a pair of pillar-reins, which are fastened to the horse's bridle on either side, so that he is obliged to hold his head high. The horse-breaker then approaches him on the near side, with a straight cutting-whip in his left hand and a long driving-whip in his right. With the long whip he drives him up to his bridle so as to make him arch his neck and gather his haunches under him, while with the short whip he teases his fore-legs, until he raises them as high as French taste requires—a considerable elevation. Sometimes the horse-breaker mounts the horse when he is on the pillar-rein, and pursues the same teasing tactics. Very possibly the horse may begin to kick; but he soon becomes tired of that, and then there is nothing left for him to do, but to squat with his quarters, arch his neck, and begin the eternal dancing up and down with his fore-legs. One of the most engaging pictures in the book, to our mind, is that of an officer in uniform, without a sword, but with a hunting-crop, making a promenade à cheval on a high-stepping grey pony, a short pipe in his mouth and his lap-dog by his side. We think that most of our fellow-countrymen will agree with us in considering the horses represented in the portraits, as a rule, a coarse, underbred lot. The shoulders of many of them are deplorable, and the loins and quarters of others are even worse. The pasterns, again, of not a few are absolutely shocking. But let the merits and demerits of English and French horses and horsemanship be what they may, there can be no doubt that the two styles exist, and a good treatise on either deserves its due share of praise. One thing, we believe, we may safely say, which is, that the majority of Englishmen who read Les Hommes de Cheval will learn many things about French horsemen and horsemanship that they did not know before; and we may add that they will have these things brought to their knowledge in a pleasant way. It is interesting to observe that, while certain Englishmen would like to see our Royal Commissioners recommending the British Government to establish an Imperial haras in this country, a well-known French horseman opposes the system in France, on the ground that it has not been adopted in England, the country which produces the best horses in the world. Altogether Les Hommes de Cheval is a remarkable book, and one that can hardly fail to be popular both in France and in England.

NOVELS.*

THE thanks of all lovers of a good novel are due to Mrs. Hegan Kennard for introducing to them Herr Maurus Jokai, an author who has been too long practically unknown to us. If, among the many works which have given to this Hungarian writer his high reputation in his own country, there are others as picturesque and powerful as Timar's Two Worlds, let Mrs. Hegan Kennard lose no time in placing them in the hands of English readers; for it is long since we have met with a story so vigorous in its action, so full of human sympathy, of strength and pathos, as this romance of Central Europe. On an ownerless island in the Danube, formed by the force of the stream and increased by alluvial deposits, which is to be traced on no map and belongs to no country, the widowed Therese and her daughter Noémi have found refuge from a ruined home and grasping creditors. Their life is one of primeval simplicity; their fruits, herbs, honey, and flocks they barter with the few who land on their shores. To this retreat Timar, the captain of a vessel laden with grain which has narrowly escaped the dangers of the Iron Gate and the pursuit of a Turkish gunboat, brings his two passengers, Ali Tschorbadschi the owner of the cargo, and his daughter Timéa. Here too comes Theodor Krisstyan, who holds in his hand the fortunes both of the widow and of Tschorbadschi; for he is a spy of the Turkish Government, who at a word from him will claim the ownerless isle as the territory of the Sultan, and will demand the extradition of the fugitives on the charge of robbing the treasury. Sooner than fall into his enemies' hands the wretched Ali commits suicide; the cargo, his property, sunk in the river by the wreck of the ship, is sold to Timar as damaged grain, and proves to contain immense treasure in jewels and specie. Timar employs his wealth boldly, skilfully, successfully; all he touches turns to gold; he is beloved by the poor for his munificent charities, ennobled by the Government; but his conscience will not let him rest. Pity for her forlorn condition (a dependent among strangers, who treat her vilely) and a desire to repair the wrong he has done her prompt him to marry Timéa; but no happiness attends their union. Timéa accepts his hand from gratitude, not from love; for her heart is given to another, and Timar finds too late that he is wedded to "a marble statue." Maddened by his loveless home, he flies to the ownerless island and to Noémi; and thenceforth Timar has two worlds "his spirit lived in two places, was torn in two parts; there his money, his honour, his position in the world; here his love held him fast."

And so, while to Timéa his wife, to Noémi the mother of his child, and to all the world he is the great patriot, the true Christian, the exemplary husband, the father of the poor, guardian of the orphan, supporter of schools, a pillar of the Church, what is he to himself?

Timar had succeeded in robbing every one. From Timea he stole first her father's million, then the manly ideal of her heart, and kept for himself her wifely troth. From Noémi he stole her loving heart, her womanly tenderness, her whole being. Therese he robbed of her trust, the last belief of her misanthropic mind in the possible goodness of a man. . . The respect shown to him by the world, the tears of the poor, the thanks of the orphan, the decorations bestowed by his King, were they not all thefts? . . . And everything succeeded with him. How long would he go unpunished? He could deceive every one but himself. He was always sad, even when he outwardly smiled. He knew what he ought to be called, and would gladly have shown himself in his true character. But that was impossible. The boundless, universal respect—the rapturous love—if only one of these were due to his true self! Honour, humanity, self-sacrifice were the original principles of his character, the atmosphere of his being. Unheard-of temptations had drawn him in the opposite direction; and now he was a man whom every one loved, honoured, and respected, and who was only hated and despised by himself.

Such, in the author's words, is the powerfully drawn character around whom centres the interest of this remarkable story. It would be unfair to mar the pleasure of those who will read it by revealing its conclusion. The perilous adventures of the ship in the passage of the Iron Gate, the Arcadian simplicity of the peaceful life on the ownerless island, the touching and beautiful episode of the baby "Dodi," are among the pleasant memories with which we regretfully close this delightful book, in the hope that we may soon meet again both with author and translator.

Mrs. Parr has done well to lay the scene of Loyalty George in the neighbourhood of Plymouth, for she evidently knows the local country thoroughly; her descriptions of its scenery are excellently done, and her reproduction of its dialect in the mouths of her characters is accurate and humorous, without becoming tedious. Besides she has a good story to tell, and she tells it well. We may take exception to the unnecessarily mournful nature of the conclusion of this book, and to the conventionality both of the details of the catastrophe and of the events which lead up to it; but, that said, the task of fault-finding is over; and, on the other hand, there is much in Mrs. Parr's work which demands the warmest praise. The characters are firmly and distinctly drawn, the action fairly lively, and the interest well sustained. Loyalty herself (with her natural nobility of heart—which she owes to the strain of gentle blood in her veins—fighting against and eventually, under the refining influence of her love, triumphing over the roughness of her surroundings and the squalor of her home) is a very charming heroine, and her sailor lover is a particularly lifelike creation in whom good and bad are admirably and most naturally blended. Of the minor characters, Dunchy the deaf boatman, Loyalty's steadfast ally, is perhaps the best drawn, and certainly is the most amusing, but we have also pleasant recollections of Mrs. Coode the worshipper of respectability, of the [illegible] old Rowe and his daughter, of those terrible old women "[illegible]" and "Aunt Tishy," and others who people the pages of Mrs. Parr's pleasant tale.

[illegible] is a story of country life, in which the duties of a wife and mother are expounded in a quiet, inoffensive, if unnecessarily didactic, style. Whatever may be the faults of the bride whose fortunes it narrates, she is at any rate not unduly inquisitive; for, instead of asking her husband, either before marriage or during the honeymoon any questions as to his house, establishment, or manner of life, she has, we are told, "indulged in various imaginary accounts of her new home and surroundings, till, by constant repetition, she had come to believe them." By thus evolving her husband's circumstances out of her own inner consciousness, instead of making a few not unnatural inquiries, she subjects herself on reaching home to a good deal of disappointment. There is "no pretty pony-carriage driven by a liveried servant" at the station, no "handsome brass bedstead" or "Queen Anne tables" in her bedroom. Then her husband shocks her susceptibilities by getting up very early, dining in the middle of the day, selling his mutton to his neighbours, and wearing "an old suit of dittos, concluded by brown leather gaiters and big hob-nailed boots." As he is a farmer, it is not easy to see what else his wife could have expected. She is however deeply distressed at these evidences of barbarism, and endeavours (though with no success) to introduce beneath her roof the manners and customs of what she is pleased to call "gentlefolks." Moreover she makes undesirable friendships, neglects her housekeeping, and later on her baby. In the end of course this is all changed. Her husband and his godmother, an elderly lady of exemplary but somewhat self-complacent piety, are ever at hand to advise and to reprove, and we part from the ignorant bride a pattern and model of all that wife and mother should be. The story is little more than a means of conveying the author's views on the great question "how to be happy though married," but it is pleasantly told, its characters are clearly and consistently drawn, and it should not lack readers among those who do not object to a work of fiction combining instruction and amusement in the proportion of nine parts of the former to one of the latter.

It is to be hoped that the characters Mr. Paul Lafargue depicts in The New Judgment of Paris are drawn from imagination, not from experience. His hero is an irritating prig, an artist with "clear, amber-coloured eyes" and "a well-pruned moustache." His pictures are of course works of transcendent genius, but he will neither exhibit nor sell them. He objects to exhibiting on sentimental grounds. "For one reason," he says, "I am too lazy; for another, I dread the critics, especially the modern numskull. But my ground-motive, as the Germans say, is that I loathe anything that smacks of advertising." His objection to selling his pictures is more practical, and consists of a deference to the prejudices of an aunt on whom he is dependent, and who (considering that she is the Mother Superior of a sisterhood of nurses) holds singular views regarding the dignity of labour. "I would sooner," she says, "Ambrose never painted again than see him haggling with people like a shopman. I say nothing of the dignity of the artist. Ambrose will tell you about that. All I am anxious to preserve is the dignity of the gentleman." Nor is Mr. Lafargue any happier in his choice of a heroine—a selfish, worldly young woman who engages herself to our friend the painter solely because she regards him as a good investment socially and financially, and who jilts him without hesitation or remorse when his aunt cuts off the supplies—in doing which, by the way, the Mother Superior deliberately breaks a promise most solemnly given to her father on his death-bed. Mr. Lafargue's style matches his matter. A telegram is transformed by this master of the dictionary into "one of those orange-coloured missives which are as mosquito-trumpetings to dreamy life"; and when one of his characters unexpectedly receives good news, we read that "there was a bar of silence, and then the baton waved, and his whole nerve-orchestra broke forth into a jubilant Tutti." For such as consider this sort of stuff fine writing there is plenty to be found in The New Judgment of Paris.

Philip Alwyne says and does many foolish things in the course of the tale which bears his name, but on one occasion at least he is inspired with words of wisdom; when he advises his cousin Christine, who has written a novel which no one will publish, to write "another book, an everyday sort of book, that people would understand and buy . . . A book about ordinary men and women." It is much to be regretted that Miss Knox Sherrard has contented herself with laying down these excellent dogmas of authorship; had she practised what she preached—or what her hero preached for her, which comes to much the same—these volumes would never have been written. Is it possible that any one can believe the characters in Philip Alwyne to be "ordinary men and women"? Philip himself is one of those immaculate persons, bearing a strong family resemblance to the hero of the Heir of Redclyffe, of whom lady-novelists are so fond. When we first meet him he is a small boy, not yet at school, examining the picture of one of his ancestors.

"I wonder," said Phil, "why he has got a different motto from all the others. They have the same as we have got written up over the fireplace; but not one other has got Semper fidelis. I think Semper fidelis is much nicer than our own motto; I am sure 'Always faithful' is better than 'Willing, but unable.' I don't see if any one is willing how they can be unable. When I grow up I shall have Volo non valeo taken down, and Semper fidelis put up in its place. I am sure Sir Geoffrey will be pleased; I do wonder why he has got a different motto from all the others."

And having, with the assistance of a catalogue, cleared up this point—

"I knew it, I knew it," said Phil triumphantly; "I knew you were upright and honourable, Sir Jeff, or I shouldn't have loved you as I did. I am sure you were Semper fidelis, though you did die so young. I hope, dear Sir Jeff, when I grow up, I may be just like you; my motto shall be Semper fidelis."

Are these the natural thoughts and words of a boy not yet in his teens? Do lads of that age weigh critically the comparative merits of Latin mottos, or kneel before a family portrait, vowing to shape their future lives according to their ideal of its original? Not they—they would make a target of the picture; and would as soon think of proposing a visit to the dentist as of discussing Latin out of school hours. Then Philip goes to Eton, and there makes a friendship with a boy, who seems nearly as great a prig as himself. By this time our precocious hero is in love:—

George Fergusson [we are told] was the only boy Philip ever made a confidant of, and to him alone he confided his love for Muriel. Many a half-hour the boys would spend together, talking about the little girl, Philip relating, George listening; and, though the latter would often laugh and call him a mooney, he, as he declared afterwards, had quite learnt to love Philip's friend by hearsay.

Poor Eton! Lovers' confidences! "Mooney!" In this author's hands "Thou art translated" with a vengeance. It is unnecessary for us to follow in detail the fortunes of Philip Alwyne and Muriel Arlington. How they are engaged while still in their 'teens; how the lady changes her mind, but allows her lover to go with his regiment to India in blissful ignorance of her altered sentiments; how she falls in love with Phil's old school friend, Fergusson, and what comes of it all, is crudely and tediously set forth in Miss Knox Sherrard's pages. "A book about ordinary men and women" Philip Alwyne certainly is not; a book "that people would understand and buy"? Well, yes, perhaps. Who can tell?

Surely never was anything simpler and slighter than Miss I. K. Ritchie's In Love and Honour: a Story of Scotch Country Life. Two young cousins, brought up together from childhood—boy and girl lovers, it is true, but with nothing precocious or unhealthy in their sentiments—Alec and Jeanie Crerar are a sufficiently interesting couple to enlist the sympathies of any reader who does not consider a story the worse for being quiet and gentle in its tone, and almost entirely devoid of action. The lovers are parted, for the girl goes to Glasgow, where her mother has taken a lodging-house; and the lad is jealous of one of the lodgers, on very insufficient grounds; the mother promotes misunderstandings, intercepts letters, and otherwise endeavours, ineffectually of course, to interfere with the course of true love. Such a plot is as simple and as old as that of a fairy story; but the author possesses a homely, unpretentious style admirably suited to her subject, her characters think and talk naturally and to the purpose, her command of the Scotch dialect is excellent, and her work in a word if unexciting, is at any rate always inoffensive.

The only fault we feel disposed to find with Bernard and Marcia is that the action of the story is an unconscionable time in beginning. Introduced at the outset to several families, each consisting of many members, the reader becomes bewildered among the numerous characters, and failing to grasp the various relationships of uncles, aunts, and cousins, feels like a playgoer without a playbill, or a visitor to a picture-gallery without a catalogue. But when Miss Glaister once gets her story well set in motion, the action becomes clear and intelligible; the characters are interesting and sharply defined, and we follow them to the end with none the less interest because we see pretty clearly some way ahead what that end will be. Bernard is one of those unhappy favourites of misfortune who, with the best of intentions, can do nothing right. With Marcia, the niece and adopted child of his father's second wife, he might make the best of marriages, but the attraction of a pretty face makes him wed a girl of shady parentage, whose innate vulgarity and hereditary fondness for drink blight his life. Eventually, as the reader can easily anticipate, this objectionable personage conveniently dies, and the happiness of hero and heroine is assured in their middle age. Miss Glaister possesses the power, unfortunately not too common, of drawing ladies and gentlemen naturally and without exaggeration; the unpleasant characters of the dipsomaniac wife and her family are lifelike without being repulsive, and welcome touches of humour are forthcoming to relieve the darkest passages of this clever and promising story.

THE GREAT SEALS OF ENGLAND.*

MR. ALLAN WYON relates, in his preface, how, upon a day in July 1877, he and his late brother received a visit from a distinguished American lawyer, the Hon. Theodore Runyon, Chancellor of New Jersey—a State which our readers may remember was founded about two hundred years ago as a British colony. It appeared that litigation had sprung up between the State of New Jersey and the adjoining State of Delaware respecting certain riparian rights, and each produced in support of their respective claims a charter of Charles II., in which, by some singular oversight, identical but exclusive privileges were secured. It only remained to show which charter bore the earlier date; but, unfortunately, in the one case the date in the attestation clause had become obliterated, and only an expert could decide by an examination of the seals which charter was first executed. Whatever the decision, the incident in itself sufficiently proved the advantage of a knowledge of these Seals; but, even where it might not lead to such practical result, a familiarity with their character, their design, and distinctive features, with the circumstances attending their creation, their periods of use, and their formal defacement, is knowledge to be desired by every student of history. For the production of this work on the Great Seals Mr. Wyon possesses peculiar qualifications—the son of one of the chief engravers of Her Majesty's seals and the grandson of another, himself now holding the appointment in succession to his late elder brother, inheriting not only the casts and careful drawings, but the valuable memoranda, of his immediate predecessors, having access, as he gratefully acknowledges in his preface, to every muniment-room and deed-chest where a Great Seal is likely to be preserved, he would seem to be of all persons the fittest to undertake this descriptive and historical catalogue. The result is a handsome, finely illustrated, and exceedingly interesting volume in royal-quarto form, the letterpress as complete and explicit as we could desire, with full-sized autotype representations of every seal and counterseal, taken from casts by Mr. Robert Ready, so well known to numismatists for his exquisite reproductions in metal of early coins.

The earliest example of English royal seals which has yet been discovered is preserved in the Archives Nationales at Paris. It is attached to the deed of confirmation of a grant of lands in Sussex to the Abbey of St. Denys, and is dated at Tamworth in the thirty-third year of Offa, King of Mercia, A.D. 790. It cannot be supposed that this is the first instance of the use of a royal seal for important documents; its occurrence, together with that of the original leaden bulla of the seal of Coenwulf, King of Mercia, circ. 800-810, now in the British Museum, and the seal of Eadgar, King of England, 959-975, preserved at Paris, are evidence sufficient that the seal was used in the times of the Anglo-Saxon kings; though, with these exceptions, no other evidences are forthcoming. It is not until the reign of Eadward the Confessor—1043-1066—that the long unbroken series of the great seals commences, ranging from the date A.D. 1053, upon a charter preserved in the British Museum, to the year 1878, when the great seal now in use was laid before Her Majesty and formally approved.

A very interesting question arises in our examination of these seals; and that is, to what extent we may regard the effigies of the king upon the face of the seal as a portrait. It is well known that distinct portraiture was not attempted upon the English coinage until the reign of Henry VII. In the year 1504 the portrait of the King, in profile, was stamped upon all the larger silver pieces issued from the Mint, instead of the conventional bust, facing, which previously appeared, or the equally conventional profiles upon coins of Stephen; but there is good reason to believe that, from the very first, the likeness of the sovereign was, with more or less accuracy, introduced upon the great seal. Thus, the face of the King, a profile to the left, upon the seal of Offa, has the unmistakable character of a portrait. As Mr. Wyon writes:—

Although the execution is rude, the features are of a noble if of a somewhat pensive and melancholy cast, not unworthy of the sovereign who did so much to consolidate the Heptarchy into a Monarchy; and who was widely respected on the Continent as the friend of Charlemagne and Alcuin. As the late Sir Frederick Madden remarked, the expression of the features might fairly bear out the description of his anonymous biographer—elegans corpore, eloquens sermone, acie perspicax oculorum.

It is clearly Mr. Wyon's opinion, as it is our own, that the face of the King upon the seal of Eadward the Confessor is also intended for a portrait; the large nose, the pointed beard, and the long moustache are too distinctive to be "conventional," especially when we find that upon the Bayeux Tapestry Eadward, in marked contrast with almost every other figure, both English and Norman, is represented with hair both on chin and upper lip. Ruding describes and pictures thirty-eight coins of this King; the face is bearded in seventeen; one—No. 25 of Ruding—seen full face has moustache and, as upon the great seal, "a picked beard." As above remarked, until the time of Henry VII., the bust of the sovereign upon the coins was treated conventionally; and in very few instances, except in those we have mentioned, is there any indication of a beard. We may add that the biographer of Eadward, quoted by William of Malmesbury, and referred to by Freeman, describes the Confessor as capillis et barbâ canitie insignis lacteâ. It is characteristic of Eadward that he should have caused himself to be represented on both sides of his seal, enthroned, in the same peaceful guise. After his time, with certain noticeable exceptions, the sovereign appears upon one side of the seal enthroned, and upon the other is seen on horseback, generally armed as chief of the military or naval forces of the kingdom; the only departures from this design appear on the second seal of Queen Anne, which bears on the counterseal the figure of Britannia; and the two absurd great seals engraved during the Commonwealth, which, with extraordinary minuteness of detail, represent on the one side the House of Commons in session, and on the other a map of England, Wales, and Ireland. Differences, to which we will refer, are seen on the seals of the Protector Cromwell; but his mounted figure on the counterseal is intended as a portrait, and it is evidence of the care and accuracy with which each successive engraver endeavoured to execute his task, that on the seals of the Conqueror, although the impressions are partially obliterated, the figure still presents that peculiarity of form which, as historians gravely inform us, while William was at war for the recovery of the Vezin, gave occasion for an unseemly jest on the part of Philip of France. Angered by the insult, the English King devastated the country, and captured the stronghold of Mantes, where his horse, treading among burning umbers, plunged and threw him with fatal force against the pummel of his saddle; the Chronicle of Florence of Worcester confirms the painful nature of his death and the locality of the injury, but does not mention the proximate cause. We might here remark that on the second seal of William the legend commences on the side on which is the mounted figure, which, therefore, is the obverse, while the sovereign enthroned is on the reverse; it would, therefore, be more convenient always to employ the terms seal and counterseal, instead of terms properly applicable to the coinage.

Appended to a charter of 1141 is the very rare impression of the seal of the Empress Matilda, daughter and heir of Henry I. It is of German type without counterseal. Mr. Wyon suggests that during her brief reign "she had probably no leisure to direct the preparation of a seal befitting the Queen of England." But here Mr. Wyon is in error; though elected "Lady of England" at Winchester, Matilda was never crowned, or able to make good her title to the throne. An interesting seal, but without counterseal, is that of Henry, eldest son of Henry II., who during his father's lifetime and in furtherance of his policy was crowned king at Westminster, July 1170; the ceremony was performed by Roger, Archbishop of York, an intrusion upon his rights bitterly resented by Thomas à Becket, Archbishop of Canterbury. The coronation was repeated three years afterwards at Winchester, when his Queen, the Princess of France, was also crowned. The legend upon his seal reads HENRICUS REX ANGLOR ET DUX NORMANNOR ET COMES ANDEGAVOR. We may notice the omission of the words DEI GRATIA, words which appear upon every other great seal from that of William II. to Victoria, the idea being preserved even upon the seals of the Commonwealth. The title DOMINUS HIBERNIE is first seen upon the great seal of John, and is repeated in the legend until the third great seal of Henry VIII., used 1542–1547, who changed the title to HIBERNIE REX. The second seal of Henry III., in use 1259–1272, is peculiar, in that the mounted figure is without the crown, the engraver, no doubt, acting under the direction of the Committee of twenty-four barons, appointed by the so-called "Mad Parliament," "to reforme the Government of the Kingdom." No fewer than eight seals were executed in the reign of Edward III. The third seal, known as "the 1st Seal of Absence," was committed to the keeping of Edward, Duke of Cornwall and Chester, while the King was abroad prosecuting his claim to the throne of France; on his return, 1340, a new great seal, "the 3rd Seal of Presence," was engraved, on which for the first time the words REX FRANCIE were added to the legend, to remain part of the Royal superscription until 1801, the fourth seal of George III. An additional interest attaches itself to this third "Seal of Presence" since in it the architectural canopy above the throne was first introduced. We may here remark that although, as we have said above, the silver coinage of England was, until the time of Henry VII., treated in a conventional manner, the great seals of the period continued to bear striking evidence of progress in the engraver's art. The throne at first, as in the seal of the Confessor, a cushioned but rudely-fashioned framework or bench, becomes by degrees more or less ornamental; in the second seal of Henry III. it has an elaborately designed back—this in the second seal of Edward III. is still further raised, and forms an ogival pointed arch above the head of the King. In the third "Seal of Presence," as we have just observed, the arch becomes a prominent canopy; in the second "Seal of Absence" the throne has lancet-shaped panels with Gothic tracery, and on either side an arched panel or niche, in which appear, dependent, the arms of France and England, quarterly; while what Mr. Wyon describes as "the culminating point of excellence" is attained in the fifth "Seal of Presence," known as "the Brétigny Seal," used 1360–1369. The type of this beautiful seal was preserved, with the necessary alterations, for a century after its first appearance, the first seal of Henry IV., 1399, being almost identical; the second seal of Henry IV. shows still further development, both in point of artistic design and in execution.

> As the Brétigny Seal [says Mr. Wyon] may be considered to reflect the late decorated style of architecture, so this 2nd Seal of Henry IV. may be considered to reflect in its general framework the perpendicular style, which had been introduced by William of Wykeham in the reign of Edward III., while in the vigour and variety of its details it is worthy of the best periods of Gothic art. There are no fewer than twenty-one figures and animals introduced into its principal face, without counting those on the shields and banners. Yet these are all so harmoniously balanced and arranged that there is no sense of crowding or confusion. In the counterseal the delicate scroll pattern of the field, added to the decorated cusps which have been adapted after the Brétigny Seal, has a peculiarly happy effect.

The second seal of Edward IV., in use 1461–1470, is again a modification of the Brétigny Seal. Rymer tells us that it was made of gold; the field on the counterseal, hitherto clear, is now diapered with a pattern of quatrefoils enclosing roses, the intervening spaces being filled with "the sun in his splendour." This badge was adopted, we are told, to commemorate the victory at Mortimer's Cross, where, according to Hollingshead, > he met with his enimies in a faire plaine neere to Mortimer's Crosse not far from Hereford East on Candlemasse daie in the morning. At which time the sunne (as some write) appeared to the earle of Marche like three sunnes and suddenlie joined altogether in one. Upon which sight he tooke such courage that he, fiercelie setting on his enimies put them to flight; and for this cause men imagined that he gave the sunne in his full brightnesse for his badge or cognisance.

The incident is dramatized in Third Part Henry VI., Act. ii. sc. i.:—

> Edward. Dazzle mine eyes, or do I see three suns?
>
> * * * * *
>
> 'Tis wondrous strange, the like yet never heard of.
> I think it cites us, brother, to the field;
> That we, the sons of brave Plantagenet,
> Each one already blazing by our meeds,
> Should, notwithstanding, join our lights together
> And overshine the earth, as this the world.
> Whate'er it bodes, henceforward I will bear
> Upon my target three fair-shining suns.

Upon the second seal of Henry VIII., described by Mr. Wyon as "the last Gothic seal" (in use 1532–1542), the words FIDEI DEFENSOR, a title conferred 1521 by Leo X., are added to the legend, and have since remained part of the title of our English sovereigns. Another change in the legend was the introduction of the numeral after the royal name; until this date there had not been anything upon the great seal to show under which William, Edward, or Henry it had been engraved. Still more important variations distinguish the third seal; not only is the transition from the Gothic character complete, and the portrait more realistic, but the legend announces a change which had long been pending in the relationship between Church and State; the King is now, by the Grace of God, King of England, France, and Ireland, Defender of the Faith, ET IN TERRA ECCLESIE ANGLICANE ET HIBERNICE SVPREMVM CAPVT. The legend was repeated on the seal of Edward VI.—a seal which, notwithstanding its objectionable ascription, was used for some months by Mary after her accession, when it was superseded by a seal in which this part of the title was omitted, to be once again resumed on the fifth seal of George III. (in use 1815–1821), and then finally to disappear. With the first seal of Elizabeth "the artistic merit of the seals," as Mr. Wyon expresses it, "touches its lowest depths." The Queen, a squat, ungainly figure, is seated beneath a canopy, with pendant curtains drawn to either side, a design somewhat resembling a four-post bed or a modern draped mantelpiece; the mounted figure on the counterseal is equally ungraceful. The seal of James I. (in use 1603–1605) records a new departure; in the seal of Elizabeth had been engraved in the field "the harp ensigned with a crown," now the arms of England, Scotland, and Ireland are quartered, signifying the completion of the Union. Two years later this seal was superseded by a second seal, for no cause of State, but for a reason, eminently characteristic, expressed in the royal warrant—"Forasmuch as in our Great Seale lately made for the Realm of England the canope over the picture of our face is so low embossed that thereby the same Seale in that place thereof doth easily bruise and take disgrace"; the warrant is dated 8th day of May, 1603, and addressed "to our trustie and well-beloved Servant Charles Anthony, gravor of our mynt and seales." The King's instructions were attended to, and a projection was given to the "canope" above the "picture of our face," which in the impression no longer "takes disgrace." The debates in Parliament as to the use and keeping of the third great seal of Charles I. form part of the tragic history of that unhappy King's reign; by order of the Commons the seal, after much discussion and in the presence of the House, was solemnly defaced and broken. The new seal, the fourth, resembled the last, with the exception of the date, which is altered to 1643. This seal was never "touched" by the King, but was retained "to attend the Parliament," careful arrangements being made for its "ordering and disposing." It, in turn, was defaced and broken, and replaced by the seal of the Commonwealth (in use 1649–1651) above described, with the map of England, Wales, and Ireland, but not Scotland, on the one side, and on the counterseal the view of the House of Commons with the Speaker in the chair, and with the pious inscription IN THE FIRST YEARE OF FREEDOME BY GOD'S BLESSING RESTORED 1648. No doubt executed in haste, it was in 1651 superseded by the second seal of the Commonwealth, which, however it may be contemned for its design, deserves the highest praise for excellence of engraving. The artist was Thomas Simon, or Symonds, the famous medallist, who a few years later, February 1654–5, was appointed by Parliament "Sole Chiefe Ingraver." It was he who made the beautiful coins with the effigy of the Protector, and the famous "Petition Crown" for Charles II., with which the "Victoria crown piece" of the late William Wyon will bear favourable comparison. Simon engraved the great seal of the Protector, in use 1655–7, and the seal of Richard. In May 1659 an Order passed the House that "a new great seal should be with all speed prepared"; but there seems to us some doubt whether this Order was actually complied with, or whether the great seal of the Parliament of 1651 was not, as Mr. Wyon contends, again brought into use. If a new seal was engraved, it was without any alteration in the design; and when the "Long Parliament" was dissolved and the new Parliament, six days after their assembling, May 1, 1660, received letters from Charles II. announcing a free and general pardon to all who should within forty days return to their allegiance, and declaring his readiness to pass a proclamation to that effect under the great seal, there arose no little perplexity as to the fitness of appending to such proclamation a seal which bore upon its face a devout expression of thankfulness that the kingly office had been abolished. The difficulty was apparently solved by delay. On the 28th of May the great seal was solemnly defaced, and on the next day, the 29th, Charles himself appeared, bringing with him the great seal which he had caused to be engraved in 1653 during his exile abroad, and which, as Mr. Wyon happily reminds us, bore in the legend the inscription REX FRANCIÆ, although Charles at the time owed his safety to the French king's protection. This seal was used on the passing of the "Act of Uniformity" in 1662; when the Prayer-book of the Church of England, forbidden since 1645 under heavy penalties rigidly enforced, was revised and restored to use; a copy of what is known as the "Sealed Prayer-book" being sent to every cathedral chapter throughout the Kingdom, to the great though inevitable discomfiture of a large number of beneficed ministers who declined to accept the doctrine and rule of the Church in their ministrations. James II. when he left Whitehall as a fugitive on the night of the 10th of December accompanied only by Sir Edward Hales and carrying the great seal with him, stole out of the palace in disguise and proceeded to the Horseferry at Westminster. Here the two got into a boat and told the waterman to pull them across to Lambeth. On their passage the King silently slipped the seal into the river, thinking, perhaps, as Lord Campbell says, that he had sunk with it for ever the fortunes of the Prince of Orange.

It need hardly be added that the temporary loss of the seal did not imperil the Revolution; a few days afterwards a fisherman drew up the seal in his nets, and it was soon restored to its proper keeping. The seal of William and Mary is noticeable in that it bears no reference to Scotland. The first seal of Anne has on its counterseal the Queen on horseback, on the counterseal of the second seal in use 1707-1715 is the figure of Britannia, the left hand resting on an oval shield with the arms of England and Scotland impaled. Upon both seal and counterseal of George I. appear the arms of Hanover; on the first seal of George III. the throned figure of the sovereign, for the first time in the whole series, is represented in profile. But the seal is chiefly memorable for its misfortunes; it was stolen from the house of the Lord Chancellor Thurlow, who lived in Great Ormond Street, then a pleasant district in the outskirts of London. Various political motives were suggested for its abstraction, but in all probability it was nothing more than an impudent act of burglary, and the seal, which was never heard of again, was no doubt consigned to the melting pot. The fourth seal of George III., in use 1801-1815, marks, as we have said above, the cessation of the title King of France, which had been the style of English sovereigns since the time of Edward III. One seal only marks the reign of George IV.; as on the first seal of George III. he is represented in profile, surrounded by the usual and appropriate allegorical figures of Wisdom, Justice, and Piety, &c. Of the more recent seals there is much that might be said; they are admirably engraved, the work sharply and clearly defined, but naturally they have not the historical interest of earlier seals.

We might prolong this paper, for the subject is both intensely fascinating and has been exhaustively treated. Mr. Wyon's volume in its present form is a costly one; we will venture to hope that it may be reproduced in some simpler and cheaper form, so as to be more widely accessible.

TWO STATESMEN.*

IT is possible that, had it not been for the inexplicable delay of Mr. John Morley's series of "English Statesmen," which has been announced for years, and of which the first volumes have been but just issued, the recent new provocation to those who are impatient with "little books" would never have been devised. That provocation, we confess, does not act as a red rag to us; for the smaller a book is the less of a nuisance it is, and the more easily it can either be "dissolved into literary humus," or ranked, as some very little books have been, in the ten-foot square bookcase which, as the late Mr. Mark Pattison thought, would contain all the books really worth reading. Mr. Sanders's series, moreover, has this differentiation and justification as compared with Mr. Morley's—that its subjects, as now announced, seem all to belong to recent times, and not to possess any very close connexion with each other.

The first volume of the series is, if we may say so without disrespect to the author, a better book than we should have expected; but it is not a satisfactory book altogether. Mr. Kebbel had the advantage of knowing his subject long, if not, it would seem, very intimately; he is thoroughly in sympathy with him, and yet this sympathy does not make him either blind to Mr. Disraeli's defects or preternaturally savage towards his enemies. These are undoubted merits, and the book has others as well. All necessary things in Lord Beaconsfield's not very well known or (politics apart) very eventful life are told; and a sketch, evidently written with knowledge, of the political movements in which he was engaged is given. It may be said, indeed, that Mr. Kebbel is a great deal too fond, not merely of speculating, but of pronouncing positively on might-have-beens. He is thus quite sure that, if Lord Derby had persevered in taking office when the Aberdeen Government broke up, all the benefits of the actual pseudo-Conservative reaction under Palmerston would have been obtained, with the advantage of turning them to the profit of a genuine and not a mongrel Conservatism. This particular vaticination is rash, because it overlooks, among other things, the well-known fact that at that time the Conservative party was, partly by accident and partly by the defection of the Peelites, a party more destitute of officers, an army more justly to be described as consisting of men with muskets, than any party of any period in English history. And, besides, these might-have-beens are always rather futile. When a thing has happened, it is, as a rule, not mere fatalism, but the strictest common sense, to recognize it as the thing which by the general complexion and tendencies of the universe had to happen. Yet even this is not what constitutes, to our mind, the defect of the book, nor are one or two minor shortcomings (such as the shirking or fencing of some common charges against Mr. Disraeli, or as the assumption, against rather good authority, that he had to do with the Young England movement from the beginning, instead of "coming in afterwards") very difficult to pardon. A more definite and a much worse fault is that Mr. Kebbel lays very little stress upon, and does not attempt to explain or exemplify in the very least, that extraordinary knowledge and control of the House of Commons in which, by consent of friends and foes alike, Mr. Disraeli had not more than three or four rivals in all our English history. Yet even this defect is not our chief cause of quarrel. It is that Mr. Kebbel has altogether failed—to us, at least; to others he may seem more successful—in giving a live portrait of Lord Beaconsfield. He seems, after some twenty or thirty years' personal acquaintance and a lifelong acquiescence in general political opinion, to have stayed quite outside of his hero's mind. Disraeli is still to him an Asian mystery, though one which he heartily admires. He holds up his life in so many words as a "wondrous tale," and the only explanation he has to offer of some singular blunders and failures (such as the ever lamentable, and by Mr. Kebbel justly lamented, Public Worship Regulation Act) is contained in the following passage:—

The fact is that Lord Beaconsfield in his library, giving the rein to his imagination, and tracing all kinds of analogies between the past and present state of politics, and Lord Beaconsfield in the House of Commons, dealing with actual circumstances and educating his party upon questions calling for immediate settlement, were two distinct men, leading two lives almost as different from each other as were the two lives led, according to Lockhart, by Sir Walter Scott. In the one he was a Wyndham, a Shippen, or a Bromley fighting for the Church, the landed interest, and the poor, against the Whigs, the Dissenters, the moneyed interest, and the mob, deploring the degradation of the Crown and the predominance of a crafty oligarchy. In the other he was the keen and ready-witted leader of the modern Tory Party, including in its ranks the greater part of that very oligarchy, which history taught him to be the natural enemy of Toryism, engaged in the defence of principles never called in question by our ancestors, and responding to watchwords which, to them, would have been wholly unintelligible.

Now this, we take leave to say, is an explanation which does not explain. The "two Scotts" of Lockhart's words were really two, and seemingly incompatible; but there is no reason why the two Lord Beaconsfields of Mr. Kebbel should have tripped each other up at all. Every man of the world has ideals to which he has "to add and to eke," or of which he is forced to surrender and compromise something when he puts them into practice. The question is why Lord Beaconsfield, in some respects a perfect master of adjustment, failed, as he sometimes did, to adjust his ideas and his practice. Nor is, at least, an approach to an answer very difficult, inasmuch as it may be easily found in the facts of his birth, followed by his education, and of his education followed by the history of his actual Parliamentary career. It is not our business to follow the clue out here; but it was Mr. Kebbel's business to find and follow it, and we do not see that he has done so. The secret of a thoroughly lifelike exposition of Lord Beaconsfield's career is to be found in a slight alteration of a famous antithesis of the last century. Nothing but his birth, his education, and his half-accidental, half-wilful estrangement from the majority of the pursuits, amusements, and even beliefs of Englishmen could so long have kept back such transcendent political talents; and nothing but such talents could have got the better at last of the disadvantages enumerated. Failing to follow out this easy clue, Mr. Kebbel has fallen short of what he might have done; but his book contains useful information, well arranged, and a defence or apology which, though a little too persistent for the rules of art, is moderate, honest, and intelligent.

The editor of the series had a much easier task; but it cannot be denied that he has done it better. As a plain, popular, but very fairly spirited, account of the subject we have hardly a fault to find with his book except one. He has taken not merely unnecessary, but positively unwise, trouble to give a kind of succinct history of every one of the numerous European quarrels in which Lord Palmerston was mixed up, and we cannot help thinking that this attempt at embracing too much will have its usual effect. Well-informed people will not need the summaries, and ill-informed ones will hardly find them informing. When you have in a very brief space to give a critical account of a man's dealings with a large number of complicated matters, it is certainly the best plan to suppose or insist upon a certain knowledge of the details of these matters on the part of your readers. However, it is possible that Mr. Sanders may find partisans for his method of tackling the question. By something of an oddity he has given what general account he has to give of Palmerston's character and behaviour as Foreign Secretary at the beginning instead of the end of the book, and we should like this part somewhat enlarged. But, on the whole, readers will find here a very clear, well-informed, and orderly account of the life of the last English statesman whose career can be regarded with almost entire satisfaction by all good Englishmen. Even at the present day it is a joy to read again the famous passage, duly given by Mr. Sanders, in which Palmerston wrote:—

> If Thiers [was Palmerston's reply] should again hold out to you the language of menace, however indistinctly and vaguely shadowed out, pray retort upon him to the full extent of what he may say to you, and, with that skill of language which I know you to be a master of, convey to him in the most friendly and unoffensive manner possible, that if France throws down the gauntlet of war, we shall not refuse to pick it up; and that if she begins a war, she will to a certainty lose her ships, colonies, and commerce before she sees the end of it; that her army of Algiers will cease to give her anxiety, and that Mehemet Ali will just be chucked into the Nile.

Perhaps Mr. Sanders might have made clearer, what we are sure he would acknowledge to be the fact, that the result of Palmerston's nearly forty years of hectoring, and swaggering, and bullying, and any other "ing" that the Manchester School and its successors has charged or can charge against him, was as far as possible from being the engagement of England in war. On the contrary, his calm insolence kept her out of it, instead of dragging her in; and his foreign policy can never be said to have become disastrous until, in his extreme old age, he at last adopted a backward line. The Italian affairs of thirty years ago are matters which admit of considerable diversity of opinion; but we cannot help saying that Mr. Sanders shows something less than political acuteness when he defends the irresolution of the Palmerston Government in the matter of recognizing the Southern Confederacy, and in the matter of avenging the oppression of Denmark. The first matter had, of course, no direct effect on European politics; but it had, as is now well known, much to do with the second; and that second, by awakening in the minds of Continental statesmen the notion that England was a puissance finie, as well as by its direct consequences, was the cause of all the evils of the last five-and-twenty years.

Still, on the whole, a true and well-intentioned book about Palmerston must, it may be repeated, always be among the most delightful of political biographies for an Englishman, who is an Englishman, to read. The hero was, of course, not a perfect charactêr; and he had some of the defects of a typical John Bull (as Mr. Sanders points out, to talk of him as an Irishman is ludicrous) in an exceedingly well-developed form. He was an uncommonly keen partisan, and on one or two occasions he played the party and political game in a fashion likely to give some colour to the calumnies of those who say that a politician who is also a racing man will "do anything to win." He was a dreadful Philistine. His query on looking at the Soulages majolicas—"What good that rubbish would do to our manufacturers?"—must make every right-minded person groan, and it is to be feared that he was nearly as indifferent to poetry as to pottery. If he was by no means a bully, he was undoubtedly headstrong and overbearing to a degree which sometimes came near bullying in his dealings with weaker powers, and, though he seems to have borne no actual malice, his forgiveness of even personal injuries was not quite up to the Christian standard. He was terribly insubordinate to dignities and not always too considerate to inferiors. But he was an Englishman through and through, not merely in his character, but in his sympathies; and when one compares the position of the country during his thirty years and more of direction of foreign policy with its position since, it is impossible not to groan with quite different energy from that of the afflicted amateur of majolica. Except that his cool, cynical way of expressing himself and of looking at things makes dithyrambics seem inapplicable to him, he merited every word of Macaulay's magnificent eulogy on Chatham's love for his country; and no higher praise, no praise that is half so high, can be accorded to an English statesman.

TATTERSALL'S RULES ON BETTING.*

THERE can be no question that Mr. Stutfield's little book gives a very valuable, intelligible, and compendious analysis of the laws of betting as recently revised by the Committee of Tattersall's, and he may fairly claim to have attained his modest desire "that he has succeeded in elucidating the meaning and principle of the rules, thus rendering their application to future cases more easy," though it is to be feared that he will fail to realize his further expressed hope "that he has rendered the labours of Sporting Editors lighter, by providing a work of reference for the most ordinary cases." He must, indeed, be sanguine if he imagines that the persons for whose benefit the sporting papers address such "Answers to Correspondents" as "You require to win more than one event out of three to win a treble event; think over it a little"—or, "You cannot expect to be paid if your horse did not win," will read this book, or understand if they do read it, or will in fact do anything but just what they do at present—namely, bet on an imaginary win, tie, or wrangle system of their own devising, and refer their ridiculous disputes to long-suffering editors, in hopes of some day getting an award contrary to justice. An impartial critic, Mr. Stutfield has been struck, as have many other people, with the inconsistency of the decisions from time to time given by the Committee of Tattersall's; but, as he acknowledges his indebtedness to the courtesy of that body in allowing him access to their minute-book, he gratefully does his best to make such excuses as are possible. This is especially apparent when he is dealing with Rule II., which states that "In all bets there must be a possibility to win when the bet is made; you cannot win when you cannot lose," and which, he most truly observes, is expressed in language showing far superior draughtsmanship to that of the majority of these rules. Yet, their apparent simplicity notwithstanding, the words "possibility to win" have afforded constant openings for dispute and arbitration. We cannot but think the author strains a point in favour of Tattersall's when he says their decision was "clearly right" as to "Mr. King" at the Brighton Autumn Meeting of 1887. This horse was disqualified on the ground that the jockey who rode him was not qualified according to the conditions of the race, and the bets went with the stakes to the second horse; the backers of Mr. King having to pay, since they had a possibility of winning, because non constat but that a qualified jockey might have ridden at the last moment. Considering that for a race of this description, an immense proportion of the bets are made after the horses leave the paddock, it practically constat that there was no chance whatever of the jockey being changed, and that Mr. King's backers had no possibility of winning. Take again another case, that of Ringlet for the Grand National Steeplechase of 1887. The mare was disqualified from starting because her owner was in the Forfeit List at the time of her entry, but it was ruled by the Committee that her backers (and she had many) must pay. These unfortunates, however, were, to use a racing phrase, "never in it," their chance was absolutely nil, and nothing can well be feebler than a defence of this decision on the hypothesis that the mare might have won, and the fatal flaw might have escaped the notice of the lynx-eyed army of seekers after ground of objection till the seven days had elapsed, after which, under Rule IV., this objection would not have been valid.

Rule III. as to P.P. races is admirably well discussed, though the author seems to have missed the absurdity of making all races p.p. because the bookmakers, for their own advantage, had established a custom which was at variance with the previous law. The true nature of the agreement between backer and layer has never, to our knowledge, been so clearly set forth as in this chapter. So good and valuable is the definition that it must be given in extenso:—

> The backer of a horse bets that his horse will win, and the layer of the odds against that horse does not so much bet that that horse will not win as that one of the other horses in the race will win; in other words, he backs the field. Until, therefore, the race is run the layer cannot say that he has won his bet, even though it may be impossible for the backer to win his.
> The aspect of the question—namely, that the person who is said to lay against a horse in reality backs the field—cannot be too clearly grasped.

The case of Kaleidoscope at Ayr, 1879, is too long to enter into here; but Mr. Stutfield is we think wrong in supposing that even as late as 1885, there was any rule whereby bets could be declared off in the event of an alteration in the conditions of an open race. This omission has been supplied in the present revised code.

The comparatively new system of starting price (S.P.) betting is ably dealt with, and at some length. The burning question as to what paper regulates starting-price is here disposed of by quietly assigning the post of honour to the Sporting Life. We fancy that, if this book happens to be reviewed in the Sportsman, that journal will have a word or two to say on the subject.

Speaking of Rules VI. and VII. Mr. Stutfield does not fail to notice a very curious oversight on the part of the revising Committee, inasmuch as they have omitted to make any provision for the ordinary case of a dead heat, and were apparently satisfied with ruling what was to happen "If odds are laid in running or immediately after the horses pass the post, and a dead heat is the result"; though, as he justly remarks, it is impossible to see why the clause should be so limited. He is, however, wrong in saying that there is no rule of racing which provides that matches which result in a dead-heat are void, as he can see for himself if he will turn to the Appendix of his own book and read Rule XXXVI., sec. v.

On Rule IX., which enacts that "Bets made after a race that the winner will be disqualified stand, even if no objection be raised," the opening sentence of comment is thus singularly worded:—"A lie of this kind is often resorted to as a sort of hedge to enable a backer whose horse has won to protect himself from loss should he have reason to suppose that his horse will be disqualified." One can hardly imagine but that the word "lie" must be a misprint; for, if a man has taken 500 to 100 about a horse, and in the course of the race sees, or thinks he sees, a cross or jostle which may cause the horse to be disqualified (this is the very instance given in the book), and therefore takes on the spot 200 to 100 that the horse is so disqualified, how can he be said to tell, act, or suggest a lie? Surely he would not be such a fool as to spoil his book unless he had good reason for thinking there was real danger of disqualification. It does not appear that on the whole Mr. Stutfield considers the old Rules of Betting to have been greatly improved by their recent revision; it will certainly be the opinion of most readers that the handiwork of the Committee of Tattersall's would have benefited had they called Mr. Stutfield into council.

* Tattersall's Rules on Betting; with Explanatory Notes and Comments. By G. Herbert Stutfield. London: Horace Cox.

THE FIRST NINE YEARS OF THE BANK OF ENGLAND.*

NOT unfrequently have we had to break a lance with Mr. Thorold Rogers, not seldom to comment on public utterances of his which, no doubt in his view, breathed righteous indignation, but which to our apprehension were only unmeasured and angry words. With all the more pleasure, therefore, do we welcome this book, which, in language as well chosen as it is judicial and temperate, sets before its readers a history not only of the infancy of that great institution, the Bank of England, but of the stormy and critical years of the Revolution, with the fortunes of which it was so closely bound up, and which it did so much to support.

The part most interesting to the general reader is the summary (p. 102, and onwards) of events leading to the Spanish War of Succession, and of the arguments—chiefly, but not wholly, Tory arguments—against England's joining in the war. "Philip of Anjou, once he becomes King of Spain, must become a Spaniard, and must, bon gré mal gré, defend Spanish interests, especially against France; if not, his throne will soon be vacant. What care we whether a Philip or a Charles reigns in Spain? If the Spanish Empire falls to pieces, how does it interest us who appropriates the fragments? If Louis burns to emulate his predecessors, and help himself to the Italian provinces, will he do it the easier for having to pretend that it is in the interest of his grandson, and that he is securing his inheritance in Spain? If it is Holland that he covets, what need we care? Holland, indeed, has given us a king; but he's more than half a Dutchman, fills our best places with his countrymen, and makes Holland a sink of English silver. He hates the Church and loves our Puritan tyrants. Let Holland go!" The monied Whigs, too, founders and fautors of the Bank of England, followed on the same side, but with different arguments. They had no distaste to Dutchmen; they had welcomed the Dutch King, and willingly obeyed and supported him, and a dash of Puritanism was rather to their taste than otherwise; but they feared war, feared the destruction of their maritime commerce, and were willing to let Louis have his way, while they nursed the trade which they had created.

On the other side Mr. Rogers tells us of the opposite feelings of the men of Kent, who judged, with deeper insight, stimulated by their own nearness to France and their consequent liability to be the first to be devoured by a successful invader, the real dangers to be apprehended at the hands of Louis if allowed to consolidate his power by the conquest of Holland.

The difficulties of the King and nation are drawn in clear and graphic words. Louis, well aware of those difficulties, knew, as Mr. Rogers writes, that the Emperor was poor, that Spain was helpless, that Holland alone, however resolute, was no match for him, and that England had deliberately disarmed herself. At one time England could have taken the field with an efficient army, and could have paralysed France at sea. To be sure, it was still important that England and Holland were the only two European States which could maintain armies. On the other hand, the resources of Louis were abundant, his army in a high state of efficiency, his ascendency unquestioned, and his maxim, that the last pistole wins, was likely to be illustrated by his own success. The prize he sought for himself was the Low Countries, and it was for this region, as far as Louis and the allies were concerned, that the War of the Spanish Succession was actually fought.

The King of France was, besides, well seconded in all his wishes by the dissensions between the two Houses of Parliament, each without discipline, each led by evil and self-seeking counsellors. Mr. Rogers tells us of the "Legion Letter," and of the petition of the Men of Kent, both of them setting forth the discontent of a portion of the nation with those evil counsellors. He touches on the impeachment of the four Lords, but only to note where and how Marlborough's influence came in:—

It is noteworthy [he says] that he was among the peers who were willing to condemn Sommers. I cannot but think that this astute personage saw clearly enough that war was inevitable, and that his services would certainly be needed as soon as war was declared. But he was not willing to quarrel with a party which was, for the time being at least, in the ascendancy. . . . And, on the other hand, Marlborough knew perfectly well that if the English nation felt that their liberties were in danger, and even if their pride were affronted, they would effectually resent an insult. He therefore trimmed cautiously. . . . As he must have foreseen that war was inevitable, so he was perfectly alive to his own military abilities, and quite aware, whether the King lived or died, that he must be employed in high command.

Portland and Sommers had resigned their appointments. . . . Halifax, whose schemes had restored credit when it seemed almost destroyed, who had founded the Bank, restored the currency, invented a new and successful instrument of finance . . . was out of office, while Orford, the victor of La Hogue, and the instrument by which the naval power of France was effectually broken, and English commerce was relieved from swarms of privateers, was in retirement.

The reaction, indeed, came in that year, but too late for the King, broken in health as he was, to find pleasure in it. The death of James II., and the recognition by Louis of the Pretender as King of England, excited the anger and touched the pride of the great majority of the nation, whether they held or did not hold by the new settlement; and the opponents of the war were silenced.

Mr. Rogers dwells, in a few interesting pages, on all these events, on the power of France, and on her domestic and foreign policy, because—owing to the early death of the great historian who undertook to narrate the reign of William, and performed his task, so far as he was able to complete it, with such exhaustive fairness—about fifteen months of the story, between the prorogation of the Parliament in June 1700 and the death of James in September 1701, are left untold.

For ourselves, we must say that while, with all Macaulay's readers, we must admit and admire the brilliancy of his narrative, we cannot but express our great surprise to find him, of all historians, credited with the virtues of "exhaustive fairness" and "scrupulous accuracy"; and we must continue to rank ourselves with those "dull persons" (p. xi.) who do not agree with Mr. Rogers on this point.

The historical portion of his book, interesting as it is in itself, finds a place in it chiefly because of the effect which events, domestic and foreign, had on the fortunes of the Bank of England.

The Bank was born amid political turmoil, and its infancy was beset by malignant political influences, and had, besides, to contend (as most reforms, good as well as evil, have to do) with prejudices, not only political, but religious, and against the cries of self-interest. All alike cried out upon the "Tonnage Bank," as they called it (from its first appearance in a Ways and Means Bill, 5 William & Mary, 1694). The Whigs feared that it would neutralize the Parliamentary control over the public purse which the Revolution had established; the Tories feared the success of the moneyed interest, of the Dissenting, semi-Republican interest, and dreaded a revival of "the reign of the Saints." The Goldsmiths hated it, alleging that it would absorb all the money of the country, and affecting to be "alarmed at the risks which honest merchants would run if they got into the clutches of the party of Grocers' Hall." The promoters of the Bank, on the other hand, prophesied, and prophesied truly, that the action of the Bank would infallibly tend to lower the rates of discount and interest, because it would utilize to the utmost both capital and credit. They might have added that the only truth in the charge that the Bank would absorb all the money of the country lay in its providing a great and central heart through which all the circulation of the country should flow and reflow, to the great economy of capital and furtherance of credit, and to the advantage of all traders, and especially of the successors of its quondam enemies the Goldsmith Bankers of Lombard Street.

Mr. Rogers compares the jealousies which then beset the Bank with those which in our day impede the issue of small notes. We think he treats too lightly a very difficult problem, and is, besides, in error in attributing the impediment to jealousy or prejudice. The convenience of such an issue is unquestionable; but that convenience may be bought too dear, especially by the poorer classes, who would be the chief sufferers by forgery. We doubt whether Mr. Rogers has fully computed the cost of making and maintaining such an issue or taken into account the political disadvantage which a large addition to the fiduciary issue might occasion in the diminution of the reserve of gold held in the pockets of the people.

Here, also, we must touch upon another point, where Mr. Rogers, a master of precise language, has allowed himself to fall into a confusion of terms. He speaks of discounting bills on Amsterdam, where he evidently means negotiating. Of course, where the money of two countries is of the same metal, bills may be negotiated at a discount or at a premium; but to discount a bill is, in mercantile language, to receive, less a certain deduction, at an earlier time than the due date, the sum which the acceptor has promised to pay. Such discount deals mainly with time; negotiation with time, also, but mainly with change of place, avoiding the transmission of specie from one country to another.

To return to the Bank; prejudice and self-interest did not content themselves with molesting. Their protests assumed the concrete form of a formidable rival; but our space forbids us to do more than call attention to Mr. Rogers's very interesting chapter on Hugh Chamberlain's abortive Land Bank, in the course of which he quotes largely from two pamphlets in defence of the Bank of England, one of which, written in 1696, urges the extension of the Charter, and the employment of the Bank as receiver of the revenue and banker of the State. The writer, while describing the conditions which go to secure the prosperity of a private banker, says:—

Now precisely the same conditions induce the credit or discredit of a public or national institution. Its fund must be inviolable, and neither king nor Parliament should tamper with it. Its management must be in the hands of men whose reputation is good, whose estate is ample, and whose prudence is assured. The security of the Bank must be as complete as the security of a mortgage, and should be as sacred.

Showing the same just appreciation of the sources of credit of a national institution as the other writer (probably Paterson) had shown in 1694 of the true principles of banking credit, namely:—

1. That all money or credit, not having an intrinsic value to answer the contents or denomination thereof, is false and counterfeit, and the loss must fall one where or other.
2. That the species of gold and silver being accepted and chosen by the commercial world for the standard and measure of other effects, everything else is only counted valuable as compared with them.
3. Wherefore all credit not founded on the universal specie of gold and silver is impracticable, and can never subsist neither safely nor long, at least till some other species of credit be found out and chosen by the trading part of mankind over and above or in lieu thereof.

The condition of the coinage and the mischief caused by its deterioration, the difficulties and hardships attendant on the slow process of recoinage, are all most clearly set forth, as well as the effect of these circumstances on the struggling infancy of the central Bank. One cause of its prosperity was that its directors, customers, and shareholders were for the most part monied men, dwelling close to it; and Mr. Rogers incidentally gives a curious record of the low rents of the houses and shops which they occupied—a cheapness which must not, we think, be attributed to the difference in the value of money, but to the low rate of profit which, on the whole, was at that time produced by trade.

We take leave of Mr. Rogers with thanks for his gift of so much trustworthy information so agreeably given. He has done justice, but, we believe, no more than justice, to the great skill and perseverance with which the promoters and Directors of the Bank of England piloted the ship through the many storms which threatened it, succeeding in their endeavours because, with not a few shortcomings, they held in the main sound principles of banking. Their successors profited alike by their mistakes and by their good example; and, in the result, the traditions of the Bank are, as they ought to be, a storehouse of good experience in the management of that great institution and of its relations with the Government.

The five tables, by Houghton, Justin, and others, which are appended to the book show the fluctuations of Bank stock, of the Amsterdam Exchanges, of the price of guineas, and of the discount on bank-notes. They are interesting in part as indexes of the varying fortunes of the country, in part as barometers of the storms through which the Bank was passing in its early years. It passed, indeed, through many dangers in those nine years, and has known some hard times since then. If other troubles are in store for it, we think we may safely predict that Mr. Thorold Rogers's motto will still be applicable:—

Merses profundo, pulchrior evenit.

NOVELS.*

MR. JOHN DALBY rather strains a point in calling his story Mayroyd of Mytholm, a "Romance" of the Fells; at least, if we are expected to accept the word romance in anything like its old-fashioned meaning. Nothing of the passion, joy, and woe, the daring adventure or high-souled enterprise, that we look for in romantic imaginings is here. As well might one take the baldest photograph of the bleakest side of a stony moor, and, placing it beside one of Turner's poetic visions of a northern hill, call it, too, a "landscape." In a sense it is a landscape, and neither valueless nor uninteresting; but it would not be a picture, any more than Mr. Dalby's grim version of a phase of life in the Fell country is a romance. Scarcely, indeed, can anything be conceived more removed from the glow, the fire, the fancy of romance than the sort of life the author has drawn in this story; and truthfully drawn, it is evident, as far as the limit of his composition goes. It is a life not devoid of a rough sensual element of enjoyment, and it has the one great advantage over city life the peasantry always command, free and constant exercise in fresh air; but almost every other source of pleasure above the sensual is absent. The shepherds and farm-labourers, and even the better class of small farmers, of those wild regions of Cumbrian hill and moor, as Mr. Dalby draws them, have little in their lives but hard work, drinking, and the immorality which follows hard on drunkenness. The drinking is stupendous. They "all did it, and did it fearfully hard, drinking enough in a month to kill twenty men in a city in that time." The whisky is kept handy on the sideboard in "decanters" in the better-off houses, and the object of callers seems to be its consumption neat, in wineglass after wineglass, until the "decanters" have to be sent down to the cellar to be replenished. When whisky is not at hand, ale, strongly peppered, forms an inadequate substitute. As a rule, the spirit prevails against the bracing air and active life, and "at last nature herself was forced, with all her allies, to break down before the repeated poison." No Arcadian shepherds, these, and little heroism, to say nothing of refinement, in their lives. They know nothing of what goes on in the world outside their sheep-parks and homesteads, and care nothing. When they have their annual "clip," or great sheep-shearing party, it resolves itself when the hard work of the day is done into a dance, which soon becomes an orgie, in which the manners of the fair sex have to be looked after as well as those of the youths, in the interests of decency. If a couple of men stand up for a wrestling match, the fine old English sport soon degenerates into "brutal battery," and the combatants, ignoring science, sprawl ignobly on the ground, punching each other blindly. The cock-fights are more worthy sporting incidents. The birds fight fair. The social gatherings in the pothouses end generally in bloody noses, not always exchanged in enmity, but rather as tokens of friendly interest. Darker stories of worse vice are, of course, behind. Surely these shades are laid on too heavily, or the author has confined himself too strictly to certain limited fields of observation. He has not presented us with one domestic interior in which love and gentleness reign, and such there must be. Mayroyd of Mytholm, the respectable, who drinks amazingly, but is an honest man, has so little home tenderness that he seems scarcely to know the names of his children. Mr. Dalby writes English that is far from classical, but he writes it with spirit and vigour. We have said nothing about his story. There is a story, but it is not much—not at least much more than serves as an excuse for descriptions of local character, customs, and ways, and the introduction of sundry rustic stories, anecdotes, and experiences.

The enterprising reader who may carry off from the circulating library Mr. Gissing's novel Joy Cometh in the Morning under the impression that he is going to be startled by a sceptical, socialistic, sensational romance, will find out his error in the first page. Mr. Algernon Gissing is a writer entirely differing from Mr. George Gissing, and taking quite a different view of life. Joy Cometh in the Morning is a story of the good old fashion; struggling with no vexed social problem; concerned with no political or religious difficulty; accepting Church and State as they are (or as they were sixty years ago) as permanent arrangements under the panoply of which human beings work out their little lives, but with which they would as soon think of meddling as of interfering with the solar system. It begins delightfully with a stage-coach (His Majesty's mail-coach) drive from London to Worcester, with the regulation accident and overturn on the road to end it. Out of the beautiful rural region lying among the Cotswold and Malvern Hills into which the mail-coach has driven the hero, Mr. Roland Westgarth, neither he nor the reader is brought till the end of the tale. The country is graphically and charmingly described. The lanes and hedgerows and softly swelling hills; the quiet village streets and scattered cottage rows; the woods and grey church towers are all pleasantly sketched in as a background to the story—a perfectly fitted background, too. Nothing can be more simple and natural than the love-story of the two sweet sisters, plain English country maids, who both worship the hero and both come to so sad a conclusion of their dream. Mary Bransford is a heroine over whose portrait one cannot but smile in its amusing and charming contrast to the "realistic" heroine of the present. Mary is all blushes, smiles, and tears; she faints on the smallest provocation, and is overcome by confusion on trifling occasions. Self-will and self-consciousness are unknown to her, and the simple rule of her life is to do her duty and make other people happy. It is an old type, a little thrown into the background by the present mode, but likely to come into fashion again, and perhaps to endure. Mary is a pleasant creature to read about. So is the chivalrous and sentimental clergyman, Mr. Edward Copeland, who seems to have no views on theology to speak of, but is possessed of uncontrollable impulses to help the weak and oppressed. Mr. Algernon Gissing writes with subdued humour, knows how to touch a situation with restrained pathos, and keeps his pastoral romance strictly within the limit of his knowledge and sympathy. The result is a most agreeable story of English country life.

Miss Kathleen O'Meara's Russian story, Narka, has some very good points about it. It has a high moral tone, inculcates excellent principles, and it is, with the exception of a few trifling blemishes, correctly written. Besides all these, and what is perhaps more to the purpose, the story is readable. Probably every one who begins it will finish it. The weak part is the inadequacy of the author's dramatic gift. There is a disturbing sense of failure to present scenes which ought to excite in an exciting way. There are murders, and the murders do not thrill or terrify. There are Russian scenes in which there is no Russian atmosphere, effect, colour, or accent. There are passages of Parisian revolution in which we hear no street rows, see no barricades, are conscious of no red terror. It is not enough to import a couple of murders into your story and believe it sensational. Your murderer may be an utter bore, like any other man. Some murders make as poor reading as a law report in a morning paper. Narka begins with an assassination in a wood, which sounds well, but, in point of fact, is not well at all. We have not been made personally acquainted with either the murdered Russian gentleman or the supposed assassin. We have no interest in them, and, beyond a faint feeling of surprise that rational beings could suppose it likely that a pious old Roman Catholic priest should roam about a wood shooting Russian gentlemen, we have little interest in the transaction. The second homicide (one falls involuntarily into the reporter's style) takes place in Paris, in the quarter of revolutionary émeute, and is even more prosaic in its details. "Ivan clenched his hand, and hit out at him; but Schenk stepping aside in time avoided the blow. . . . Schenk drew his cane-sword and ran him through the body. Ivan staggered and then fell heavily to the ground." It then appears in a legally attested dying confession that it was Ivan, and not the good old priest, who shot the Russian gentleman in the wood. Incidents of this kind are mentioned in a casual kind of way which deprives them of intensity. Miss O'Meara may possess gifts of dramatic composition, but they have not been displayed in Narka. What is shown is a certain insight into shades of difference in feminine character and a power of natural delineation of such. The three young women, Sybil, the Russian princess, Marguerite de Beaucrillon, the French sister of charity, and Narka, the Jewess, stand out with distinct characteristics, though they are characteristics of feminine nature, not of race. They are, however, at least definite creatures. The author is not so successful with the men. The only man in the story whose outline has been sketched with nervous energy is Schenk, the hero of the cane-sword. He is a doctor who practises vivisection, and Miss O'Meara objects strongly to vivisectionists. Nihilist agitators, revolutionary leaders, secret murderers, and such fearful wild-fowl would seem to be rather beyond the range of Miss O'Meara's talent, and they show awkwardly in the setting of her graceful and womanly writing.

LAMB'S LETTERS.*

WITH these two volumes Canon Ainger concludes his labours in Lamb literature. We have only one regret in connexion with the series—a regret that their casual character has prevented him from styling them definitely vols. i. ii. iii. &c. of Lamb's Works. Even now it might be worth while to issue title-pages for the benefit of those who care to bind up their sets; or, failing this, it would be some consolation if the "Life" written for the "Men of Letters" could be reprinted in similar form. Of Canon Ainger's equipments as an editor we have already spoken in noticing the volume of Lamb's Poems, Plays, and Miscellaneous Essays he published in 1884, and there is no reason to repeat or to modify that opinion now. Nothing, in one way, is more characteristic of his wise quality of restraint than the passages of his "Introduction" in which he speaks of his predecessors—an almost infallible test of literary savoir-vivre. Where an editor falls furiously upon those who have gone before him, it is generally to be observed that he himself leaves a good deal which is open to the censure of those that follow. Mr. W. Carew Hazlitt, for example, in the edition of Lamb's Letters which he put forth about two years ago with Messrs. Bell, dwelt virtuously upon the "slovenliness," the "inaccuracy," the ignorance of English, and so forth, which (he said) had characterized Lamb's first biographer, Talfourd. Having done this, he proceeded (as it was our pleasing duty to demonstrate abundantly) to exemplify most of these undesirable features in his own person. No good end is served by gibbeting a predecessor, even if he deserves it; and the last speaker for the moment has manifestly so much advantage on his side that leniency of language should be easy. It is needless to say that, both with regard to Talfourd and Mr. Carew Hazlitt, Canon Ainger expresses himself becomingly; and he brings out very forcibly one at least of the causes which have to answer for the shortcomings of Talfourd's two memorials—the fact that the large suppressions and omissions in the first volume were rendered unavoidable by the circumstance that Mary Lamb, whose tragic story was intricately interwoven with her brother's career, was still surviving when that volume was published. After her death Talfourd issued the supplementary Final Memorials. In doing this he obviously did not take the best course, nor did he do the work in the best and most workmanlike way. But there is, nevertheless, some force in his contention (and it may have also been his publisher's contention) that an entirely new edition would have been unfair to the buyers of his earlier book, although it is a plea not often put forward; and it must be admitted that the difficulties in the way of his undertaking were considerable. His softening down of some of Lamb's skittish expletives is less defensible; but even this Mr. Ainger shows to have been exaggerated; and, at all events, it was partly justified by the larger editorial license of his day.

But it is unnecessary to linger longer with Talfourd, whose labours, for all practical purposes, are superseded by the present collection. It comprises most of the additions which have been made to the correspondence by successive editors, as well as some letters not hitherto published, and, as far as it has been possible to ascertain the dates, a chronological sequence has been attempted. Where Mr. Ainger has been able to consult the descendants of Lamb's correspondents he has done so. Bernard Barton's daughter, Mrs. Edward Fitzgerald, has aided him in throwing a light upon her father's communications, and the late Mrs. Procter entrusted him with the originals of those to "Barry Cornwall." Other contributions have been supplied by Mrs. Cowden Clarke (Lamb's Mary Victoria Novello), and a fresh group has come from Mr. Robert W. Dibdin, being some dozen epistles addressed by Lamb to his uncle, John Bates Dibdin, a grandson, and apparently a rhyming grandson, of the author of "Tom Bowling." Another series of autographs, the originals of the letters to Thomas Manning, the Orientalist and traveller, have been lent to the editor by the Rev. C. R. Manning, Rector of Diss, and the examination of these has revealed the existence of some further specimens hitherto unprinted, to one of which we shall presently refer. Finally, the portrait in the first volume is now for the first time engraved, and thereby hangs a tale. In a letter from Lamb to Cottle—"Joseph, of Bristol, the brother of Amos," as the Anti-Jacobin has it—reference was made to an unidentified set of "Likenesses of Living Bards," among which Cottle's portrait was to appear. It had been stated confidently that the collection intended was a book called Effigies Poeticæ, issued in 1824, but it was discovered upon inspection of this that Cottle's portrait did not form part of it. Then, by odd chance, the actual volume came to light. It proved to be simply a copy of Byron's English Bards and Scotch Reviewers, which its first possessor, one of Lamb's colleagues in the India House, had amused himself by "extra-illustrating," as the catalogues say, with portraits and engravings of the poets and littérateurs praised or pilloried in that youthful satire. "Bœotian Cottle, rich Bristowa's boast," here naturally found his place, although Lamb in asking for his likeness does not seem to have thought it necessary to enlighten him as to its destination. But the volume disclosed another secret. Lamb himself, who figured with Charles Lloyd in a contemptuous couplet as a follower of Southey and Wordsworth, was also included in the gallery. The solitary water-colour drawing in the book was a hitherto unknown portrait of him by G. F. Joseph, A.R.A., and an engraving of this forms Mr. Ainger's frontispiece. It gives us the Lamb of three or four and thirty, with dark, penetrating eyes, grave face, and black hair still untouched with white.

It would be superfluous to dwell once more upon the charm, intangible and indefinable, of Lamb's letters—a charm which eludes analysis as it defies imitation. You may mimic the intonations, but you cannot produce the voice. Perhaps this is the reason why the clever author of Letters to Dead Authors has no epistle to "Elia." But, in the absence of successful pastiches, Mr. Ainger is able to give us some additional samples of the original for which every Lamb-lover should be duly grateful. Several of the letters to Dibdin are in the best and most genuine Lambesque, and certainly do not need the slightly apologetic tone with which they are introduced. Who but Lamb, writing a first letter to a correspondent whose full name, hitherto sheltered "under the pease-cod of initiality," he has but just learned, would tell him that "his slender anatomy—his skeletonian D—was now fleshed and sinewed out to the plump expansion of six characters," or would endeavour to conceive his unknown manner of face as "a careworn, mortified, economical, commercio-political countenance"! But the gems of this group are the two letters written to amuse his friend at Hastings, where he is in seclusion for his health. What could be more engagingly fantastic than his outburst over the tiny church at Hollington, "which is a very Protestant Loretto, and seems dropt by some angel for the use of a hermit who was at once parishioner and a whole parish"—which he is to "bring away in his portmanteau"—which "seven people would crowd like a Caledonian Chapel"? And then he flings the bridle from his fancy. "It reminds me of the grain of mustard seed. If the glebe-land is proportionate it may yield two potatoes. Tithes out of it could be no more split than a hair. Its First fruits must be its Last, for it would never produce a couple. . . . The still small voice is surely to be found there, if anywhere. A sounding board is merely there for ceremony. It is secure from earthquakes, not more from sanctity than size, for 'twould feel a mountain thrown upon it no more than a taper-worm would. Go and see, but not without your spectacles (the italics are Lamb's)." Swift, one imagines, who wrote not dissimilarly on the little house by the churchyard of Castlenock, must surely have cried Vive la bagatelle! to this kindly and frolicsome fooling.

But an even better specimen of the Lamb manner is to be found in a new letter to Manning, which untoward chance has remanded to the half-light of a note. In January 1801 Lamb had already borrowed and read the second volume of Wordsworth's recently-published Lyrical Ballads, when he received a copy from the poet himself. This he acknowledged in a letter printed by Mr. Ainger, which he was so unfortunate as to wind up by saying that he did not "feel any one poem in it [the second volume] so forcibly as the Ancient Marinere, and the 'Mad Mother,' and the 'Lines at Tintern Abbey' in the first." To be sure, he had praised "The Song of Lucy" ("She dwelt among the untrodden ways"); had said that another piece "made him cry"; had described a character in a third poem as Shakspearian, and delivered himself, as usual, of some fine and discriminating criticism. But, then, he had concluded with that unhappy tailpiece! He tells the result to Manning. "All the North of England (he says) are in a turmoil. Cumberland and Westmoreland have already declared a state of war." Wordsworth, who, when the acknowledgment of other poets' works was in question, confessed to an "almost insurmountable aversion from Letter-writing," replied "almost instantaneously" in "a long letter of four sweating pages," expressing sorrow that his second volume had not given more pleasure, and adding that "he was compelled to wish that Lamb's range of sensibility was more extended, being obliged to believe that he would receive large influxes of happiness and happy Thoughts." He then went on to dilate upon the union of Tenderness and Imagination which "he was most proud to aspire to"; and afterwards underscoring, in illustration, certain quoted lines of his own, added:—"This Passage, as combining in an extraordinary degree that Union of Imagination and Tenderness which I am speaking of, I consider one of the Best I ever wrote." Surely there is no comment on this but risum teneatis! What is the more singular is that Coleridge also took up the cudgels, and wrote four other pages, "equally sweaty and more tedious," assuring Lamb that, "when the works of a man of true genius, such as W. undoubtedly was, did not please him at first sight, he should suspect the fault to lie in himself, and not in them, &c. &c." "What am I to do with such people?" says Lamb to his correspondent; "I certainly shall write them a very merry Letter." And no doubt he did, though Mr. Ainger does not print it.

Truth to tell, his criticism on this occasion, as always, seems to have been excellent, and his selection of "She dwelt among the untrodden ways" has been confirmed by two generations of readers. And who shall gainsay his later words to Manning? "It [the second volume of the Lyrical Ballads] is full of original thinking and an observing mind, but it does not often make you laugh or cry. It too artfully aims at simplicity of expression. And you sometimes doubt if Simplicity be not a cover for Poverty." If this was too strong for Wordsworth, it was certainly true, and is still true, of Wordsworth's school. But it is easy to understand how, to the slow-motioned egotism of the seer of Grasmere, dragging its lengthening "chain of valooable thoughts," Lamb's light-armed manner must have seemed little short of profanity. And yet, as his latest editor observes, Lamb's finest and first-developed faculty is his critical insight, a faculty nowhere more freely and freshly exhibited than in the running comments of his correspondence. It is delightful to see his unerring pounce of appreciation upon a vivid descriptive line such as Coleridge's—

This dark, frieze-coated, hoarse, teeth-chattering month;

or a graphic felicity such as Wordsworth's—

The stone-chat and the glancing sand-piper;

to note his eager intolerance of the trite, the trivial, or the pretentious, his intuitive sympathy with true poetry, however hidden or obscured. Canon Ainger is right in laying stress upon this aspect of Lamb's genius, and, in doing so, he is only adding one more to the many services he has so conscientiously rendered to Lamb's memory and work.

MEDICAL BOOKS.*

DR. NORMAN KERR is an apostle of total abstinence, and his status as a doctor of medicine gives greater weight to his opinion than attaches to that of the ordinary teetotaler. In company with others of his way of thinking he would call the cause which he has espoused that of temperance, thereby indulging in what is, in our estimation, a misapplication of terms. Another method of begging the question adopted by enthusiasts of this class is to call all beverages containing alcohol "intoxicants," thus insinuating that the main (if not the only) purpose for which they are consumed is the production of drunkenness. As reasonably might we speak of tea and coffee as sleep destroyers, because, when taken too largely, they produce insomnia; or of tobacco as an emetic, because its injudicious use commonly produces sickness. We must also take exception to the author's assertion that "all the alcohols are poisonous—are irritant, narcotic, anæsthetic poisons." Had he told us that in excess they are so, his statement would undoubtedly have been correct; but, in the opinion of the majority of competent persons who have impartially investigated the question, ethylic alcohol, in quantities not exceeding an ounce or an ounce and a half daily, has no deleterious effect. We entirely sympathise, however, with Dr. Norman Kerr in viewing inebriety as a disease, and are well assured that, unless we regard it as such, we shall have but little chance of affording succour to the unhappy subjects of it. We think that he scarcely lays sufficient stress on the fact that, although intemperance is frequently a matter of heredity, or induced by definite physical disease, yet chronic or periodic inebriety is often acquired by otherwise healthy individuals from undue indulgence in the pleasure derived from the imbibition of alcoholic drinks. The author's great experience in the treatment of inebriates enables him to give us much sound advice on this subject. He rightly places the entire withdrawal of all beverages containing alcohol as the first and most essential measure, without which all other treatment will be almost useless.

It has seldom been our misfortune to meet with, in so small a compass, such an amount of false logic, ignorance, and credulity as is displayed in Mr. Godfrey's pamphlet. He starts with the entirely baseless assumption that the human body is a highly organized cell, and finishes his first paragraph by the astounding assertion that, "literally and physically, the nervous system is the human being." It is, of course, true that our body originates in a single embryonic cell; but, until this has developed into countless numbers of cells, variously modified in form and function, there is no human frame.

The author's ignorance of diseased conditions and the means by which many of them may be removed is evidenced by his disbelief in the existence of what are commonly, but perhaps not very happily, called specifics. It is beyond dispute that syphilis can almost always be cured by mercury, ague by quinine, and rheumatic fever by salicylate of soda.

The author apparently expects the credulity of his readers to equal his own when he asks them to believe in the cures which he relates as having been effected by "dry food" and physical exercise. In some cases he does not even think it necessary to state the nature of the disease by which the patients were affected. We fear that the number of ills to which flesh is heir is not likely to be reduced by the light which Mr. Godfrey throws on the subject.

TWO ENCYCLOPÆDIAS.*

THE ninth edition of the Encyclopædia Britannica is now almost complete, having reached Vol. XXIII. and the word Upsala. There cannot remain much more to do than is contained in the whole of T and the greater part of U which fill this volume. The new edition has been what the translator from the French would probably call a long-winded work, and has steadily kept on the very respectable level of excellence at which it started. The letter and half-letter composing this volume include several subjects requiring treatment at considerable length, and they have not been grudged their due space. One hundred pages have been given to the United States, whereof the History is written by Professor Alex. Johnston, and the Geography and Statistics are treated by Professor J. D. Whitney and General F. A. Walker. These hundred pages, or two hundred columns, amount in bulk to a volume as large as or larger than an ordinary text-book in a series. They very properly have an index to themselves, which adds materially to their usefulness for purposes of reference. It would be out of place to notice what is, in fact, an independent work at any length here. He who is in search of facts, figures, and available knowledge may refer to it with reasonable certainty of finding his material. The States are fortunate in this volume; for, in addition to the general sketch, Tennessee and Texas have special articles. They also have the majority of the maps at the end, of which, without undertaking to guarantee their precise accuracy, we are prepared to assert that they are singularly clear and neatly executed. The accuracy of maps is a dangerous thing to guarantee. We have known map-makers of great and deserved reputation who, in a moment of human weakness, have put Brixham far on the wrong side of Berry Head; and they were English, too—more shame to them! Generally speaking, this volume is rich in geographical articles. Prince Kropotkine continues his series of Asiatic papers, and contributes Turkestan. Turkey also comes in (History and Literature, E. J. W. Gibb and C. A. Fyffe; Geography and Statistics, Professor A. Keane); Thibet, Tunis, Tasmania (James Bonwick), and others. For its length's sake we name the article Typography here, the authors being Messrs. T. H. Hessels and John Southwadel. It is thirty pages long, full of facts, and illustrations. If we have any fault to find with it, it is on the ground that the historical portion is too much broken up, and is a thought confused. But, then, it is not easy to attain to a flowing elegance when a large and complicated subject has to be crowded into a short space.

The literary articles are a great resource when one has to turn over these stout red volumes; and in this there are several, and good. Mr. W. H. Pollock's Thackeray will be "an original authority" for that life and full critical estimate which ought some day to be written of the wisest, the wittiest, and the most literary of the English novelists of these two generations, and the undoubted equal of the greatest in our literature. Mr. Pollock's article, though moderate in length, is a complete survey of the master's work, and of as much of his life as it is possible, not to say becoming, to touch on as yet. Theocritus very properly is written of by Mr. Lang, to whom he belongs. Mr. Lang has also taken Tales, which are another part of his extensive literary property. That Professor Jebb should do Thucydides was as it should be, and it was equally correct to assign Tieck to Dr. Garnett. Mr. Swinburne is at home in descanting on the merits of what came out of the capacious tragic mouth of Cyril Tourneur. He is brief (a bare column), but very opulent in adjectives of the noblest kind. Thiers falls to Mr. Saintsbury, who likes the "go" of that distinguished man, is to his faults, we will not say a little blind, but handsomely considerate, and kind to his merits. For the rest, there is sound criticism (as is usual with Mr. Saintsbury) and shrewd knowledge of human nature in his estimate of Thiers's alleged dishonesty. From literature it is only a step to Theology, on which there are sixteen pages here from the pen of Professor Flint—no excessive space for so great a subject. Professor Middleton, who is a valued friend to such as use the cyclopædia, comes to their help here with articles on Terra Cotta and Textiles, which should be a guide to the doubter who would like to be artistic and does not quite know how. He is also part-author with Mr. J. Williams of an article on the Theatre. The legal part of the subject falls to Mr. Williams, who also discourses of Treason and of Torture. Torture seems to lead quite naturally to Tort, a thing of mystery, concerning which Mr. F. Pollock will instruct the student. Of the purely historical articles, that on the Templars, by Mr. F. A. Archer, will be generally thought the most interesting. There are few more wonderful things in all history than the story of the Order which played so great a part and ended in such a dreadful catastrophe. Besides, a great writer adds to the importance of whatever he touches, and no one can forget Michelet's trial of the Templars. Mr. Archer, in common with other authorities, comes to the conclusion that there was a basis of truth to the horrible charges brought against the Order. Some of their practices were distorted and misinterpreted, but there was a party among them which was guilty of the blasphemy and indecency for which all suffered. Major-General Sir F.

Chambers's Encyclopædia: a Dictionary of Universal Knowledge. New edition. Vol. I.—A to Beaufort. London and Edinburgh: W. & R. Chambers; Philadelphia, U.S.: Lippincott Company. 1888.

Goldsmid has a longish article on Timur, which we like none the less because he takes note of the Tartar's part in English literature. Of miscellaneous articles there is of course a copious supply. It will be enough to name Targum (Dr. S. M. Schiller-Szinessey), if indeed this ought not to be counted as literary and historical; Tennis (Julian Marshall), Tonnage (W. Moore), Treaties (Professor T. E. Holland, D.C.L.), and Tricycle (C. V. Boys). This last should have a large and interested class of readers in these days.

The Editor of Chambers's Encyclopædia must have difficulty in managing to pack all he wishes to have said into the narrow limits imposed by the form and size of his publication. On the whole, the work appears to be well done. Facts stated as compactly as may be, with an abundance of dates, references, and names of authorities, are what are required from an encyclopædia of this class. It is not easy under these conditions to secure either literary excellence or fulness of treatment, but these are not what are primarily looked for in a book of reference. For the rest there is nothing scrappy or meagre in Chambers. It professes only to give the bones and sinews of a subject, but it gives them. How careful the editors have been in making their list of articles exhaustive may be seen from the fact that they have included "Æstheticism," the modern "movement," so called, among them. The notice is brief, but sensible and fair. There is little or no trace of that partisan spirit which is a gross fault in a book for common use. One trace of it we do find in the article on Lord Beaconsfield, which would seem to be the work either of a Radical who is trying desperately to be fair, or of a very high-and-dry Tory of the Scotch stamp who had to hold himself in with both hands so as not to be rabid. Turning over this volume in search of subjects which had been omitted we have been disappointed. Everything seems to be there which should be between A and "Beaufort." It may be observed that, although the letters are so wide apart, this first volume of Chambers has one article in common with the twenty-third of the Britannica. It is the "Arabian Nights," which appears in the larger work under the heading of "Thousand and One Nights." Their length varies; but they do not contradict one another. It is no small recommendation to Chambers that it is much more handy than its big rival. The volume can be held in the hand for a reasonable space without pain. The type is clear and the numerous illustrations are well printed. One fault only is to be found with its get-up. The headpiece is the offending spot. It presents to the eye of the reader the scraggiest of Minervas, hollow-cheeked and pallid, with a weighty owl on her forefinger, turning a bony back on a very limp Industry. Perhaps the starved appearance of the goddess is designed as a satire on the insufficient endowments of the Scotch Universities.

FRENCH LITERATURE.

FEW, if any, of the recent publications ranking midway between the costly magnificence of copper or steel engraving of the old kind and the merely cheap and popular handbook have been more interesting and welcome than Vicomte H. Delaborde's Marcantonio (1). Black-and-white naturally lends itself to reproduction in black-and-white (even with media of inferior precision and artistic beauty) better than colour; and the rich illustrations of this handsome volume exhibit in very large variety the masterly style of the great Bolognese. The author has divided his book into two parts, a short biography—for the life of Marcantonio is but little known—and an exhaustive catalogue. In both, of course, the famous, if risky, subject of the Modi comes in—that notorious collection which has been the subject of mysterious allusion and constant mistake, and the oddest thing about which is, after its wide dispersion, its complete disappearance, except (and even this exception is not quite certain) a single plate at Vienna and nine mere fragments in London. M. Delaborde has handled this difficult matter with good sense and good taste, and it is a distinct gain that the spuriousness of certain forgeries, prompted by motives as obvious as discreditable, should be pointed out. Another common mistake here rectified is that Aretino was the originator of the series, instead of its commentator afterwards. In less ticklish matter M. Delaborde's observations on Marcantonio's imitations (piracies, the harsh might them call) of Dürer are interesting, though perhaps he does not impress on the reader quite clearly enough the enormous advantage which this imitation gave to the Italian, who was certain to discard the German harshness and ugliness, but might hardly have dispensed with the German science and strength.

The second part of "Lucien Perey's" History of Hélène Massalska (2) is biographically more interesting than the first. In the former part we merely had the picture of a girl who enjoyed the privileges of a Continental young married woman rather well than wisely. The second has both poetic justice and dramatic interest. Hélène's passion for her second husband, the exceedingly married Count Vincent Potocki (hero of the story, with some truth in it apparently, how a husband once found himself in the same room with three wives of his, two divorced and one actual), lasted till her death, and it was in a way returned. But there were endless money difficulties; the pair had got themselves married in such a hurry that for two years at least they can only be regarded as having been married at all by a kind of courtesy; successive children died, and, worst of all, the amiable Potocki, though quite content to love Hélène, was not equally content to love nothing but her. Detestable waiting women ("La Karwoska"), Court ladies at different Courts, and the discarded Countess Anna herself, inflicted dreadful woes on Prince Charles de Ligne's not wholly guiltless widow. But the story is lively. And through it all the Prince de Ligne himself shows occasionally—easy-going, tolerant, kindly, witty, judicious, a model of an eighteenth-century gentleman. If only for establishing, instead of overturning, models, we should bless "Lucien Perey."

Count d'Hérisson is, or has been, a sometimes amusing writer; but his perpetual finding fault is rather wearisome, and we fear that he is becoming something like a book-maker. His book on Metz (3), though professedly an apology for Marshal Bazaine, is much more an attack on other people, and it is spun out with all manner of elaborate and ill-digested material, which sometimes has next to no bearing on the question, and sometimes should have been not given in full, but summarized and dismissed with the utmost brevity. Thus the Count takes a whole page to give us in full three formal notes from Marshals Lebœuf, Canrobert, and McMahon, very properly refusing to say anything about the matter, translates Mr. Archibald Forbes for a whole chapter, and so forth. This, we repeat, is not book-writing; it is book-making.

M. Janet in these essays reprinted from the Revue des Deux Mondes (4) is careful to impress on us the fact that he is not in the least attempting literary criticism, but merely studying his subject from the professional psychologist's point of view. Similar things have, of course, been done in English and with English writers; but we own that we do not think the results have been interesting, except with the same kind of interest which attaches to silver fiddles and castles made of wine corks. Literature is not life, though the connexion between them is close; and literary criticism is different from criticism of life.

Among reprints or prints of previously uncollected or unpublished matter we have the ninth volume of the "Grands Écrivains" Retz, which M. Chantelauze unluckily has not lived to carry to its end.

NEW BOOKS AND REPRINTS.

IN William of Germany, by Archibald Forbes (Cassell & Co.), we have a concise and animated sketch of the life of the late German Emperor. Direct and simple in style, it is a skilful summary of history, and a good specimen of popular biography, such as meets the demand of the hour. Both in relating the stirring incidents of memorable wars and in tracing the development of the policy that resulted in the consolidation of the German Empire Mr. Forbes's narrative has a clear and agreeable fluency. The chapter on the eventful annals of 1870-71, for instance, in which the progress of the victorious army from the Rhine to Sedan is set forth, is a capital example of the art of epitome. Books intended for popular consumption seldom possess the vigorous grasp which is shown by Mr. Forbes's treatment of an imposing subject. Compression has not resulted in congestion, and what is necessarily but a rapid survey of a great and impressive career is as attractive as a story from an expert hand.

Some Hobby-Horses, by C. A. Montresor (Allen & Co.), is a discursive volume about some of the multifarious objects dear to collectors. Some of them are of perennial interest, and others are the sport of caprice or fashion. Postage stamps have had their day, which, if ever to be revived, may be stirred to a real awakening by Mr. Montresor's interesting chapter on one of the oddest fancies of collectors. Crests, seals, shells, and the almost infinite variety of scrapbook treasures, are treated in a liberal and sympathetic spirit in this book of hobby-horses. Everybody who owns a scrapbook ought to read the instructive and gossipy essay "How to keep a Scrapbook." Altogether, as the Scotchman said of Shakspeare's historical plays, there is a mass of information in this book, and the information is pleasantly conveyed.

Literature (Sampson Low & Co.) is the vague and immense title of certain essays on books and men of letters by Herman Grimm, the son of one of the brothers Grimm, translated by Sarah H. Adams, an American lady. The author was attracted betimes to the writings of Emerson, and produced two essays on the philosopher of Concord which, though slighter than others in this volume, are worth perusal. Dante, Dürer, the brothers Grimm, and Voltaire are the subjects of the remaining essays. Those on Voltaire and his age are the most notable in the series.

Border Ballads, edited by Graham R. Tomson (Walter Scott), is a small but fairly representative selection from Scott, Percy, Motherwell, and other collectors of popular song. Despite the title, the editor wanders somewhat ineffectually into certain observations derogatory to the poetic excellence of English ballads. This is so common a fallacy that it is hardly surprising to find it represented also in the notes in this little book, which are written by another hand. Thus the Robin Hood ballads are said to be "exceedingly English, long and dull." Absurd as this criticism is, it shows less insensibility or ignorance than the editor's remarks on the "phlegmatic" and "unimaginative" English peasantry. If, as seems probable, this collection was made in the interests of science and archæology and not of pure poetry, the fact should have been set forth on a very different title-page.

Mr. James D. B. Gribble's translations from German poets—Borrowed Plumes (Trübner & Co.)—comprise a varied assortment of lyrics, romantic, didactic, satirical, the versions of which are given side by side with the originals. The advantages of this plan are obvious. The translator is courageous enough to address English and German readers, as his book is published here and in Germany. Mr. Gribble has a good deal to say on Heine's poetry and the right method of rendering that most elusive of poets into a foreign tongue. Those who can read Heine may well wonder why any one should attempt a task which good poets have found to be hopeless. Those who cannot perceive how far Heine is beyond translation cannot decide the delicate question as to the precise value of Mr. Gribble's essays. We have seen better versions, and worse.

A curious and interesting story is lucidly told in Mr. James Irvine Lupton's pamphlet on the Recent Outbreak of Rabies among the Deer in Richmond Park (Richmond: Lloyd). The question discussed by Mr. Lupton is of considerable public interest. Outbreaks of rabies among deer, such as that first suspected and finally proved to exist by Mr. Lupton, may easily recur; nor is there any doubt that the disease has long existed, though never before recognized. Mr. George Fleming, indeed, in a recent letter in the Lancet, cites an acknowledged instance that occurred in 1856 at Stainborough, near Barnsley; but the credit of awakening public and official attention is due to Mr. Lupton. His pamphlet ought to be widely circulated, being well written and temperate in tone.

The ironical tone adopted by Mr. John Davidson in his play, Smith: a Tragedy (Glasgow: F. W. Wilson & Brother), is suggestive of the pleasant way of the late Professor Aytoun when dealing with the Spasmodists. Certain poetic plays of the day appear to have inspired this little drama of an unconventional heroine and a super-idealized prig. Brown, Jones, and Robinson seriously discuss the hero Smith, who is a youth of unbounded assurance and a madman. He is variously estimated as "a baby," and as "uncultured," yet is the object of envy. He gains the love of Matilda, who is engaged to Brown, at first sight, or rather at first speech. He carries her off to a steep mountain, and the pair spurn the dull world by leaping down a precipice one lovely moonlit night, to the exceeding rage of Brown and the laughter of the villagers. There are plenty of girls like Matilda, but they are rare in Scotland.

Mr. Pocock's Tales of Western Life (Ottawa: Mitchell) is a volume of sketches of Canadian life reprinted from the local press, not without descriptive power, and interesting to readers who know nothing of Canadian half-breeds, whisky smugglers, and the life of the mounted police of the North-West. "The Whisky Runners" is a lively account of smuggling operations among railway navvies.

Men and Women of the Day (Bentley & Son) fully sustains the promise of its opening number. Excellent portraits of Mr. John Bright, Mr. Ruskin, and Mr. and Mrs. Kendal in Clancarty appear in the February number. Miss Ellen Terry—a delightful portrait—appears in the March issue, with Mr. Chamberlain and Mr. Herbert Spencer. The photograph of Mr. Chamberlain is by far the best we have seen. But all are deserving of a place on the wall rather than the obscurity of a portfolio.

Among our new editions are Professor A. W. Ward's Chaucer "English Men of Letters" (Macmillan & Co.); a selection from Emerson in the "Camelot Classics" (Walter Scott); Maud and The Princess, Vol. IV. of Lord Tennyson's Works (Macmillan & Co.); A Treatise on Government, translated from Aristotle by William Ellis (1771), in "Morley's Universal Library" (Routledge); Godolphin and Calderon, the Courtier, "pocket-volume edition" of Lord Lytton's novels (Routledge); the eighth edition of The Pleasures of Life, by Sir John Lubbock (Macmillan & Co.); the second edition of the Rev. J. J. Halcombe's Gospel Difficulties due to a Displaced Section of St. Luke (Kegan Paul & Co.); A Family Affair and Living or Dead, by Hugh Conway (Macmillan & Co.); Tales from Pickwick, in which we find also tales from Nicholas Nickleby (Routledge); the twelfth edition of Dr. David Page's Introductory Text-Book of Geology, revised by Charles Lapworth, LL.D. (Blackwood & Co.); Dr. Robson Roose's Gout (H. K. Lewis); the fourth edition of London of To-day, an illustrated handbook for the season; and Old Boston, an American historical romance, by A. de Grasse Stevens (Orpington: Allen).

We have also received a Manual of the Andamanese Language, by M. V. Portman (Allen & Co.); the Articles of the International Copyright Union (Longmans & Co.); Indian Fibres and Fibrous Substances, a report on the Colonial and Indian Exhibition (E. & F. N. Spon); Soldiers' Shooting, by Lieutenant H. de B. Hovell (Chatham: Gale & Polden); Housekeeping Trials, by "Lena" (Simpkin, Marshall, & Co.); Gems, Talismans, and Guardians, a nativity book, by Ten. Alcott (New York: Wiley); Italia, a monthly magazine, No. 3, for March (Trübner & Co.); The Book Fund and its Work, by Mrs. C. H. Spurgeon (Passmore & Alabaster); Which Sovereign—Queen Victoria or the Pope? by Rev. J. A. Wylie, LL.D. (Morgan & Scott); Down with England, a translation of Fins d'Angleterre (Chapman & Hall); and Both Sides of the Question, being the speeches of Mr. John Morley and Lord Randolph Churchill at the Oxford Union (Oxford: Blackwell).

There are pieces in this volume, and those, too, among the latest in date, which will bear comparison with the best of his earlier work......For variety and flexibility of rhythm, for sustained vigour of thought, and for unflagging force and flow of utterance, the place of this poem (on the death of Agassiz), among the foremost examples of this difficult order of composition, is certainly very near the front."

THE EMPEROR FREDERICK.

THE painful interest with which the world, only a few weeks ago, regarded the sick bed of a German Emperor has been once more concentrated upon that of his son and successor. There has been so much uncertainty throughout, not merely in the words, but evidently also in the thoughts, of the learned on the questions of the nature, extent, and probable course of the malady from which the Emperor FREDERICK is suffering, that, even after the serious news of the past week, it is unnecessary to despond altogether, though even with improving news it would be difficult to be sanguine. The sympathy which was felt for the Emperor WILLIAM must necessarily be increased in the present case. The father died full of years and honours, having thoroughly done his work, having put all his enemies under his feet, having accomplished perhaps the greatest achievement of any sovereign of the century, with a competent and well-tried successor ready, and with hardly a grief except the ill-health of that successor. It is unnecessary to particularize the contrasted details which make the case of the Emperor FREDERICK more painful to himself; but these differences, also, beyond doubt in part intensify the extreme flutter and disturbance into which his regretted relapse has thrown, not merely the Stock Exchanges of Europe, but the political world generally. This disturbance reminds us unpleasantly enough in any case, and most unpleasantly, no doubt, in the case of those who have allowed themselves to forget it, that the equilibrium of European peace is as unstable as ever, and that it perhaps has even increased in instability during the last month or two. How far the domestic annoyances of the last few weeks have contributed to bring on the renewal of the Emperor FREDERICK's disorder, medical authority and Prince BISMARCK's conscience—a tough disputant—must be left to settle between them. It is, at any rate, not generally thought that mental worry is conducive to the maintenance of bodily health. But this matter is far less important than another aspect of the case. For the moment the EMPEROR is once more reported as improving, and his magnificent constitution may still get the better, for a time, of the insidious ailment or ailments which assail him. But there is no mistaking the meaning of the facts. They are, first, that the present EMPEROR's accession to the throne ushered Europe into a sort of fool's paradise of forgetfulness of the danger in which she stands. Secondly, that this paradise was soon overshadowed by the cloud of the CHANCELLOR Crisis, in the shadow of which what had been fondly thought to be the most united and resolved combination of Sovereign, Minister, and country in the world turned out to be the scene of distinct and very indecorous faction. Thirdly, that hard upon this followed the reminder that this unsettlement of the position of Germany might—how soon no man knows—be still further unsettled, and might pass into a general overturn, of which no man can see the probable end. Of the two concomitant symptoms of which much has been made, the Roumanian disturbances and the outbreak of Boulangism, the latter is less germane to the present subject than the former, but both undoubtedly complicate the situation and attract more attention than ever to the EMPEROR's health.

There can be no doubt that the CHANCELLOR Crisis has been a [illegible] blow to the prestige of Germany, and it does not seem to have been sufficiently noted that this, far more than [illegible] domestic chagrin, may have been the mental cause, if any such cause there were, of the EMPEROR's relapse. [illegible] to the average political sight, so prone is it to take [illegible] probably few people since Germany [illegible] The unity which [illegible] strength is scarcely twenty years old, and it has been effected, more than by anything else, by a singular and almost accidental coincidence of the will of the Sovereign, the governing faculty of the Minister, and the consent and acquiescence of the people. For a long time it seemed as if nothing would break this triple bond, and party after party that opposed it either disappeared or dwindled into impotence. Particularism, as such, went into abeyance; the National Liberals almost died of atrophy; the Socialists threatened but effected nothing; the Clericals, though they gained some concessions, gained them at the price of becoming merely, as it is happily enough called in an English cant phrase, "His Majesty's Opposition." The CHANCELLOR Crisis has shown, if not that the concord is broken, at any rate that it might be broken at any moment by a very slight cause; and with the concord goes the strength of Germany. No people possessing, as the German people possess, considerable, if not complete, popular control of affairs would for a moment tolerate the crushing burden of that military service, of that subjection of other States to Prussia, of that unceasing attitude of sword in one hand and trowel in another, which the unity and the commanding position of Germany require for their maintenance, unless from a complete belief in the wisdom and concord of its rulers and a complete acquiescence in their will. We have seen in the last few days how easy it is for such belief and acquiescence to be exchanged for angry and jealous suspicion of one part or of the other, and for factious division between them.

It has been suggested that the CHANCELLOR's singular conduct of late has been prompted by a desire to make real terms with Russia, and to substitute a thoroughgoing Russo-German alliance for the League of Peace. The explanation is of course obvious enough—indeed it is the most obvious explanation of all—but, like other obvious explanations, it does not take into consideration all the facts of the case. It may, of course, be that Prince BISMARCK's intellect is failing; but few signs of this have been observable. It may be that he is falling into a mere "Après moi le déluge" state of mind, and does not mind ensuring that deluge after him, provided he can stave it off meanwhile. On no other supposition is the notion of a serious Russo-German rapprochement possible or intelligible. For, in order to secure it, Prince BISMARCK must, in the first place, risk the dismemberment of Austria, with the certainty that, as a result of that dismemberment, the outlet of Germany towards the South, together with provinces which, if not German, have for centuries been practically under German rule, will be handed over for the building up of a huge Slav Empire threatening and half surrounding the German border. He must, in the second place, face the possibility (improbable, no doubt, but still possible) of a combination of the whole of the rest of Europe, including Austria, against such a common danger as a defensive and aggressive Russo-German alliance, if it is to give any satisfaction to Russia, must be. He must, in short, instead of playing for safety, play the most desperate game that any political gambler with a good hand ever undertook. Whereas, if his object be merely to keep Russia in good humour, his conduct is intelligible enough, and, granting his known dislike of war, intelligent enough; while he may think it not so very difficult to achieve his end while pursuing his hitherto unvarying plan of a solid mid-European coalition with such exterior buttresses as he can build up against attempts to disturb the situation, made either from the extreme East or from the extreme West, or from both.

But it cannot be denied that the immediate prospect is exceedingly serious. That any new danger threatens England need not be believed; and in any case, when the day comes that England's hands cannot keep England's head without alliances and balancings of power, then the other day of plus d'Angleterre will not be far off. But the political sky in the direction of foreign affairs, dark as it was [illegible] hs ago, has been perceptibly darkened further [illegible] of the last few weeks in Germany, and may [illegible] ry black indeed at any moment. Not perhaps in our time has there been a greater need for keeping powder dry, as well as for the other process which no doubt should accompany it.

LORD DUNRAVEN AND THE HOUSE OF LORDS.

LORD DUNRAVEN'S indignant disclaimer of an absurd plan for the reconstitution of the House of Lords is fully justified by the production of his genuine Bill. He is one of the most ingenious projectors who have undertaken to deal with an insoluble problem. Every new attempt contributes to the demonstration that the ancient fabric will not admit of more than fragmentary repair. By an exhaustive process it will appear that alternative contrivances always fail to satisfy some indispensable condition of practical success. One insurmountable difficulty has been pointed out by Lord SALISBURY and by other competent critics. Any scheme which could be devised to make the House of Lords more efficient would increase the objection which is urged against it by its inveterate assailants. Those who have persuaded themselves that the House impedes sound policy and useful legislation will oppose any measure which can be proposed for adding to its power. In the meantime its friends are content with the existing constitution, though some of them may be willing to conciliate adverse prejudices by ostensible or even real alterations. The truth is that it is now impossible to construct an aristocratic branch of the Legislature which will not habitually incline to a Conservative policy. It is true that in the earlier years of Liberal supremacy the House of Lords was not unfrequently divided in opinion. From the date of the first Reform Bill to the death of Lord PALMERSTON, the Whig peers exercised considerable influence. In the earlier part of the period the Duke of WELLINGTON guided the policy of the peers with prudence and moderation; and his more impetuous successor, Lord DERBY, was not at all times able to command a majority. On the important question of the Disestablishment of the Irish Church he was so effectually overruled by Lord CAIRNS, acting in concert with Mr. DISRAELI, that a measure which the whole party regarded as obnoxious passed both Houses of Parliament without a division on its principle. The disclosure on many successive occasions of Mr. GLADSTONE'S policy, and especially of his revolutionary temper, has alienated from his cause, as he often states with a mixture of complacency and regret, the sympathies of almost all members of the classes which are interested in the maintenance of order and the protection of property. Consequently, although he has excusably created a large number of peers, the hostile majority of the House of Lords constantly becomes stronger. In 1880, at the beginning of his agrarian legislation for Ireland, the adverse votes of the Liberal peers, even if the Conservatives had held aloof, would have been sufficient to defeat the Disturbance Bill. No introduction of life-peers would now suffice to redress the balance. Lord GREY'S plan of creating a sufficient number of peers to pass the Reform Bill would, in a similar crisis, now be impracticable or useless.

Lord DUNRAVEN'S scheme would, if it were accepted without alteration, leave the votes of the House of Lords as it found them, and it is by no means certain that the authority of the House would be increased by the change of constitution. He proposes that the whole body of peers should elect a hundred and eighty representatives among themselves, who are eventually to exercise the powers which now belong to the House. For the present it would seem that the three hundred peers who may not be elected are to retain their privileges for life, unless they forfeit them by becoming candidates for the House of Commons. Until the several holders of hereditary peerages die out or become [illegible], the House of Lords is expected voluntarily to [illegible] its authority to the selected representatives [illegible] to the analogy of Grand Committees of the House [illegible]. The Crown is to add to the House a limited [illegible] of life-peers; and the Bishops, with the exception of the two Primates and the Bishops of London, [illegible] Winchester, are to lose their seats. The [illegible] of the scheme is a provision for the [illegible] [illegible] dation of a certain number of [illegible] Councils. The qualities which [illegible] a peer might not always be [illegible] same which would raise the character of the House of Lords. The non-representative peers will be eligible to the House of Commons; but no person will, during the same Parliament, be capable of sitting in both Houses in succession. A limit of age, not at present specified, is to be imposed on candidates for a seat in the House of Lords; and there are probably some supplemental provisions. Lord DUNRAVEN boldly refers to the precedent of the Scotch and Irish representative peers, who are now elected by their colleagues. He is apparently aware that no article of either the Scotch or the Irish Union has worked so little satisfactorily as the representation of the respective peerages. He accordingly proposes to introduce some kind of proportional election. Both classes of representative peers now swell with invidious and unnecessary uniformity the ranks of a majority which is already more than ample. The same result would, as Lord DUNRAVEN perceives, follow from simple election of the main body of peers. It is more than doubtful whether the defect could be corrected by any of the artificial schemes which have been devised for the protection of the rights of minorities. Sir JOHN LUBBOCK and Mr. COURTNEY have failed to convince the House of Commons that any measure of the kind is expedient or practicable. It would be still less applicable to so constant and certain an inequality as that which would be found in any imaginable House of Lords. No political theorist proposes to put the weaker party on an absolute equality with the stronger. The Conservative party would consequently control the House of Lords under a system of proportional representation as inevitably as if the acting peers were elected in the ordinary course. The minority might probably be more numerous and the majority smaller than under the ancient system; but the same measures would be adopted or rejected as if the House of Lords retained its present constitution.

Enthusiasts for symmetry are apparently shocked by the occasional intervention in political and legislative business of large numbers of peers who vote as a matter of course at the dictation of their leaders. They forget or fail to discern that the same course would be followed if, according to Lord DUNRAVEN'S plan, two-thirds of the House of Lords were disestablished. In some games only the Court cards count, though the whole of the pack is dealt out. The peers who support Lord SALISBURY on great occasions discharge the function of the ordinary card. If both parties were by consent to dispense with the use of all but the honours, the winner would be the same as at present. As the working of the plan may easily be calculated beforehand, Lord DUNRAVEN will certainly fail to remove the objections of those who denounce the present House of Peers. He will, without any equivalent advantage, have created the anomaly of a sinecure nobility with nothing more solid than title and precedence to justify its existence. The advantage of ancient custom and tradition will have been gratuitously sacrificed. It is perhaps natural that clever professors of legislation should overlook the main distinction between the actual world and Utopia. As the holy hermit of Prague who never saw pen and ink very wisely said to the niece of King GORBODUC, "That which is is." It is true that the House of Lords is exposed to menace, and perhaps to danger; but it has a strong position as long as it stands on the defensive. Threatened institutions live long because they have adapted themselves by their mere existence to circumstances and to the general feeling. Newfangled substitutes will be equally open to criticism and to cavil, and their power of resistance will be infinitely smaller. If hereditary powers and rights were anomalies indefensible by argument, they must nevertheless have originated in natural causes. Pedantic antiquarians are in the habit of explaining that the House of Lords is itself an innovation, because there was a time, several centuries ago, when its functions were not transmitted by hereditary succession, if they could be said to exist. The prescription is long enough for practical purposes; but there is no precedent for an artificial admixture of inheritance and election.

The constitution and fundamental laws of a nation are independent of verbal logic and much more of rhetorical apology. The House of Lords would not be invented in the present day, but it possesses, among other qualities, great vitality. Its members, though most of them have little pretension to regard themselves as [illegible] or independent legislators, possess among them more personal influence than [illegible] of their countrymen. In their own [illegible] part of the demand for [illegible] authority, as local leaders in popular movements, and as chairmen or presidents of half the institutions in the kingdom. In their Parliamentary capacity they properly follow the guidance of party chiefs in whom they and their equals have confidence. It may be wrong that a body of well-born landowners should possess greater influence than as many men of science, journalists, and poets; but they are, in fact, better known and better liked as leaders than any other class of the community. They have an intelligible claim to the continuance of their present rights and duties; but it would be difficult to defend the novel privileges of a separate class of noble idlers. It has been justly remarked that it would under Lord DUNRAVEN's scheme be out of the power of the Crown to give a deserving Minister a seat in the representative section of the House of Lords. The adoption of the Continental system of allowing a Minister to speak, but not to vote, in one or both Houses, would not remedy the defect. On the whole, the objections to Lord DUNRAVEN's project are sufficient to condemn it, and, if nothing could be said against it, it deserves to be rejected as the invention of an amateur. The abolition of the House of Lords might be still more objectionable than the crudest attempt to reform it; but the more modest experiment would soon lead to the more revolutionary change.

MR. MATTHEW ARNOLD.

IT would be difficult to mention any one of what may be called the elder middle-aged section of men of letters of the present day who, as a man of letters, would be regretted by a greater number of competent judges than the late Mr. MATTHEW ARNOLD. Himself very fond of society, he was generally known in it, and also generally liked. The strong mannerism which has in some notices of him been called egotism seems in his early life to have taken a somewhat more forbidding form, if one may judge by the story of CRABB ROBINSON describing him as "that young man of so "much ability with whom I should never presume to be "intimate." But the acquisition of a considerable reputation mellowed this peculiarity, if it ever existed, and, though Mr. ARNOLD doubtless, in life as in literature, provoked some persons, and only did not provoke others because he amused them so much, he was one of the most affable and likeable of men. Yet, though he was very far from indifferent to social reputation, it is undoubtedly as a man of letters that he would have desired to be regarded. No good judge is likely to doubt in what department his highest claim to this reputation is to be found. It has been said of a French poet, whom Mr. ARNOLD could not understand at all, that critics thought of him as a poet, while vulgar readers hardly knew that he wrote poetry. Some increase of Mr. ARNOLD's poetic fame has recently been made since his verse was both selected and collected; but from the time when the "general reader" first heard of him (about twenty or five-and-twenty years ago) till the other day, he was undoubtedly popular, if he was popular at all, as a prose-writer.

Yet he never did anything in prose at all approaching the excellence of his best verse. That verse is not great in bulk; he ceased to produce it almost wholly many years ago; nothing of late date save a stanza or two of the piece on the legend of the Isle of Thorney is worth much, and a great deal even of what there is is marred by that tendency, on the one side to moralize and preach, on the other to talk rather with simplesse than simplicity, which Mr. ARNOLD strengthened no doubt by his following of WORDSWORTH, but which was also inherent in his own nature. That the greatest poetry of all may deal, and does deal, with the mysteries of life and conduct is undoubtedly true; but it deals with them as SHAKSPEARE does in flashes or brief digressions, not as WORDSWORTH and Mr. ARNOLD do in long-drawn substantive poems. But the best parts even of this meditative verse are not only beautiful, but beautiful with a beauty quite distinct and proper to themselves. It would suffice for any man to have written the "Forsaken Merman," unequal though parts of it are to its quite perfect close, to take high rank as a poet, even in the country and century of SHELLEY and COLERIDGE, and the famous close of "Sohrab and Rustum," the opening of "Cadmus and Harmonia," the whole of the "Scholar Gipsy," with other passages impossible to catalogue, rise to the same level. Even in the more Wordsworthian poems, where Mr. ARNOLD's rather indistinct philosophy combined with his very distinct self-consciousness, the same poetic touch is found—the touch (as he would himself have said) of style, quite independent (as he would himself not have said) of subject. That he will ever be a more popular poet than he has been is exceedingly improbable. But it is at least equally improbable that at any time persons who unite a love of poetry with a love of the finished and refined in literature will read him without assigning to him a particular place in their poetical pantheon —a place higher or lower, no doubt, according to individual tastes and judgments, but never low in the case of any one who has either judgment or taste.

With the prose-writer the case is very different. Many persons probably who do not even know where "She left "lonely for ever The kings of the sea" comes from, have a vague, or even a decided, idea of Mr. MATTHEW ARNOLD as a great critic, a perhaps unorthodox but powerful discourser on theological subjects, and a prose-writer in general of extraordinary accomplishment. Here, it is to be feared, he will hold his position with much more difficulty. Except for the sometimes gracious fooling of "Friendship's "Garland," and for a very few passages of other works, his theological, political, and miscellaneous work is not likely to last long. His politics were the politics of Colonel NEWCOME, educated at Rugby and Balliol, and become a person of culture; and if friends and foes alike had not agreed that they were not to be taken seriously, they would have been the subject of amused or irritated despair to both foes and friends. Of his bulky theological or antitheological work it is at this moment difficult to speak at once truthfully and becomingly, but perhaps something not dissimilar to what has been said of his politics may do for the present. It has been claimed for him that many of his favourite phrases on these and other subjects established themselves in the public vocabulary. But it must be remembered that his habit of ringing the changes on them, and repeating them in and out of season, made this probable, if not certain; and it may be doubted whether any of them except Philistine, which was before his time familiar to well-read persons, is of very great or permanent value. As a literary critic he will, no doubt, last longer, though even here considerable deductions must be made. His general theories were too often either logically untenable, as in the case of "All depends on the subject," or nearly unmeaning, as in the case of the "criticism of life." He entered the critical lists bearing high a banner inscribed with the words "The eternal enemy, Caprice," and he lived to sneer at MACAULAY's Lays, while extolling the poetry of MAURICE DE GUÉRIN, and to declare that SHELLEY would live, in the long run, as a prose-writer, not as a poet. He discoursed much of provinciality, and yet had to avow that certainly not the greatest, but one of the great, metres of the world—the Alexandrine of VICTOR HUGO—made to his ear little or no poetical music. And, however bright, glancing, and fascinating his style might be at its best, it cannot be denied that its glitter was often artificial, often teasing, sometimes positively Corinthian.

Yet with all his defects he undoubtedly did a great work; and there is no doubt that the historical critics of literature will do justice to him here also. Although his judgments on particular literary points were often strangely capricious and lacking in sanity, no man of any time has brought so many English readers—first, to consider literature seriously; and, secondly, to consider it as something like a whole. It is doubtful whether he himself quite understood what he meant by his praise of Academies; but, in so far as that praise implied a recommendation to raise the study of literature—the critical, thorough, almost professional, study of literature—to the rank of a national distinction, he undoubtedly pointed out something which was much wanted in England, and did more to supply it than any other man. In doing this he followed out the humbler, but not less useful, work which he did in his actual professional capacity as an Inspector of Schools—work in which, again, his admiration of foreign customs was not always entirely sane or well ordered, but which was much wanted by the people and the time in which he began to work. Much of the half-contempt which has been sometimes shown towards Mr. ARNOLD really concerned not himself but his maladroit imitators and exaggerators. For himself he loved literature thoroughly well, if not always wisely, and in one department of literature at least he was an admirable artist, in others a not contemptible one. He has a high place in that not numerous band who, whether great thinkers themselves or not, have been great stimulators of the thought of others. He has pleased, amused, irritated, provoked more people than any man of [illegible] of his day and class. And his worst faults, harmless [illegible] in themselves, have been more than sufficiently [illegible] by the deposition on his tomb of a sonnet in which he is called "brother" and "rival" by the author of The Light of Asia.

THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BILL.

THE present Ministers are not likely to accept the friendly advice of their enemies by following the precedent of Mr. DISRAELI's conduct of his Reform Bill in 1867. As candid Liberals truly say, the Bill was laid on the table of the House to be manipulated and amended by hostile critics at their pleasure. Mr. GLADSTONE, who had been in the previous Session bitterly disappointed by the failure of his own more unambitious measure, excusably rejoiced in the opportunity of retaliating on his opponents, and more especially on his mutinous followers. If the House of Commons had expressed the sincere opinions of an overwhelming majority of all parties, any attempt to tamper with the existing Constitution would have been summarily rejected. The comparatively moderate proposals of Lord RUSSELL and Mr. GLADSTONE were rejected at the instance of the occupants of the so called Cave of Adullam, with Lord GROSVENOR as their nominal chief, and under the real leadership of Mr. LOWE. The change of Ministry which ensued gave Mr. DISRAELI the opportunity of trying an experiment which could not fail to be disastrous. When Mr. GLADSTONE had proposed a 7*l.* franchise Mr. LOWE accused him of trying to get to the back of the North wind. Mr. DISRAELI went further in search of a genial climate; but he guarded against the risks of household suffrage by decorating it with a number of fancy franchises, and more especially by making direct payment of rates the condition of acquiring a vote. Lord CRANBORNE, now Marquess of SALISBURY, Lord CARNARVON, and General PEEL retired from office as soon as the measure was introduced. Mr. DISRAELI found that, in conceding the principle of household suffrage, he had made it impossible to obtain the consent of the House to restrictions on its consistent application. One after the other the proposed securities fell before Mr. GLADSTONE's vigorous assaults, and eventually the compound householder was admitted to the privileges which in the original Bill had been confined to the ratepayers. At no period of their long-continued struggle had Mr. GLADSTONE obtained so complete a triumph over his life-long adversary. It is not surprising that his adherents should desire to repeat the victory by persuading the Government to copy the blunder of their former leader. They affected in the first instance a generous readiness to facilitate the progress of a Bill which they could not openly condemn; but Mr. GLADSTONE found that his unwonted disregard of party considerations gave serious offence to the advanced section of his followers. He has accordingly reconsidered his tactics, and, although he cannot oppose the second reading, he is prepared either to destroy the Bill by introducing a series of amendments, or to render the Government ridiculous by extorting from it ruinous concessions.

Although there is a superficial resemblance between the present crisis and the political conditions of 1867, Parliamentary history has no present tendency to repeat itself. Mr. DISRAELI, when he thought it expedient to outbid Mr. GLADSTONE, had so long postponed the preparation of his measure that the first version submitted to the House was called the Ten-minutes Bill, from the extemporaneous form in which it had been communicated to the Cabinet. The Local Government Bill was prepared and settled eighteen months before it was introduced into the House of Commons. The scheme is so comprehensive that, if the debates are conducted with ordinary skill and resolution, it will scarcely be liable to destruction, either by overloading it with additions or by the process of whittling it away. When Mr. [illegible] undertook to give the Bill a fair hearing, he [illegible] hoped that his approval would alarm the county [illegible], who, as it was hoped, might resent the re[illegible] of their present functions. As Lord SALISBURY [illegible] Carnarvon with some humorous exaggeration, the [illegible] thought that they would throw discredit on the [illegible] policy by attaching to it a portion of their own [illegible]. As the country gentlemen have disappointed [illegible], they will probably now fall back on the [illegible] there will be some difficulty in raising [illegible] which, if they were valid, ought to [illegible] second reading. Mr. [illegible] the defect of being too [illegible] only it had been well founded. A measure which provides for the municipal incorporation of the county can scarcely be amended so as to convert the parish into the unit of local administration. Mr. MORLEY in his late speech at Newcastle took little pains to disguise the bitter party feeling with which he regards all the measures of the Government. He virtually demands the production of a measure which must be not only faultless, but secure against hostile criticism. It is certain that any definite scheme of local government must be in some respects really or apparently defective. The demand of perfection, or rather of invulnerability, is, in truth, a protest against all legislation of the kind. The strongest objection to the Bill is that it was unnecessary, as there was and is no popular demand for any measure of the kind; but the Opposition is still more deeply pledged than the Government to the supposed expediency of local government by elected bodies.

The severest disappointment which the Liberal party has received was caused by the announcement that the members of the County Councils were to be elected by household suffrage. Any attempt to introduce a more restricted franchise would have furnished an opportunity for hostile agitation. The addition of a contingent of selected members is justified by the precedent of the Municipal Corporations Act. There is some difference of opinion as to the practical working of the system of co-optation; but judicious persons will not accept without inquiry the assertion of Liberal orators that the experiment has failed. It is not impossible that the objection to the appointment of aldermen may be founded on their independence and general competence for their duties. If the practice is really objectionable, it can be modified or abolished by future legislation. It may be taken for granted that Mr. MORLEY objects to aldermen on strictly democratic grounds. It is no great matter if a sop is administered to the Liberal CERBERUS in the form of a withdrawal of the clause which requires a County Chairman to possess the qualification which is required of justices of the peace. It is possible that no elected member of the County Council may own 100*l.* a year in land; and the anomaly which might result would not be balanced by any countervailing advantage. In questions of secondary importance the Government ought to temper conciliation with firmness, and, on the whole, it would be better to incur the reproach of obstinacy than to justify the more damaging charge of weakness. When Mr. DISRAELI had to surrender one provision after another to the vigorous attacks of Mr. GLADSTONE, he had no majority at his back. Mr. RITCHIE may confidently reckon on the unanimous support of his own party, and he will receive valuable assistance from some at least of the Liberal-Unionists. He has already established a provisional claim to the good opinion of the House of Commons and to the confidence of his own party. He has a troublesome task to perform, and he will probably know that the first requisite of a legislator is uncompromising resolution.

The Government has little to fear from the censors of the Local Government Bill who complain of the exclusion of the administration of the Poor-law from the catalogue of duties imposed on the Councils. It is possible and probable that in some parts of the country the Poor-law may be the most important of administrative departments. It by no means follows that the difficult duties which it involves should be added to the novel functions of the rural municipalities. The evil of overlapping and non-coincident areas of administration has been greatly exaggerated. Much graver mischief might result from the inability of the Councils to discharge too onerous functions. It is difficult to understand how the advocates of parochial independence or activity can also wish to disestablish the Boards of Guardians which represent the parishes. It may be added that an excessive enlargement of Poor-law districts would greatly diminish the motive for vigilant economy. It has, indeed, been found expedient to substitute the Union for the parish in the administration of the Poor-law, but the county would generally be found to be too extensive for effective management. It may be added that Boards of Guardians have never yet degenerated, like too many Corporations, into political clubs. The substitution of simple household suffrage for the graduated franchise under which Guardians are elected would be an unmixed evil. The paymasters have under the present system a control over the expenditure of the rates. The [illegible] of compound householders [illegible] and wasteful, but [illegible] extravagant. [illegible] contests will relate to the expediency of maintaining the present system of Poor-law representation. Sir EDWARD WATKIN will perhaps have redeemed his former shortcomings as a partisan by his monstrous proposal to incorporate the branches of the Land League as County or District Councils in Ireland. His debt is, in banking language, paid "short," or in a compendious form. An unsteady Liberal will have once for all gone into the most outrageous extreme of Radicalism. Mr. GLADSTONE perhaps congratulated himself on the foresight with which he bid for Sir EDWARD WATKIN'S support by pledging himself to the Channel Tunnel. His motives for the separation of Ireland and for the material union of England with France are not so much similar as identical. Mr. CHAMBERLAIN would scarcely have proposed to place the Irish police under the control of local bodies if he had not been encumbered by former pledges. He was fortunately enabled to guard himself against the immediate adoption of a suicidal policy by making the transfer of power over the Irish police contingent on the grant of Local Government, which he is not at present prepared to concede.

HIGH JINKS AT YORK.

LONDON journalists, busy with the concerns of their own little village, which is doubtless, if the truth were known, as "provincial" as any other place, are apt to neglect the affairs of our county towns. It has been profanely said that, if GOD made the country, and man made the town, country towns were made by the Devil. But York has peculiar claims to veneration and respect. It has a Minster, it has ancient walls, it has a history, it has a Latin name, it has an Archbishop, it has a Lord Mayor. Last, but not least, it is the birthplace of Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT, and therefore not remotely connected with the Royal Family of England. No other city can say more. Very few can say so much. As the capital of an ecclesiastical Province, and the site of a Metropolitan See, York is annually honoured by the sittings of the Northern Convocation. Too little notice is taken of this ancient and honourable body. Even the Convocation of Canterbury, which meets in the heart of London and under the shadow of the Abbey, scarcely rivets as much as it should the attention of a frivolous public. There are many learned men in Convocation, and their discussions have often thrown valuable light on the part played by the Church in the development of English politics and society. Yet most newspapers give them less space than they can afford to some East-End or West-End Vestry, where one vestryman has threatened to pull another vestryman's nose. They have not got to that yet in Convocation. But the holy calm of the clerical Parliament at York has been ruffled by indications of a possible tempest. "His Grace the LORD ARCHBISHOP of "YORK," to use the title which was once found written in the Visitors' Book of a foreign hotel, is a man of many gifts and accomplishments. But it would be indiscriminate flattery to call him especially a man of peace. He is, if not at ease in Zion, thoroughly at home in the Church militant. When the late Bishop of Winchester attended the consecration of the late Archbishop of Canterbury, he made in his diary the pleasing and elegant entry "York "visibly chagrined." The interesting phenomenon thus agreeably catalogued was displayed, if we may trust the reporter of the Daily News, apud Eboracum, xiv ante Kal. Mai. MDCCCLXXXVIII. and it happened in this wise. The Archbishop of YORK, like Lord TENNYSON and the first Mrs. SHELLEY, seems to be fond of reading aloud. He began by reading "a long paper on difficulties raised by "the HOME SECRETARY and the Law Officers of the Crown "as to their previous proceedings." It seems that the ARCHBISHOP wanted new canons with regard to marriage, because people may now be married after twelve and before three o'clock without a special licence. Mr. MATTHEWS objected to new canons, and said that altered canons would do quite as well. There was a sharp engagement, but the Church ultimately triumphed over the State. Whatever may be said of Convocation, they do not seem to be overburdened with work at the Home Office.

As the ARCHBISHOP is to have his new canons, it might be rashly inferred that everything was settled, and that His Grace was as happy as a lady who has persuaded her husband that a new tea-gown is absolutely necessary to her welfare. Nothing could be further from the fact. The President informed Convocation that he had successfully resisted the interference of the Queen's Bench, where, it may be remembered, he appeared in person, and made mincemeat of the unlucky counsel opposed to him. Still, the ARCHBISHOP is not happy, although he "read a long "statement as to his action" in this respect. The two Houses of the York Convocation are, to employ a very inadequate expression, at loggerheads. Their "relations," in the beautiful jargon of the day, are "strained," and, as the Archbishop of YORK says, with perfect, if somewhat obvious, truth, "every cord has a breaking point." At the beginning of the eighteenth century Convocation was closed altogether by the Crown, and was not reopened till the middle of the nineteenth. Such is the terrible catastrophe which the ARCHBISHOP already sees in the distance, and it makes him very sad. "Can the Bishops be expected to attend if the "two Houses do not co-operate?" he plaintively asks. "Can the Lower House sit alone? Would the Archbishop "be justified in issuing his writ if no business is done, as "was the case practically last year?" The third question is one which the ARCHBISHOP can best answer himself. It seems to imply that he contemplates following the example of CROMWELL, or of GEORGE I., and shutting up his own Convocation for himself. There are, we believe, about half a dozen members of the Upper House at York, and they may perhaps find, if they have to sit together without the company of the inferior clergy, other "relations" become "strained" besides those of the two Houses. While the Primate was delivering this impressive allocution in the Upper House, painful and distressing scenes were being enacted in the Lower. "Owing to a thunderstorm, it was very difficult to "hear anything" (thunder itself fails to drown the Archiepiscopal tones). While little could be heard, what happened was this:—"A Resolution giving the Prolocutor power "to prevent notices appearing on the agenda paper was "carried, it being aimed at one put down by Dr. Hayman, "condemning Canon Fleming, of St. Michael's, Chester "Square, London, for plagiarism in the pulpit." This is very sad, and by no means the sort of thing upon which pious laymen would desire Convocation to be occupied. Whether Canon FLEMING has plagiarized in the pulpit we do not know, though we have heard the accusation before. There are those who think that plagiarism in the pulpit might advantageously be more common than it is. Dr. HAYMAN, late of Rugby, evidently prefers being an amateur schoolmaster to not being a schoolmaster at all. When Lord BEACONSFIELD presented Mr. FLEMING with his Canonry, the Dean and Chapter protested against the new Canon's right to vote, and were menaced, if we remember rightly, with the terrors of a præmunire. Now the Prolocutor, the Dean of YORK, finds it necessary to resign his office, because he is a persona ingrata to the ARCHBISHOP. Moral thunderstorms appear to be even more frequent than physical in the good old city of York.

THE BIRCHLESS SCHOOLMASTER.

MR. GEORGE GIRLING, "ex-President National "Union of Elementary Teachers," writes to the Standard to call attention to a melancholy state of things. It was not wholly unknown, but was not so fully realized, that Mr. GIRLING'S letter is superfluous. The position is this. Our benevolent Government sweeps up all and sundry the young scamps it can find in a parish, and sends them to the Board school, under penalties inflicted on the parents, of course, in case of their non-appearance. Among them there is naturally a good sprinkling of very bad boys. The masters have no option in the matter. They must take the boys and keep them; for how are you to expel them when the law makes it obligatory on them to be there? Many of them give a great deal of trouble. The obvious course of the Board-school teacher is to inflict that punishment from which only a cherub used to be thought safe. But here the law, in the form of the magistrate, comes in again. According to Mr. GIRLING, their worships are only too commonly inclined to treat a Board-school teacher no better than a policeman. They have decided that the English schoolboy, like the English wife, though at a later period, has acquired a right to his action for assault. So they fine the teacher, even when he has acted with the approval of the parents—as, for example, when the poor victim has been playing truant, which in town means that he has been disporting himself in the gutter, to the destruction of his clothes and his morals. The boys know it, and [illegible] legal proceedings—a fact which indicates a quite awful state of social disintegration. What would have been the feelings of that head-master, a successor to the chair and principles of BUSBY, who threatened, with a yell a boatswain might have envied, to flog any boy who in future made a confusion between the first and the second aorist. But then he was talking to young gentlemen who accepted the birch as part of the divinely ordered scheme of things, and not to the pets from the slums. Nor do the sufferings of the School-board master—a creature hunted like the flying fish—end here. On one side of him is the naughty boy, and on the other the Education Department. The first disgraces the establishment. The second stops the merit grant because it is disgraced. This identical case happened in Mr. GIRLING's experience. A master was fined for caning a boy who had scribbled obscene words in the school books. Later on the Education Department mulcted the school because the school books were defiled by obscene words. Of course all the bad boys in the school had been encouraged by the mishap of the master to cover every margin they could get at with nastiness.

Mr. GIRLING draws from all this the moral that the infliction of moderate corporal punishment should be allowed in Board schools, not to say encouraged. Everybody who knows the nature of boys, and is not incurably sick with sentimentality, will agree with him. We are not sure that we approve of the cane as an instrument of punishment. It is a little apt to break and bruise, thereby causing lasting hurt, which ought not to be the object of the judicious schoolmaster, whose desire is rather to inflict smart but temporary inconvenience. On this subject most judicious observations have been made by a Russian ecclesiastic (he was chaplain to IVAN the Terrible, a great and maligned sovereign) in the course of a treatise on domestic economy. Do not, he said to fathers of families, punish by blows on the head with the fist or blows anywhere with a cudgel. These instruments may cripple or cause deafness or blindness, which is wrong. No; use a whip. It is terrible, but good for the health. Our own birch is an almost ideal weapon in the hand of the former of youth; but it has this defect, that it is used up very quickly, and might, if employed in Board schools, increase the rates. Perhaps as wise a course as another would be to import the Scotch taws—a thing cheap, enduring, and, as IVAN's chaplain would have agreed, terrible, but good for the health. The prosperity of the Scotch people is a monument to its efficiency. Birch, taws, or even cane, are all good, however, when properly used—that is, to punish transgression, and not well-meaning stupidity, which is an act of GOD, and the QUEEN's enemies. Also let them be administered without anger (the good Russian is strong on this point), and accompanied by temperate verbal reprehension. Our philosopher did not object to preachee and flogee, holding wisely that the first is never so carefully harkened to as before, during, or even after the latter. That both should be inflicted on dirty little boys who write obscene words in copy-books we are sure, and we shall hold the sense of that man or woman who talks about "cruelty" or "degradation" in this connexion very cheap.

IRELAND.

A SIGNIFICANT intimation appeared the other day in the leading Gladstonian organ to the effect that Mr. PARNELL does not propose to raise any question in the House of Commons with reference to Mr. O'BRIEN's second arrest, but will leave the whole matter "to the judgment of the English people." Now nobody, that we are aware [illegible] said, or indeed had had time to say, that Mr. [illegible] did propose to raise any question on this subject, [illegible] announcement we have quoted seems therefore to [illegible] intended to anticipate any inconvenient suggestion [illegible] Even if it is to be so regarded, we confess [illegible] no surprise whatever. There is nothing, [illegible] was anything, to show that the leader of [illegible] any sympathy with the policy of combat [illegible] three—but only two or three—of his [illegible] have identified themselves [illegible] a Parnellite in the sense in [illegible] the Plan of Campaign [illegible] has never [illegible]

even in the House of Commons he has been more cautious in his defences of it than some of his allies on the front Opposition bench. He has taken no part, we will not say merely as an active combatant, but as a directing and organizing authority, in the resistance to the Crimes Act, and it is not unworthy of notice that almost his only Parliamentary action in support of the recent operations of the agitators was taken singularly late. Everything that is unofficially known about the skirmish of the police with the Ennis rioters last Sunday week was in the hands of the Irish Parliamentary party by the following day. Indeed, the case ultimately set up by Mr. PARNELL was entirely based upon reports published in the Times and in Irish newspapers of that date; yet it was not till the following Thursday that he made up his mind, or was prevailed upon, to bring the matter before the House of Commons. It may be said, no doubt, that Mr. PARNELL's inaction is due to the present state of his health; and for one aspect of it—his withdrawal from the work of active agitation in Ireland, with the possibilities of imprisonment now attaching to it—the explanation may serve well enough. But it does not account for Mr. PARNELL's attitude in the House of Commons, where he has for a long time past left the defence of Irish anarchy almost entirely to the late Ministers of the QUEEN. His health is hardly so bad as to necessitate that, and we must look for some other, or, at any rate, some further, reason for his systematic discouragement of the "party of "combat" among his followers. We do not think it is far to seek. Mr. PARNELL has, after all, little or no interest in encouraging a kind of agitation in which he does not desire to take part himself. It is no longer necessary to him, now that he has captured Mr. GLADSTONE and a majority in "number" but not in "value"—to borrow an expression from bankruptcy law—of the Liberal party; and, if it is not necessary to him for Parliamentary purposes, he can certainly have no other motive for abetting proceedings which have raised the name of at least one of his followers almost to the level of his own in Ireland.

On this and other competitors with him for popularity, the last-mentioned consideration, of course, operates with equal force in the opposite direction. The more persistently Mr. PARNELL abstains from agitation, the more Mr. O'BRIEN has to gain from persevering with it; and we ought now apparently to add that the more industriously Mr. O'BRIEN perseveres in agitation, the more uneasy become those other lieutenants of Mr. PARNELL who have hitherto, to some extent, imitated his tactics. No doubt Mr. O'BRIEN may have also cherished the hope of being able at one and the same time to keep himself in evidence before the Irish people and to "score one" against the Irish Executive. The same foolish people in England who have been persuading the Irish agitators that, if only a sufficient number of them defy the law at the same time, the law will allow itself to be defied, have also at other times hazarded the statement that the continued repetition of such acts of defiance by the same offenders would produce the same effect as their simultaneous multiplication by a number of different persons. Possibly Mr. O'BRIEN may have been desirous of putting this opinion to the test. He may even have thought that the trouble which at some expense to his own dignity he succeeded in giving to the authorities during his last imprisonment might secure him immunity for the future. In this, however, he has been mistaken, and it would have been a matter of great regret if he had not. The promptitude with which the Government have responded to his challenge deserves hearty approval. It was of the first importance to show Mr. O'BRIEN that it is just as easy for them to prosecute him twice as once, as long as he continues to defy the law, and that, given his persistence in the same course of conduct, a third prosecution will come just as easily and naturally to them as a second. Mr. DILLON's case is peculiar. A warrant was issued against him several months ago, and up till last Sunday week he has preferred to remain in England, where for some unknown reason a species of [illegible] not admitted in the case of the [illegible] of the party, has in his behoof been [illegible] him to join in the Sunday [illegible] to cross the Channel at the [illegible] to say; but [illegible] should just at this moment have been moved to take part in the efforts of those who are striving to galvanize the corpse of the League into a momentary semblance of life. A self-restraint which has been so admirably maintained for months past, and which then suddenly and under no fresh access of provocation gives way, is a mysterious quality, and we find the suspicion irresistible that Mr. Dillon's sudden resumption of activity is due, not to sentiment, but to policy. Mr. O'Brien has been forcing the pace for some time past, and there are limits to the operation of "saving oneself" which cannot be exceeded save at the risk of being thrown out of the race altogether. The ridiculous scene at the Amiens Street Station may not have been got up by Mr. Dillon, and even his absurd namesake the Alderman may have played the fool without premeditation; but the incident fits in well enough with the theory that Mr. Dillon has felt obliged to compete more actively with his rival patriot, and that it is thought desirable among his friends and supporters to give as much éclat to his arrest as possible.

Meanwhile, and although the efforts of the agitators to prove the continued existence of the National League as an organization deserving the adjective attached to it may be futile enough, there is no lack of evidence that the system of terrorism implanted by it is still flourishing in a few districts of Ireland. Thus there is no longer any doubt that the persecution of the Curtins is reproducing itself, as it promised to do, in the case of the Fitzmaurice family. Latest reports from the neighbourhood state that the widow and daughter of the murdered man have been subjected to boycotting of the most relentless description. They are guarded night and day by six policemen—a precaution absolutely necessary, it is believed, to protect them from violence. Norah Fitzmaurice, whose evidence at the trial was the means of securing the conviction of Moriarty and Hayes, made an attempt the other day, for the first time for six weeks, to go to Mass. She was escorted by policemen, and upon entering the chapel the secretary of the local branch of the League—a man named Dorling—stood up and signalled to the congregation to leave, whereupon about fifty persons quitted the chapel in a body, causing an unseemly disturbance. They were followed by the officiating priest, who tried to bring them back, but was unsuccessful. Demonstrations of this kind are, no doubt, among the most difficult matters to deal with; but, as the persons who take part in them are pretty sure to be also guilty of other acts more clearly coming within the boycotting provisions of the Crimes Act, they could surely be reached in this way. Certainly this is true of the persecutors of the unhappy Mrs. Quirke, who is expiating, in the usual way, the offence of having had her husband murdered near Tralee. Her grandchildren, it is said, are suffering from measles, but she can't get no neighbour to assist, or even to sell the necessaries of life. Surely an application made by her to one of these neighbourly neighbours in the presence of one of her police protectors, and refused, would be sufficient to lay the foundation for proceedings which might have a very salutary effect upon the rest.

CAT-POISONERS.

It appears that the crime of poisoning cats has been prevalent of late in certain parts of London. It is therefore as well to remind both the owners of poisoned cats and the criminals who may be disposed to continue their malpractices how the law stands. The Prevention of Cruelty to Animals Act, 1849, makes it an offence punishable with a 5l. penalty to "torture" any "animal," and the interpretation clause of the statute enacts that for this purpose a cat is an animal. But, lest it should be suggested that poisoning is not torturing, an Act passed in 1876 (39 Vict. c. 13) enacts that whoever "wilfully "and unlawfully administers to, or causes to be adminis-"tered to, or taken by any horse, cattle, or domestic "animal, any poisonous or injurious drug or substance," may be fined 5l., or imprisoned, with or without hard labour, for a month in the case of a first offence, and for [illegible] in the case of a second or subsequent offence. [illegible] of the law ought to be [illegible] of the few [illegible] enough to enjoy killing their neighbours' pet animals in the most painful way possible, a larger proportion are also stupid enough to imagine that, if the animals come on their land, they have some kind of right to put poison in their way. Not only have they no such right, but they are committing a crime when they do it as well as a shameful and cruel action. In many parts of the country a somewhat similar superstition exists as to a supposed right to shoot other people's dogs. Owners of dogs are civilly liable for all the damage their dogs do, and therefore there can be no pretence for the suggestion that any one aggrieved, or choosing to consider himself aggrieved, by a dog has a right to take the law into his own hands. A conviction or two for either of these offences would be extremely useful in spreading a knowledge of the law on the subject.

ABOUT BOULANGISM.

The great General has obtained his swingeing majority and has walked triumphantly into the Chamber. Hannibal, to use a phrase whereof the value has been proved by much use, is at the gates. He is even inside them. It remains to be seen what he will do with the city; whether he will sack it at once, or spend some little time first in going out and coming in again, just to show that he can and to rub it well into the citizens. All the geese of the Capitol (to keep up our novel allegorical vein) are cackling together—some in great flurry, consternation, and wrath, some in much cynical joy at the terror of their fellow birds, and some in loud exultation. These last two parties are in no fear that their necks will be wrung, or have even hopes of increased allowance of provend. For the moment what is said about the General is of more immediate interest than his own proceedings, and fortunately comment abounds there and here also. As regards our own instructors of public opinion, they would seem for the more part to be dreadfully puzzled by ce brav' général—which is, we are afraid, a sign that many things have happened in France for a century to very little purpose as far as they are concerned. They want to know what he has done to be so loved. Well, he has attained to that affection, and did anybody ever understand what the charming girl could see in that fellow? She likes him, and so much the better for him. Sometimes they are funny about the black charger in their dreary way. To be sure, the possession of a black charger is no proof that you can ride him to victory, or even ride him at all, but the horse is a noble beast, and considered as a pedestal from which to display yourself to your countrymen he seems to us decidedly superior in point of dignity, picturesqueness, and everything but price to a café chair or a stump. Again, we hear of "disintegration" and instability, as if they were astonishing novelties in France. There can really be nothing said to any purpose about French politics except by people who understand that the Government of the country is by the nature of things disintegrated and unstable. When France parted with the Lord's anointed, she said to disintegration and instability, Be ye my brother and sister. As Carlyle, who talked more wisdom about politics than all his generation put together, might have said, France has got down to the indestructable basis of all human society, the natural tendency of men to believe in some man. Nothing has been done in that country for long except by this influence. It was Thiers's popularity which founded the Republic, and Gambetta's (not a whit better justified than Boulanger's) defeated the half-hearted coup d'état of the 16th of May. They are dead; and, after an interval of squalid confusion, the General has come forward, and been accepted at once. He may be the false Cæsar, most probably he is; and we, for our part, see no reason to believe that he is the son of Venus. But France has to believe at intervals in some Cæsar, and the true one appears but rarely. General Boulanger has presented himself at the psychological moment. The rational course for observers of politics, we take it, is to look at things as they are, not to wag their heads in addled surprise and wonder why they cannot be otherwise.

M. Ferry's vehement attack on the General at Epinal is in some ways a respectable performance. It has the pluck which he seldom fails to show, and it has a hearty ring of hatred and contempt which is sincere and pleasant to listen to. When, however, it is examined for reasons why General Boulanger should not become master of France it is found to be less satisfactory. M. Ferry [illegible]

"plagiarist of the 2nd of December," and predicts that he will be defeated; for the President is elected for seven years, and the Chamber is there, with a War Minister of its own. This belief in the security of M. Carnot's tenure of office is a respectable stratagem if assumed to encourage his friends; but, if it is genuine, it greatly wrongs M. Ferry's sagacity. Marshal MacMahon was elected for seven years, and had to go. M. Grévy was re-elected, and the Chamber packed him about his business, because it did not like his son-in-law and he himself was close with his money. Why should M. Carnot's period of office be sacred? When M. Ferry stood as candidate for M. Grévy's vacant place he helped to destroy what little solidity the position of President ever had. As for the Chamber, it has already committed itself to the revision of the Constitution. There is no prospect that it will undo its decision, though it has given a formal vote of confidence to M. Floquet, who, after taking office on a pledge to revise, says that he is so afraid of General Boulanger, that he would rather postpone the task for the present. In the confusion of a constituent assembly the General is eminently likely to make his way. M. Ferry's apologies for the Chamber and the Constitution strike us as rather unhappy. The Chamber, he says, may be bad, but it is the best the country could elect, and ought not to be punished for the unwisdom of its maker. To the truth of M. Ferry's premiss we have nothing to object; but if the country chooses to elect General Boulanger, what then? The consent of the country constitutes the legitimacy of the Government on M. Ferry's own principles. Against this objection he guards himself by observing that universal suffrage is liable to make mistakes, and ought to be kept under control for its own good. We quite agree with M. Ferry and admire his courage; but how does he propose to control universal suffrage? What is the good of constitutional guarantees and checks for which nobody has the slightest respect? They are mere chinoiseries. Through all M. Ferry's speech there runs an assumption which is common enough in all remarks on French and other politics—the assumption, namely, that a Legislative Chamber is "taboo," too sacred to be touched. He never appears to have thought for a moment that a legislative body is a means to the end, which is good government. If it fails it may, and ought, to be abolished. The country which elected it is not bound by any principle of morals we know of to tolerate an unprofitable servant. M. Ferry seems to think, and others with him, that a Legislative Chamber must be allowed to go on, whatever its conduct has been. It may be hopelessly divided, destitute of men of real ability, extravagant, profligate, incapable of governing or of allowing others to govern, but it is sacrosanct. There it ought to be allowed to stay in its welter, drawing its twenty-five francs a day, taxing the country to supply itself with cheap dinners, and voting itself holidays in Algeria. Argument is useless against such a pretension, and ridicule not much more effective. Force is the only resource; and the whole pack of briefless barristers, fruits secs, and prating shopkeepers must be sent about their business. If France was wrong to put them there, it is time she cast about for better servants. For the rest, if she must have a master—which is about the case—it is better to have one vulture, with one stomach to fill, who can at least use his claws, than five hundred magpies which can only chatter and do other things natural to the tribe.

The best sign for General Boulanger is the hopeless division amongst his enemies. They hate one another as badly as they do him. M. Ferry, indeed, is prepared to support M. Floquet—which in practice would mean that the Opportunists will become entirely Radical, in order to dish "le général plébiscitaire." To this course the Moderate Republicans will certainly object. Their view is that M. Floquet should be got rid of first, and then all "respectable people" should be rallied for a stand against [illegible] form of Radicalism. To come back to the historical [illegible], it is the position of Bothwell Brig. Balfour-[illegible] Morton-Ribot, with a faithful handful, are [illegible]ately on the bridge. Behind them on the hill [illegible] of their army, dismally quavering what was [illegible] of defiance. One half is disputing with [illegible] terms ought to be offered to an enemy who [illegible] unconditional surrender. They are [illegible]. On the other [illegible] full of confidence and fight. [illegible] the attack, and Dalzell-Rochefort (we do not see Claverhouse on the staff of ce brav' général)—Dalzell-Rochefort is hounding on the van, thirsting for blood. It will be strange if Morton-Ribot is not soon appealing in vain for gunpowder and reinforcements; if the bridge is not carried, and Balfour-Ferry himself flying in the universal rout.

MR. BRADLAUGH'S MARE'S-NEST.

For about two years, off and on, Mr. Bradlaugh has been charging the Conservative party generally, and Lord Salisbury in particular, with having paid considerable sums to the organizers of meetings of "the unemployed" and of Fair-traders, for the purpose of organizing those meetings, and with surreptitiously promoting, among other meetings, that one in Trafalgar Square the summoning of which was made the pretext of the riot of February 1886. In December last he published a letter in the Times reiterating this statement, and alleging that a Mr. Peters, the secretary of an association for agitating against foreign bounties on sugar, was the recipient of money applied in this way. Mr. Peters accordingly sued Mr. Bradlaugh for libel, and proved in the most conclusive manner possible that, as far as he was concerned, there was no kind of foundation for the statement. Baron Huddleston and Mr. Lockwood rivalled each other in their kindness to Mr. Bradlaugh in explaining to him that what gentlemen do when they are proved to have brought a groundless accusation is to say they are sorry for it and withdraw the charge; and that, if Mr. Bradlaugh would consent to behave like a gentleman, he would save his pocket. Mr. Bradlaugh, however, fell back on the astonishing and almost Gladstonian plea that he had never made any such charge at all, and that his letter was fairly susceptible of a meaning not defamatory of Mr. Peters. The jury were, therefore, obliged to give Mr. Peters a substantial verdict.

Even Mr. Bradlaugh was not audacious enough to persevere in his charge against Lord Salisbury, which now appears to have been as wanton as it was absurd. Its only importance is this, that it was a charge which Mr. Bradlaugh had made a great many times with transpontine solemnity, and which it is clear that he was silly enough to believe in. We now know on what sort of evidence Mr. Bradlaugh satisfies himself that his political opponents are guilty of corrupt and mendacious behaviour. When he asks for a Select Committee to investigate his charge of bribery against the Corporation of London, the House of Commons will do well to remember that he also wanted a Select Committee to investigate the charge against Lord Salisbury which broke down so ludicrously on Wednesday.

THE POLICE COURTS.

The opening of a new police court at Dalston, where "the inadequacy of accommodation was at once recognized by all having business at the court," with the consequent appointment of two additional magistrates—Mr. Horace Smith and Mr. Bros—only carries out the recommendation of Lord Rosebery's Committee, which sat about seven years ago. The change is doubtless a desirable, and even a necessary, one. But most Londoners would be better pleased by an improvement in the quality than by an increase in the number of police magistrates. Some of them are very old men, and only a few are really equal to the difficult duties which they have to discharge. Mr. Montagu Williams, who is perhaps the shrewdest of them all, though he cultivates an unfortunate taste for playing to the gallery, has brought himself into a position from which, if he does not emerge with honour, he cannot escape without ignominy. That question remains to be decided. In the meantime we may take, as we have so often taken before, a comprehensive survey of recent cases in the magisterial courts. The critical eye ought to be periodically turned upon tribunals which have far more influence upon the daily lives of Her Majesty's subjects than the High Court of Justice, or, for that matter, the High Court of Parliament. It is unnecessary for us to disclaim sympathy with [illegible] upon a police force which Mr. Gladstone has [illegible] as "admirable," [illegible] of Bow Street, [illegible] re-[illegible] upon the [illegible] ought to be punished [illegible] by precept and example, to a ruffian named JOHN CREED, who kicked and bit a constable in Battersea, policemen who commit assaults themselves ought not to escape with a nominal penalty. The offence of P.C. DAVID HOWELLS, 80 A, does not seem to us to have been adequately treated by Mr. D'EYNCOURT with a fine of one pound. HOWELLS made a wanton attack upon a chimney-sweep in Grosvenor Gardens at an early hour of the morning on the 5th of April. The principle of "I'll larn ye to be a twoad" must not be applied to chimney-sweeps, who pursue a highly respectable calling, and prevent more destruction of property by fire than many brigades. According to the evidence, HOWELLS first anathematized the sweep, then struck him, and then took him into custody on a charge of assault. Of course the sweep defended himself when assailed; but it is no disgrace for an Englishman in any walk of life to know what to do with his fists. Mr. D'EYNCOURT considered that "some allowance might be "made for the irritation of the moment," which, so far as the sweep's conduct is concerned, is perfectly true. But why should a constable, even of the superior A Division, be irritated at the sight of a chimney-sweep walking down Grosvenor Gardens between three and four o'clock in the morning?

Mr. SLADE had before him at Southwark on Tuesday a case which he accurately described as "extraordinary." When POPE said that a little knowledge was a dangerous thing, he was referring to literature, and not to law. A little knowledge of law would certainly have been beneficial to Mr. and Mrs. JAMES LANG, one of whom has done six months "hard" for bigamy, while the other has been committed for trial on a similar charge. As Mrs. LANG has not yet been convicted, it will be proper to maintain a decent degree of reticence and reserve. But, unless the evidence of GEORGE DAWSON, which was given "very un-"willingly," be a reluctant fabrication, marriage does not seem to be quite understood in the Borough, either as a divine institution or a legal status. GEORGE had been an admirer of ROSINA'S for some years, when he suddenly heard that she was LANG'S wife. The information came to him on the best authority, for he had it from LANG himself, with the addition that the happy bridegroom did not care how soon he was off his bargain. For two pounds, he said, "he would burn their marriage "certificate, and thus put an end to their matrimonial "engagement." It may be surmised that neither LANG nor DAWSON expressed himself with the elegance of the reporter. But the treaty was concluded, and ROSINA, less difficult than the American Senate, ratified it on Whit Sunday at Trinity Church, Newington. When, however, LANG afterwards tried to extort another ten pounds by threatening a prosecution, her frugal mind revolted, and the trio went to Stones End Police Station, where the Inspector rather ungallantly selected the lady for arrest. In the meantime LANG had "gone through the form of "marriage" with somebody else, and served six months for her after the event, instead of seven years before it. Of course, if LANG misled the second lady, he deserved what he got. Otherwise his punishment was a rather severe interlude in a comedy of irregular relations. WILLIAM JENKINS, on the other hand, who attacked a respectable woman in Regent Street, struck her in the face, knocked her down, and, to save himself from the consequences of his brutality, falsely charged her with solicitation, received from Mr. NEWTON a sentence of only six weeks' hard labour. A worse outrage it would be difficult to imagine, or one which more imperatively called for the highest penalty in the power of the magistrate to inflict. Nor do we agree with Mr. D'EYNCOURT in thinking that a fine of forty shillings is sufficient punishment for deliberately chipping bits of stone off the ancient credence table in the St. Erasmus Chapel of Westminster Abbey with the end of an umbrella. The Reverend WATKIN DAVIES, who did this, said that he was only collecting relics. Mr. DAVIES is presumptively a man of education, and his offence was aggravated by his cloth. It will be impossible to protect ancient fabrics if magistrates are not sterner than Mr. D'EYNCOURT with those who wilfully mutilate them.

THOSE WICKED TORIES.

AMID the crowd of political speeches which were delivered last Wednesday there were none more instructive than, in their several ways, were those of Mr. GOSCHEN and Sir GEORGE TREVELYAN. The criticisms of the former and their quite unconscious justification by the latter set before us as lively a picture of the English party system in its degradation as it would be possible to give within so comparatively small a compass. The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER is a shrewd and close observer of the tactics of his adversaries, and the account given by him of the various phases through which the party attitude of the Opposition has passed was distinguished by an amount of veracity as well as by a point and force which must impress it even upon the most incurious student of contemporary politics. Nothing could be more eloquent of the miserable moral plight to which the Opposition are reduced than the history of their dealings hitherto with the Budget and the Local Government Bill. The followers of Mr. GLADSTONE are factious; but they are human. They are capable of being surprised into approval of the legislation of their adversaries when it really is legislation to which they can take no serious objection; and it was just this sort of incautious commendation which was won from them by the two measures in question. Mr. HERBERT GLADSTONE was so young a Parliamentary hand as to describe the Budget as a "Liberal" one, and Mr. STANSFELD, allowing for a moment the administrative reformer to get the better of the partisan, declared that the Local Government Bill was good enough—the highest praise he could think of—to have been introduced by himself. But what has happened since then? The Budget has ceased to be a "Liberal" Budget, and has become a "rich man's "Budget." The Local Government Bill has changed from "a fairly Radical measure" into a "gross Tory measure, "with a democratic veneer"; and Mr. STANSFELD himself has come to the conclusion that "a careful examination of "its details has led to a considerable modification of the "favourable view with which it had been regarded by the "bulk of the Liberal party."

Of course, the particular process by which this change has taken place is in the case of the "bulk of the Liberal "party" contemptibly intelligible. The "bulk of the "Liberal party" have never committed themselves at all—and never do, on this question or any other. No well-conducted "item" would think of doing so until he was sure of his leader's intended line; and in the meantime he leaves the impulsive STANSFELDS of the party to commit themselves as deeply as they please. The opposition of the "bulk of the party" means no more than that they have got, or think they have got, their cue. Where the working of the venom of factiousness is really worth studying—and the only quarter in which it is—is in the mind of a man who, like Sir GEORGE TREVELYAN, has a reason for the faith that is in him, and brings intelligence and conscience to the task of deciding upon and defending his line of political action. And Sir GEORGE TREVELYAN has obligingly laid open his mind to us on this subject in an address to his constituents at Glasgow. He has let us into the whole secret of the manner in which a Liberal qualifies himself for opposing measures based by a Conservative Government on principles which have been consistently—or, at least, with a consistency measured by their terms of office—upheld by himself and his party. Sir GEORGE'S justification is that the astute and wicked Conservatives, when they perceive that any of our institutions are in danger, are wont to arrive at the criminal conclusion that they will be more defensible if "put into a new shape"; and then they proceed, do these MACHIAVELLIS, to put them into a new shape accordingly. But how? Observe their diabolical cunning. They do so "in such a manner as to "preserve abuses which could not be preserved by any "other method; and, what was even worse, to give these "abuses a sort of varnish of popularity by including them "in what professed to be a measure of reform." The shape is to be a "new shape." Yet it is to contain the old abuses; and the institution which these abuses presumably made it difficult to defend is to be made "more "defensible" by a process which involves their careful preservation—wonderful! And all this is done within the four corners of the Local Government Bill; a measure which, one would think therefore, must be such a masterpiece of fraud and guile that the first duty of any honest Liberal would be to offer it his uncompromising opposition. But no, says Sir GEORGE TREVELYAN, that is not to be the course adopted. The Liberal party "must not oppose the Local "Government Bill; on the contrary, they must help it "forward all they could." It established "a freely and "rationally elected Council in every county," and must therefore be accepted, but only in the sort of way in which we should accept a gift from the hand of a malicious genie who was watching his opportunity to destroy us. Such is the sort of stuff which, when once you have got the party spirit "in your bones," as Sir GEORGE TREVELYAN has, can find lodgment in an able and cultivated mind. It is a state as melancholy as a belief in witchcraft.

TAYLOR v. MILLS.

THE end of the case of TAYLOR v. MILLS may perhaps serve as a warning to amateur public prosecutors. It ought to convince them that some art is required to discharge the duties of the place. If the trial also causes them to reflect on the dangers, not only to their purse but to their morals, incurred by the weaker kind of virtuous persons who will rush into the difficult sport of criminal hunting, it may prove to possess an extended usefulness. When the mere details and fringes of the case are neglected, as they well can be, it presents a very simple story. Mr. MILLS, Secretary of the Paddington Vigilance Committee, was obviously anxious to justify his existence, and prove that he did not hold his office in vain; so he cast about him for somebody to make an example of. No doubt Mr. MILLS was unconscious of the fact that he was more anxious to find crime than to prevent it; and not being, manifestly, in the habit of analysing his own motives, he did not see what a terrible risk there was that he would suddenly find himself inventing the offence he could not discover. But that is precisely what makes Mr. MILLS's case so tragic and instructive. Being inflamed with zeal for social purity, he saw something which caused him to suspect that Mrs. TAYLOR kept a disorderly house. The suspicion matured rapidly in the hothouse of Mr. MILLS's imagination on a soil copiously manured by the nasty people who are always raking the gutter in the name of purity. It became a certainty, and very soon Mr. MILLS began to give expression to it in public places. Then he broke into Mrs. TAYLOR's house, with the help of a policeman and two other men, and behaved with the insolent violence natural to the unco guid. When Mrs. TAYLOR took legal proceedings, the excellence of Mr. MILLS's motives unfortunately led him into further errors. Being, after the manner of the pious, sure that he was right, he took measures to prove it, which Mr. Justice DAY described in terms of some severity. "Then," said the Judge, "there is "the letter written by the defendant to CHARMAN to "suggest that he should come and forswear himself. Can "you imagine anything more wicked? That you may take "into consideration when you consider whether or not "the charge was made maliciously." The jury did; and Mr. MILLS at the end of his exertions in the cause of virtue found himself fined 180*l.*, besides his costs, which will be something; he had the unpleasant experience of cutting a rather contemptible figure in court, and, as we hope, at least for his soul's sake, the bitterness of reflecting that he had made a most extraordinary fool of himself. In the public interest the thing could hardly have ended better. A snub has been given to the rather nauseous pack of gushers who are always prowling in search of offensive things, and the nature of their proceeding has been excellently shown. We see them swallowing lies, sneaking, bullying, encouraging witnesses to forswear themselves, and finally making an abject display of themselves in court. This is as it should be, for it is not enough that this kind of thing should be punished. It ought also to be made ridiculous. Mr. MILLS has managed to go through both experiences.

STRANGERS IN THE HOUSE.

WE do not wish to anticipate the conclusions of the Select Committee of the House of Commons on the [illegible] of strangers; but enough has been disclosed [illegible] the evidence to reveal a very unsatisfactory con[illegible] things. The system which prevails, and which has [illegible] with additional, though we think misdirected, [illegible] during the last few years, is manifestly obnoxious [illegible] complaint that it excludes those strangers [illegible] be admitted and admits those whom it is [illegible] exclude. The complaint of the foreign [illegible] has recently made itself heard [illegible] undoubtedly a reasonable one. [illegible] those which it would be at once easiest and safest for a dynamiter to assume; and that the question, therefore, of allowing the complainant free access to the precincts of the House is one by no means free from difficulty. Still, systems exist to overcome difficulties, and it ought to be possible to devise such regulations as, without unduly restricting, as at present, the facilities of the foreign Correspondent and others whose business takes them to Westminster on a similar errand, might effectually provide for the security of the House. It cannot be said, at any rate, that that security is so complete at present as to make it hazardous to meddle with existing regulations. The public, indeed, were aware already that this is far from being the case. How far they have probably had no adequate conception until enlightened by the testimony of police and other experts before the Select Committee. The whole of the evidence of Mr. MONRO, the Assistant-Commissioner of Police, is most uncomfortable reading; and his account of the ease with which MELVILLE and his companion, two men known to, and at that very moment under the surveillance of, the police, obtained admission to the House is particularly calculated to give a shock to the mind of many a member not justly chargeable with undue nervousness of temperament.

As to the "Strange Case of Mr. JOSEPH NOLAN and "General MILLEN," it would be obviously proper for the present to reserve our comments. Mr. NOLAN has had an opportunity of making one statement before the Select Committee, but he has not yet received a copy of Mr. MONRO's evidence, and he may wish, after having seen it, to add something to the former statement. As matters stand at present, we have only to record the fact that his allegations are in direct conflict with those of the official in question. Mr. MONRO has distinctly stated, apparently as matter within his professional knowledge, that "General MILLEN was in communication with "Mr. JOSEPH NOLAN by means of letters conveyed by "MILLEN's daughters, who were then in London and "under observation," and that one of those letters was an introduction of the dynamite conspirator MELVILLE, who, with HARKINS—the man since convicted at the Central Criminal Court—obtained admission through Mr. NOLAN to the House of Commons. Mr. NOLAN, however, emphatically denies that he was in correspondence with General MILLEN through his daughters. He admits to knowing the General, "though he had never heard that he "had any connexion with the dynamite party"; and he does not deny an acquaintance with the ladies "under ob-"servation," though he protests, strangely enough, that he was unaware of their being the General's daughters. He knew the General "only by repute" as an officer in the Mexican army and as "Correspondent of the New York "Herald"—here, by the way, is an incidental illustration of one of our remarks above on the subject of foreign Correspondents—but had only once seen him, on the occasion of the General's calling upon him at his own house. We cannot pretend to think that Mr. NOLAN's explanations thus far are as informing as could be wished; but the more complete he may succeed in making them hereafter the greater, as it seems to us, is the risk to which the present lax system of admission exposes the House of Commons. For, if Mr. NOLAN can admit dynamiters to the House without knowing them, surely the very elect may be deceived.

A TORPEDO SCHOOL.

MODERN warfare is nothing if not scientific. The days are past when a British officer outside the scientific branches could think it a point of professional honour not to know one end of a gun from the other; somewhat as in the same days the judges of the Courts at Westminster still ostentatiously disclaimed all knowledge of the principles and practice of Courts of Equity. Meanwhile the scientific branches themselves have had enough to do to keep pace with what is required of them. Not only they have repeatedly changed their material within the [illegible] but they have evolved new varieties of work which [illegible] to become species. Not the least remarkable of these [illegible] submarine mining, on whose neutral or amphibious [illegible] a kind of foreshore, the land and sea services [illegible] civilian's first view are inextricably mixed up. [illegible] over, it is true, that the Royal Navy and the [illegible] not sacrifice their [illegible] be noted. [illegible] natural man is introduced to a station where submarine mining and torpedo instruction are going on, his notions are towards questionings of a perplexed and even Ollendorffian kind. "Did you say that the captain in the red coat commanded the men in the blue guernseys and sea-boots? Yes, but the friend of the lieutenant does not think that the spurs of the adjutant were given him to ride a sea-horse. Will you stay in the lecture-ship of the navy or take soundings in the steam launch of the army? Is it the Army Regulation Act or the Naval Discipline Act that makes them go to sea in their best patrol jackets? Was it not the midshipman who left the strictly confidential torpedo manual in the guard-room? No, it was the orderly corporal who left the gunnery instructions in the countermine launch."

Red jackets and gold lace among sea-boots redolent of tallow, spurs tripping up among wire cables, company parade and marching off in fours to practise loading mine-cases; it would have been shocking and bewildering to the old school of military smartness, and in some ways it does seem odd to civilian ignorance. However, there is plenty of method in it, as we shall discover if we can give ourselves up to a competent guide for a day or two. The military part of the business consists in defending the approaches to the harbour or strong place in question by means of a "mine-field." But what is a mine-field? Our easiest way of understanding this will be to adjourn to the roomy old line-of-battle ship which has been converted into a school of torpedo work, and is thus indirectly a more potent engine of war than she ever was in her active days. As we step up, there is another boat alongside, her gunwales loaded with odd pumpkin-shaped red cases, like a nightmare of something between slung boats and stowed hammocks. We shall presently learn what they mean. Our guide conducts us through spotless decks adorned with instantaneous photographs of many submarine explosions, including the great blowing up of Hell Gate in New York harbour, and we find ourselves in a place too neatly kept to belong to anything but a Queen's ship, and yet strangely remote from the traditions of naval literature. It is a spacious lecture-room, with plenty of air and light, where a thoughtful Admiralty has provided the sailor studious of torpedoes with softly-cushioned benches, ἵνα μὴ τρίβῃ τὴν ἐν Σαλαμῖνι. The decoration consists of what appear to be festoons of small fireworks. A good-sized aquarium-tank is the first thing that catches our attention at the level of the eye; but for fish there are miniature specimens of those red cases floating about in it, and, when we look more closely, they are not floating freely, but moored by sinkers, and further attached to cords which converge to smaller and differently shaped cases resting upon the bottom. This is the model of a mine-field; it shows how the submarine mines are disposed in alternate order, line behind line, to close a channel; how each mine is kept floating at the depth at which it will touch the bottom of a ship passing over it (a depth which has to be fixed by most careful soundings); and how every one is connected by its own branch cable with a main conducting cable laid out from the station on shore. There are various ways of firing submarine mines. Purely mechanical means were employed with the older types of "infernal machines," as they were then called; the impact of the vessel might start a weight which fell and fired a gun-lock, or it might break a chemical fuse in which the ingredients of an inflaming or exploding mixture were kept apart. Torpedoes of this kind may be still useful under special circumstances; but they have the drawbacks of not discerning friends from foes, and of being dangerous to remove when it is desired to reopen navigation, besides which experience has shown them to be uncertain in their action. In the modern school "electro-contact" apparatus is preferred; here the disturbance of the mine completes an electrical circuit, for which purpose there is a choice of ingenious devices; the land service has a rather complex and costly one, and gains by it the power of testing the electrical condition of the connexions after the mine is in position; the naval experts seem to prefer simplicity, which, however, does not prevent them from having one or two vastly pretty electro-mechanical conceits by way of precaution against the effects of countermines. The completion of this circuit may be made to fire the mine at once; but generally the better way is to make it signal the contact to the observer at the station on shore, who can then at will complete the firing circuit with an innocent-looking instrument called a firing-key. Every mine, of course, can be separately identified and controlled in the operating-room, or "test-room," as it is officially called. Besides these methods, there is an extremely neat system of bringing a submarine mine to full-cock (we have explained that one's land and sea metaphors get mixed) by telescopic observation of the vessel's course. Certain arrangements in connexion with the observer's telescope are so ordered that the circuit is automatically completed, all but the firing-key, as the vessel comes over a mine, unless, indeed, the operator, notified that an enemy's ship is under observation, has put down the firing-key already, in which case the mine will be exploded without any further specific motion. This method is useful where it is desired to keep a channel open for friendly vessels during hostilities.

As our guide explains these things, his exposition is enforced at appropriate moments by the detonation of the little fuses which adorn various parts of the room; they are in circuit with the [illegible] and models of [illegible], and form a [illegible] for lecture-[illegible]. But [illegible]. The British navy has had more to do with attack than with defence in active service, and we hope it may still be so. Submarine mines are, therefore, interesting to the naval officer chiefly as a subject of experiments with countermines. Given a channel guarded by a properly disposed mine-field, the channel is impassable until the mines are rendered harmless. This may be done either by acting against the connecting cables or by acting against the mines themselves. Cables may be fished for with specially constructed grapnels, armed with small charges of gun-cotton. When the cable is secured, the explosion of the charge will convert some feet of it into a shapeless tangle of cord and wire, and effectually destroy its conducting qualities. The operation of "creeping" for an enemy's cable has a general resemblance to seine fishing, or "drifting"; there is a more summary variety of it, which can be performed under fire, if necessary, with a grapnel of wider reach. The other, and greater, operation is to attack the enemy's mines bodily, and destroy them by the explosion of countermines. A "countermine launch"—such a boat as we have seen alongside—is towed by a steam pinnace across the mined region. The mine-cases which she carries are automatically dropped at regular intervals, paying out their connecting wires as they go. When this is done; the whole are simultaneously exploded, and the concussion explodes the enemy's mines, or destroys their connexions, thus leaving a clear passage for the attacking fleet. Hence the need for the defending engineer of not leaving his mine-field to take care of itself. He must protect it with quick-firing and machine guns against the counterminer no less than a ship of war must protect herself against the torpedo-boat. The sailor will on his side watch his advantage in thick nights and any other favourable accident. He has, moreover, a trump card—if he can play it—in the steam-pinnace which a ship can send out on a little countermining expedition without a soul on board, her direction and speed being controlled from the ship by electro-magnetic mechanism. Do you doubt the fact? See here the working model of the gear, and be convinced.

With all this electricity at hand, the hospitality of the British navy could not omit to provide the usual electrical toys for the benefit of casual visitors. Accordingly we have a smaller open tank over which lowers a cotton wool thunder-cloud, and the improvident ship which has gone to sea without a lightning conductor is wrecked with the proper sulphurous odour noted by Homer—ἐν δὲ θεείου πλῆτο—and the additional terror of her magazine, a detonator chosen for loudness, blowing up. Vacuum discharge-tubes, electro-magnets, and so forth will amply relieve the mind of any one who feels overstrained by serious attention to torpedoes.

It seems, however, that the sailor reserves a special affection for his Whitehead torpedo—a delight and a secret in which the miners of the land service have no part. He expatiates on recent improvements in its fish-like lines; he conducts you with special pride to the lecture-room appropriated to it; he shows you a beautiful working model of the latest invention for launching it from a boat. Other moving torpedoes have been invented and praised, but the British sailor's heart is true to his Whitehead. One could suspect him of addressing sentimental songs to it when the marines are out of hearing. His affection for gun-cotton does not rise to the same height of enthusiasm, but takes rank with the steady conservative instincts of our service. Dynamite has no charms for the nautical mind; it is unpleasant to handle, and less safe and convenient than gun-cotton. By the way, you need not have given such a wide berth to those sappers who were practising the operation of loading mines; an innocent dummy composition is used for drill purposes instead of the compressed slabs of the real explosive.

If we choose to moralize on the cost and the unknown perils of modern war we are quite free to do so; but our guide will be even with us. He will point out that torpedoes are really much more humane than broadsides. The old-fashioned cannonading at close quarters between fully-manned ships was inevitably murderous. A ship disabled by a submarine mine would be very unlikely to sink instantly, and her crew would have a fair chance of escape. The torpedo, formerly denounced as treacherous, comes nearer to fulfilling the ideal law of war than the gun; it strikes at the enemy's means of offence, not at his life. Perhaps we should like to come out and take soundings in the mine-field to-morrow. It is a fair offer; and the gentle stranger may do well to accept it if he is of those who enjoy sea-fishing in a calm.

MR. GLADSTONE'S NINE POINTS.

THE past week has been a week of satisfactions of different kinds. The deceased wife's sister may have been satisfied with her oft-obtained, oft-delusive majority; and Mr. Bradlaugh certainly ought to be satisfied with his damages, which are perhaps the least ever imposed for a set of proceedings including, as Mr. Bradlaugh himself very handsomely acknowledges now, an absolutely unfounded charge against the Prime Minister of England of conduct than which in a Prime Minister nothing could be more disgraceful. If the speech-thirsty British public was not satisfied with at least five platform speeches on one evening from Cabinet Ministers or ex-Ministers of Cabinet rank, it ought to have been. Finally, the Midlothian Liberal-Unionists have certainly reason to be satisfied with the results of their correspondence with Mr. Gladstone; and [illegible] stonians profess to be satisfied likewise with the result of that "impertinence," as it is called in Gladstonian lingo, it may almost be concluded that everybody is happy.

It is particularly fortunate that we have published declarations of the satisfaction of Mr. Gladstone and the Gladstonians with the Midlothian documents; because, without them, a body might have arrived at a rather different conclusion. To begin with, except to persons of the calmness of the immortal Mr. Gregsbury, the communication received from Midlothian by Midlothian's representative would have seemed a rather unpleasant one. The signers are none of your pestilent Tories, but all faithful Liberals of the purest water, and some of them, if we mistake not, are persons who were very influential in procuring for Mr. Gladstone the last of his very singular series of seats. They are almost extravagantly polite and 'umble to the very using of that word in suggesting to their distinguished representative that them, at any rate, he most decidedly does not represent—no, nor himself as he was at a remarkably recent period. They make the finest of congees as they accuse him of tergiversation—that political vice which Canning, when it was charged on him in Parliament, resented by rising, "pale as death," and saying, "That is a Lie!" unchecked by the Speaker and unchallenged by his opponent in those days of challenges. And the things that they say are dreadfully true things. They respectfully remind their great member that, "owing to his many onerous duties, they have not enjoyed the opportunities usual to electors, of meeting their representative from time to time, and hearing from him an explanation of the course pursued by him." Now this is particularly unkind, because, as is well known, Mr. Gladstone has had remarkably few calls on his time for very many months past—has been, indeed, relieved by a grateful nation, pitying his age, of the toils of government, and might have afforded opportunities to the electors of Midlothian as often as ever he and they liked. And his omission to afford these really is, when one comes to think of it, a little for thoughts. But these bold, bad men go on to relieve Mr. Gladstone's mind. It is not of "his new policy of repealing the Union" that they want to talk. These guileless ones, though not pardoning, accept the fact of the "new policy." But they did expect, "they entertained the confident expectation," that the country, having said "No; we do not like the new policy," Mr. Gladstone would "use his influence to promote law and order." Alas! alas! unblessed are they who expect such things from Mr. Gladstone, for they shall be, and have been, disappointed. "A Crimes Act has been passed much milder" than Mr. Gladstone's for the purpose of "suppressing anarchy." Again, they "expected" (ah! rustic men of Lothian, that river never defluet!) that he would "recommend obedience to it"—to an Act that was not his, that was opposed by him! They have, "with the deepest regret," noticed him pursuing a different course. They "cannot believe that it is his intention to defend the Plan of Campaign, or boycotting, or mutinous defiance and resistance to the law"; but they candidly tell him (ὦ μιαρὲ καὶ παμμίαρε καὶ μιαρώτατε Association!) "this is the impression universally produced." And as they "hold it to be the duty of every patriotic statesman to denounce such forms of crime," they "respectfully ask him to let it be known that boycotting, &c. are as hateful in his eyes now as when he introduced his Bills of 1881 and 1882." And they wind up thus:—

It humbly appears to us that freedom and justice to all classes and individuals have always hitherto been the watchwords of the Liberal party, and that lawless attacks on life and limb, on personal freedom to act and contract, and on private property are not excusable forms of political agitation, and cannot be encouraged or condoned by any section of the Liberal party without just forfeiture of public confidence.

Now we should not like it to go forth to the world that we approve or excuse the intolerable conduct of anybody who suggests that Mr. Gladstone has ever done what he should not do. The mildest terms we can think of as applicable to such a proceeding are those of the ingenious and ingenuous Mr. John Buncle, after telling how, when the illustrious Harriot Noel had finished her discourse on the Hebrew Bible, he snatched this beauty to his arms, and, without thinking what he did, imprinted on her balmy mouth half a dozen kisses. The action, indeed, was not like that of the Midlothian Association, but the stricture which follows fits exactly. "This was very wrong, and gave very great offence." It was very wrong, indeed, and it gave infinite offence; but Mr. Gladstone was more sorry than angry. He "perused with much pain" the wicked address. He is "afraid it would not contribute to mitigate the estrangement of feeling" if he were to answer in detail; and, to do him justice, he doesn't. He never "proposed to repeal the legislative Union," but only, it would seem, though he does not say so, to antiquate it. He has "made his sentiments known" authentically on all the points, which is indeed what the Association complains of. He is quite certain that to cry "Remember Mitchelstown" is to be "the mainstay of order in Ireland," while order is "threatened and endangered" by [illegible] Government has done. And he, too, winds up:—

[illegible] you hold out to me of appearing in the public journals, [illegible] correspondence, in controversy with a portion of my constituents [illegible] I have at an earlier date received valuable support is one [illegible] not have invited; but the act is theirs, and I am not [illegible] to it.

Nearly all [illegible]stone's correspondences please the soul, but [illegible] "Prisoner at the bar, what have you [illegible] my lord, that it would not [illegible] of feeling of which I am sorry, my lord, to see evidence in your lordship's conduct and the conduct of the witnesses and counsel for the Crown, if I were to answer." And, indeed, we don't think it would. Mr. Gladstone can take no share in repealing the Union, every line of his Home Rule Bill and of any possible Home Rule Bill being, in fact or in form, or in both, a repeal of some line in the Act establishing that legislative Union, while in its actual form Mr. Gladstone's Bill repealed the legislative Union simpliciter by excluding the Irish members from Imperial legislation. But even this, which Mr. Gladstone says, is not nearly so instructive and important as what he refuses to say. He refuses—more than refuses, by his reference to the very speeches of which his memorialists complain—to do and to say every one of those things which the petitioners ask him to say and to do. And, therefore, we have a perfect right to accept his refusal to affirm as a declaration of denial. Thus he (1) refuses to use his power and influence to promote order and submission to the law. He (2) refuses to recommend obedience to an Act of Parliament as long as it is the law. He (3) will not promise to cease from encouraging law-breaking and illegality. He (4) will not deny that it is his intention to defend the Plan of Campaign, boycotting, and mutinous resistance. He (5) does not think it the duty of a statesman to denounce such forms of dishonesty and crime. He (6) will not make it known in unmistakable terms that boycotting and all forms of intimidation, &c., are as hateful in his eyes as they were in 1881 and 1882. He (7) will not aid in protecting from a cruel tyranny those who are the subjects of agrarian and political oppression. He (8) refuses to endorse as watchwords of Liberalism freedom and justice to all classes and individuals; and he (9) declines to assent to the damnable doctrine and position that lawless attacks on life, on personal freedom to act and contract, and on private property, are not excusable forms of political agitation.

These nine points Mr. Gladstone was asked, totidem verbis, to pronounce upon, and he has distinctly pronounced by refusing pronouncement. Observe that if he accepts them, there was not the slightest reason why such an agile logician should not proclaim his acceptance, and still, and side by side with it, maintain his doctrine about legislative separation not being a repeal of legislative Union, his doctrine about Mitchelstown, and so forth. The propositions of the Liberal-Unionists of Midlothian had no party or particular colour, and did not mention Mitchelstown, Mr. O'Brien, or anything else. They are perfectly general, and a sufficiently convinced or sufficiently impudent person might take them all on book, or teacup, or anything else, and still maintain that in the particular cases Mr. Balfour is a sanguinary lawbreaker and the slayers of Fitzmaurice amiable victims. If, therefore, Mr. Gladstone does not do this, if he will not take the test even with this qualification, it must be because the test per se revolts his stomach. And we have seen what that test is, and what its refusal implies. If what Mr. Gladstone, Sir William Harcourt, Mr. John Morley, Sir George Trevelyan, and the rest constantly declare is true, it could be taken by any one of them; if what we and other Unionists say is true, it could not, we frankly own, be taken by any one of them honestly. Mr. Gladstone has now publicly declined to take it, and has referred to the very statements from which doubts of his orthodoxy were inferred as clearing him from heterodoxy; while, but a day or two later, he has publicly condoled with an Irish magistrate who was very properly suspended from the Commission for the insolent folly of "counter-proclaiming" a proclaimed meeting. We cannot presume to say whether the "expectation" of the Midlothian Unionists was as childlike and bland as their letter declares. But they must have been very sanguine, indeed, if they expected a greater triumph than this over one of the slipperiest, if not one of the strongest, of controversialists. "Will you advise obedience to the law, denounce anarchy and tyranny, proclaim personal freedom, and so forth?" say they. "No; I will not," says Mr. Gladstone.

LAST TERM AT CAMBRIDGE.

It is always rash to say of a given event that nothing like it has ever taken place; but for once we feel safe from all charge of exaggeration when we affirm that the University of Cambridge has never had such a scare as was caused by the late female invasion. For the present the capital is safe; Princess Ida and her bevy of fair aspirants to academic degrees, who were crying out a few weeks since, like Hannibal of old,

> actum nihil est, nisi Pœno milite portas
> Frangimus, et mediâ vexillum pono Suburrâ, are contenting themselves with less ancient, but more elastic, Universities; and the conscript fathers can still pace their gardens and their cloisters in comparative seclusion. Not that things are as they were of old. Married Fellows; married tutors living in the precincts of the colleges, in one college actually in rooms which only a few months ago were inhabited by bachelors, and now have been ingeniously converted into a house; young ladies sitting in lecture-rooms side by side with young gentlemen, and conning Plato or dissecting snails in sweet communion [illegible] souls, are signs of the times which only the wilfully [illegible] to read. Still, the danger of danger—a [illegible] for the moment passed away. But [illegible] imagination. At one time it looked [illegible] be, as usual, on the side of the [illegible] centre, [illegible] proper on a field argent—mustered some two thousand strong, and was supported, to right and left, by a thousand knights, valiant and distinguished, some of whom had gone over to the enemy, some hailed from other centres. To this formidable army the Senate could oppose at most about 2,000 men; but when they came to be examined it appeared that they were veterans of approved valour, who might be sent into the field without fear of the result. Thanks to diplomacy a contest was avoided, and some years will probably elapse before the attack is renewed. To be serious—the Council of the Senate received no fewer than eight memorials from women and their supporters, inquiring "whether the time has not now come for a further important step in the work of aiding and directing the higher education of women, in which your University has taken so important a part"; and, after further preamble, praying that Cambridge would grant "her degrees to those women who pass her Honour examinations." Our quotation is from the first memorial; but, whichever document be selected, the thing asked for is the same. These prayers were met by two counter-petitions. One was a clear uncompromising No. It expressed "an earnest hope that no steps will be taken by the University towards the admission of women to membership and degrees." The other, more courteous, but also more insidious, affected an interest in the progress of woman to perfection, and committed itself to the two following statements:—

I. That to tie permanently the Higher Education of Women to the Higher Education of Men by granting the Membership and Degrees of the University of Cambridge to Women would be detrimental to the interests of the Education of Women.

II. That if Degrees are granted to Women in connexion with the Examinations of the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge, they should be conferred by some independent authority, in a position to consider the various educational problems which would arise from the point of view of Women's education especially.

The Council gave much time and thought to the matter before making any communication to the Senate. Not only did they feel the gravity of the situation, but they were not unanimous in their views of resistance. Their Report (dated March 5) is a very able document, perhaps the best that could, under the circumstances, have been issued. After a cordial recognition of the success which had attended the admission of women to examinations, they point out that the prayers of the memorialists cannot be granted without obtaining new powers, and changing the constitution of the University. In the next place, they show that the memorials against female admission to degrees contain the names of more members of the Senate than those in favour of them; and that many of these are persons "who have shown in various ways their sympathy with the efforts which have been made to improve education in general, and the education of women in particular." Under these circumstances they decline to recommend the appointment of a Syndicate to consider the changes, &c., that would be necessary; and then, passing to the second paragraph of the memorial above quoted, they draw attention to the support the scheme there suggested had already received, and the hearty co-operation it would probably meet with in the future, but conclude that such object could not be "forwarded by any present action on their part." So all is over for the present, and we are glad that the matter has terminated with but little irritation on either side. If severe logic were a safe guide to follow in such matters, women who pass Honour examinations with distinction ought of course to receive their reward in the same way as men do; but the practical difficulties are insuperable. If the degree be granted, where are we to stop? If we have spinsters in Arts—we cannot call them bachelors—why not mistresses in the same faculty? Those would in due course become members of the Senate and have a share in the government of the University. A lady might in these days share the delicate labours of the Proctorial Syndicate—perhaps even be Proctor—with success; but we are afraid that such promotion would be the signal for inextinguishable discord, and destroy what little peace is left to the University amid the many movements that harass it.

Speaking of movements, the promoters of the organization against the contribution paid by the colleges to the University, to which we drew attention a year ago (see Saturday Review for April 2, 1877), have now formulated their views. At a meeting of Heads and Bursars held at Peterhouse Lodge, November 24, 1887, the following resolutions were adopted:—

I. That, in the opinion of this Meeting, the diminution which has taken place in the aggregate income of the Colleges is sufficient to justify an application to the Chancellor in accordance with the provisions of Statute B, chapter I. section 2, with the view of securing a reduction for the years 1888–1890 of the contribution to the Common University Fund required from the Colleges under that Statute, so far as the charges to which the University is at present pledged, and which necessarily fall upon that Fund, will admit.

II. That, in the opinion of this Meeting, it is desirable that steps be taken to obtain an Amendment of Statute B, whereby the augmentation of the Contribution of the Colleges to the Common University Fund prescribed by Statute B, chapter I. section 2, may be suspended for ten years after 1890.

These resolutions were subscribed by 181 members of the Governing Bodies of the colleges, of whom 170 approved both resolutions, and 11 the first resolution only. On the other hand, those who are content with the existing state of things have adopted the following opinion. It received 67 signatures:—

That, inasmuch as (1) the remedy provided by Statute to meet depression, and (2) remedies which lie within the sphere of action of Colleges, have not been tried and found inadequate, it is not justifiable to alter recent Statutes regulating the contribution of the Colleges to the University.

These statements, with the signatures, having been forwarded to the Vice-Chancellor, are published in the University Reporter, and it is understood that the malcontents, as they may conveniently be termed, propose to take action at no distant date. Their mode of procedure has not yet transpired. Had they been content with their first resolution, the remedy sanctioned by the Statutes would suffice. It is therein provided:—

That, in case it appears at any time hereafter to the Financial Board that the aggregate income of the Colleges has fallen so low that the contribution required under this chapter would be an excessive burden upon the Colleges, the Chancellor may, upon the application of the Financial Board, inquire into the matter; and, if he be satisfied that the fact is so, he may, at his discretion, direct that the amount to be levied under this chapter be diminished for any period not exceeding five years by any sum not exceeding one-fifth part of the minimum amount named in this chapter for each year of such period.

This, however, would clearly not satisfy the 170 who signed both resolutions; and it is an open secret that many—perhaps a majority—of them would gladly see a change even more radical than that suggested in their second resolution. We presume that they have carefully considered what the consequences would be if such a result were attained, and that, therefore, they wish the University not to take up the last moiety of the loan lately effected, not to build the Sedgwick Memorial Museum, nor the new buildings required for the Medical School, nor, what is perhaps still more important, to pay the full salaries of certain officials who, on the faith of the new Statutes, have accepted posts in the University. That many colleges have suffered severely from agricultural depression is well known; but, as the counter-resolution states, there are remedies which have not yet been tried, and it is to be hoped that the patriotism, even of non-resident Fellows, will not shrink, if necessary, from further sacrifices. It would be, indeed, a mournful spectacle if the University which took the lead in modern extension were to be the first to return to the old lines.

Meanwhile, it is pleasant to note that the new Chemical Laboratory is completed, and will shortly, in part at least, be occupied by students; and that Mr. Pearson's new west wing of the Library is rising rapidly. It promises to be a singularly beautiful and commodious building.

IGNATIUS SHACON.

If the ardent Shaconians who went to welcome their high priest, Mr. Donnelly, on the occasion of his first appearance here in public, were under the impression that the event would be celebrated by the final overthrow of their hated foes the Bakespearians, they must have been very much disappointed. The Hon. Ignatius Donnelly is not only the author of certain geological works and a distinguished statesman—the latter may be accepted on the authority of Mr. A. Watts, the President of the Bacon Society—but also a very prudent man. He is not going to "dethrone Shakspeare" merely for the love of the thing—very far from it. The world is warned that "the key to the cipher, and the text of the secret narrative disclosed by it, will be made public only in The Great Cryptogram," which will contain upwards of one thousand pages—whether quarto, or octavo, or "folio" is not stated—and Mr. Donnelly goes on to explain that "premature publication of the key would deprive both author and publisher of the protection of the copyright laws." This may or may not be the case; but an exceeding care about copyright is not an uncommon trait of those authors who are least likely to suffer from the piracy of their works; and Mr. Donnelly's bulky volume is not in such imminent danger as he seems to suppose. At all events, the hurling of the thunderbolt is postponed, and if the complete key to the cryptogram should prove as unintelligible as the specimen of it which Mr. Donnelly endeavoured to explain the other evening, every one will have cause to regret that the postponement is not indefinite. Mr. Donnelly's lecture was merely a reproduction of the material with which the students of Mrs. Henry Pott are already familiar. But if the matter was old the manner was sufficiently amusing. In the course of an introduction, lasting some three-quarters of an hour, Mr. Donnelly said that "he knew he was talking against a broad blank wall of national superstition." If, however, any one supposes that this distinguished statesman is appalled by the difficulty of his undertaking, he is very much mistaken. After a manner peculiarly transatlantic, Mr. Donnelly boldly compares himself—to the founder of Christianity and Galileo. Then comes the ponderous platitude that "the progress of mankind consisted in one generation undoing the mistakes and errors of the preceding generation." Poor Mr. Donnelly! Does he really believe that a generation will arise which will expend its energies in exposing his errors and mistakes? It is to be feared that the "self-sufficient gentlemen," the Shakspeare scholars (Mr. Donnelly with fine irony calls them microscopic men), are likely to keep "their noses turned up" for a long time. They will be slow to believe the theory "that William Shakspeare did not write the plays credited to him." At least, the glory of their conversion will belong to some one mightier than Mr. Donnelly. For the biographical and historical arguments—if, indeed, they deserve to be so called—amount in effect to this. The author of the plays hitherto attributed to William Shakspeare exhibits a wonderful knowledge of law. Shakspeare was not a lawyer, and his avocations were of a nature to prevent his having an opportunity of acquiring any knowledge of law. Therefore (a very loud and big therefore, for here at least Mr. Donnelly seemed conscious of a flaw in the argument), Francis Bacon, Lord Verulam, wrote the plays; he was a lawyer, and the only man of the age who could have done so. As to the Cryptogram, every one who has allowed himself to be amused by Mr. Donnelly's mathematical vagaries has already had the principles on which the cipher is worked explained in the pages of this Review and elsewhere. Those persons who have short memories, however, may be confidently referred to the fifth fit of Mr. Lewis Carroll's Hunting of the Snark, where the Butcher —no doubt unconsciously—describes the chief features of Mr. Donnelly's system to the Beaver with supreme felicity:—

> Taking Three as the subject to reason about—
> A convenient number to state—
> We add Seven and Ten, and then multiply out
> By One Thousand diminished by Eight.
>
> The result we proceed to divide as you see
> By Nine Hundred and Ninety and Two
> Then subtract Seventeen and the answer must be > Exactly and perfectly true.

Mr. Donnelly, it is true, does not take such a convenient number as three, nor does he, like the Butcher, explain > all the while, in a popular style,

> Which the Beaver could well understand.

In spite of his diagrams, he is not by any means so clear as could be desired. It may be admitted that he exhibits a perverse ingenuity in the manipulation of figures; but this talent, however diverting it may be to its possessor, is unfortunately all too common. Has Mr. Donnelly never heard of the cipher which proves that the Pope bears the mark of the beast indelibly stamped on him? If he has not, he will find any number of persons of Evangelical proclivities who will be ready to explain it in two minutes. The way in which Mr. Donnelly collects evidence is somewhat after this fashion. Any one can do it for himself. Take, for instance, the magic name Francis Bacon. The number of letters in the name is 12. Now Mr. Donnelly bases his system on the peculiarities of the Folio of 1623. If you add the digits of this number together, the result is also 12. Can anything be more convincing than that? We make Mr. Donnelly a present of the fact with much pleasure. Having collected a number of trivial coincidences of this kind, Mr. Donnelly has the amazing impudence to proclaim that his wretched theory is proved like a proposition of Euclid; and after that, if any one be bold enough to believe in Shakspeare, that person is, according to Mr. Donnelly, capable of believing in anything, even that "the universe came together by a fortuitous combination of atoms." There, the murder is out. The penalty of the obstinate sceptic who clings to his belief in Shakspeare is to be branded as an Atheist by Mr. Donnelly, the apostle of the new Shaconian religion and a distinguished statesman.

FRENCH PLAYS.

AS was to be imagined, the recently promulgated laws concerning divorce in France were soon seized upon by the Parisian playwriters, who are ever eager to avail themselves of important current events for the display of their peculiar talents. Already whilst the divorce laws were merely at their earliest stage of discussion, in 1880, that clever play Divorçons was produced, and in 1884 Un Divorce was acted with some success at the Vaudeville. But none of these plays—not to mention several by Augier and Dumas fils—La Femme de Claude and La Princesse Georges, for instance—have approached in brilliance and originality the unique work by MM. Bisson and Mars which was first acted at the Vaudeville, Paris, on the night of March 2, and in London at the Royalty on Monday evening. There is perhaps no event in human life which is so difficult to treat dramatically as divorce. It has to be handled very delicately; for in serious drama it is so apt to become ridiculous precisely where the author intends it to be most tragic, and vice versâ in comedy. MM. Bisson and Mars have treated this perilous subject, in Les Surprises du Divorce, with so much tact and good taste that not even the prudish can find cause for complaint. The piece, however, contains to our mind one glaring defect. The authors ask us from the start to believe that it is possible for a man, whose daughter has married with his consent a gentleman of some position, to himself become the husband of this son-in-law's recently divorced first wife without her knowing that she lately bore his name. If we can admit that so extraordinary a case can occur in real life, the rest is plain sailing. Victor Hugo, however, once said that if there was any particularly improbable situation in a drama the way to make it pass unobserved was to mask, as it were, [illegible]hood with minute and well-considered details. This [illegible] what MM. Bisson and Mars have not done. They [illegible] take a little too much for granted. Briefly rel[illegible] their charming comedy turns upon the ad[illegible]happy musical composer who has married the only [illegible]seuse. This mother-in-law is something wo[illegible]ional mère d'actrice; she is [illegible] [illegible] difference which is easily understood soon [illegible] on the stage when once her harsh, vulgar voice is heard boasting of her past triumphs, when as a disciple of Terpsichore she pirouetted before "the Khedive of Egypt and all the other Courts of Europe." It is still more forcibly made evident when, under the belief that she is providing her sensitive son-in-law's guests with a never-to-be-forgotten treat, she rushes in among them dressed in the scanty costume she wore when her form was less "massive," in her great character of the Sylphide. Mme. Bonivard—for so is this terrible personage called—is a remarkably well-drawn character. Duval can endure her no longer, and, exasperated beyond control by her antics, he proceeds to box her ears. Unfortunately his aim misses and he strikes his wife instead. A divorce ensues, and in due time M. Duval marries a charming girl named Gabrielle, who has no mother and only a father who is away on a prolonged journey in foreign parts. Peace dwells with the composer of serious operas, until in an evil hour his father-in-law returns and, to the surprise of all, a married man—married to no less a personage than the divorced wife, and bringing with him into the domestic circle once more that dreadful old lady the ex-Sylphide. The complications which ensue after this wonderfully droll situation is reached are contrived with an ingenuity which borders on genius, and the dénouement is reached amid continuous laughter. Needless to repeat the rest of the story or relate the circumstances which arise and enable the formidable Mme. Bonivard to bring about a second divorce and make up a third, and, let us hope, final marriage for her daughter with a young gentleman who is courageous enough to be not only son troisième, but also to embark for America with the mother-in-law. This amusing piece creates incessant laughter from the rise to the fall of the curtain. Its power of provoking merriment is supreme. The dialogue is singularly crisp and brilliant, and contains much unforced epigram and wit. The leading critics of Paris declare that M. Joly, who created the part in Paris, was "sublime" as Henri Duval. If M. Coquelin is not sublime, he 's superb. No character we have yet seen him act suits him so perfectly as this one, and possibly no actor—unless indeed it be Mr. Toole, when he chooses to do his best—now in England could approach M. Coquelin as this most distressed of sons-in-law. He plays with an earnest seriousness which is immeasurably comical. Words fail to describe his expression of abject horror when he beholds his old enemy return home. His hair seems actually to stand on end and his cheeks to bleach as with a loud cry he collapses upon the sofa, glaring with the astonished gaze of an Orestes at one of the Eumenides at the triumphant ex-ballerina and her comely daughter, his previous wife. It would be impossible to act better. Possibly the versatile Mme. Patry has not the unctuous style of that inimitable actress Mme. Grassot, but she played Mme. Bonivard with capital effect, and was especially droll in the well-contrived scene in which the ex-ballerina appears in the costume of La Sylphide. She has mastered all the smirks and smiles of the type she was representing to the life, and created unbounded amusement. Diane is a part which does not demand much acting, but Mlle. Barety made the most of it, and Mlle. Kerwich did the same by Gabrielle, another not particularly well-drawn character. M. Jean Coquelin was delightfully fresh and pleasant as the bold youth to whom love gives sufficient courage to enable him to become the third husband of the fair Diane. With Les Surprises du Divorce M. Meyer brings his season of French plays to a close. It has been unusually successful and entertaining.

THE STATE OF TRADE.

THE expectation of a great revival in trade, which was general five or six months ago, has not so far been realized. In the autumn, freights rose rapidly; a demand for new shipping sprang up; the exports of coal increased, and there was a considerable advance in prices, the rise in some of the metals, notably copper and tin, being quite extraordinary. It was hoped that the improvement thus made would continue, and that the new year would be one of the most prosperous that had been seen for a long time past. Scarcely, however, had the new year opened when political apprehensions were revived by the massing of Russian troops upon the German and Austrian frontiers and the scare that followed both in Germany and in Austria-Hungary. The death of the Emperor William, the grievous illness of the Emperor Frederick, and the Boulangist agitation in France, have all aided in increasing apprehension and uncertainty. The result is shown in the slackening of business in many quarters, and in a decline in the prices of several commodities. Taken altogether, prices, indeed, have been exceedingly well maintained during the first quarter of the year, but yet there is a fall not only in metals, but in coffee, cotton, and sugar. The fall in copper and tin, it is quite true, is very slight, when we consider the extraordinary rise that occurred a few months ago, and it is much that the general level of prices has been maintained; but the decline that has taken place shows that confidence is by no means as strong as it was a little while ago, and that many speculators who had bought largely towards the close of last year have lately been selling. And there is no [illegible] that market reports and trade circulars are much [illegible] than they lately were. But, if we turn from the [illegible] and trade circulars to the actual [illegible] situation will be seen not to be [illegible] months of the year the [illegible] those of the first quarter of [illegible] and the value of the exports of British and Irish produce and manufactures shows an increase of about 4¾ per cent. It is true that there was a heavy falling off in the re-exports of foreign and colonial produce, which brings down the percentage of increase in value, in the case of the whole of the exports, to about 3½ per cent.; but even that increase is not unsatisfactory, especially when we bear in mind that the month of March was so severe all over Europe and America that a great check was given to business. In the United States, indeed, for a whole week locomotion was practically stopped; and the stoppage of business transactions for a week in so great a commercial country as the United States had a very important effect upon business all over the world. Further, it is to be recollected that Good Friday fell in March this year, while last year it was in April, and that, therefore, there was a slackening of business towards the end of the month. Even more satisfactory, perhaps, than the Board of Trade Returns are the railway traffic returns for the three months. The returns of seventeen of the principal British and Irish railways show an increase in goods traffic of no less than 102,000*l.*; in passengers there is a decrease of 27,000*l.*; but the nett increase amounts to 75,000*l.*, and it is noteworthy that all the increase is from the carriage of goods. Lastly, we find that the Bankers' Clearing House Returns show for the last fifteen weeks an increase over the corresponding period of last year of 177,617,000*l.* This is largely due no doubt to the shifting of securities that resulted from the Conversion proposals, but there does appear to have been a decided increase in commercial business also.

A fortnight ago, when discussing the influence upon the money markets of the world of the accumulation of money in the United States Treasury, we referred to the apprehension that was excited throughout the United States last year, and the consequent rise in the rates of interest and discount until new railway construction was practically brought to an end. That, of course, caused a depression in the coal and iron trades at home, and it diminished greatly the American demand for European steel rails and for iron generally. The effect, therefore, of the monetary crisis of last year is making itself felt upon our trade at present. More important still, perhaps, is the influence of the bad harvests of last year both in America and in India. It was known at the time that the Indian corn-crop in the United States was a very bad one, and, in fact, there is a great falling off in the imports of maize from the United States into this country this year; but it would appear that the wheat-crop must also have been more deficient than the estimates framed at the time led the world to suppose. At any rate, there is a most remarkable decrease in the imports of wheat from the United States, as well as from India, while there is a most remarkable increase in the imports from Russia. The Indian wheat harvest was acknowledged to be short by the Government returns, but it would seem that the deficiency was increased by a failure of other crops in the wheat-growing districts and some neighbouring parts of the Empire, and the consumption of wheat has, therefore, been larger at home than in ordinary years; while it would seem that the low price of wheat in Europe has checked exports both from India and from the United States, where, owing to the deficiency, higher prices were demanded. For the first three months of the current year we find that the imports of wheat from the United States amounted to no more than 3,758,000 cwts., while in the corresponding quarter of last year they were as much as 9,355,000 cwts. There is thus a falling off of 5,697,000 cwts., or about 61 per cent. In other words, during the past three months we imported from the United States very little more than one-third of what we imported in the first three months of last year. The falling off is still more remarkable in the case of India. From India we imported in the first three months of last year 2,317,000 cwts. of wheat, while in the first three months of the current year we imported only 565,000 cwts. There has thus been a falling off of 1,752,000 cwts., or nearly 76 per cent. We barely imported, that is, one quarter as much this year as we did last year. On the other hand, we imported from Russia in the first quarter of last year barely 900,000 cwts., while in the first quarter of this year we imported as much as 3,464,000 cwts. We obtained from Russia, therefore, nearly four times as much in the past three months as in the corresponding three months of last year. The Russian harvest was exceedingly good last year, and the great fall in the Russian rouble during the autumn and winter doubtless greatly stimulated imports. It is obvious, when the United States and India have had so much less corn to sell us than in ordinary years, that their people are able to buy from us a correspondingly less amount of our goods, and to this no doubt is due some part of the disappointment of the high hopes entertained five or six months ago. On the other hand, it is not a little remarkable that the fall in the Indian exchanges, which is so very marked, has not had the effect of checking the exports of cotton piece-goods to India. In fact, we have been selling to the whole of the remote East more cotton goods than in the first quarter of last year; and although we sold to India during the quarter less than during the first quarter of last year, we sold more in March last than in the previous March. In spite, that is, of the fall in the rupee, more cotton goods are going to India at present than we sent there twelve months ago.

The prospects for the future would be fairly satisfactory, taking all things into account, if we could only reckon upon the maintenance of peace. Money is cheap and abundant, and is likely to continue so for some months to come; in spite of political apprehensions we see that the improvement which set in two years ago has gone on, very gradually and slowly it is true, but still certainly, and in many quarters there are evidences of increasing purchasing power on the part of the vast majority of the world's population. The check to trade in the United States is due to the artificial accumulation of money in the Treasury, as we explained a fortnight ago, and it seems incredible that measures will not be adopted to prevent a crisis such as would disorganize the whole industrial system of the Union. If remedial measures are adopted improvement will immediately set in, and a great improvement in the United States would have a powerful effect upon Europe also. It is known that vast plans are ready for adding very considerable mileage to the railway system of the Union. The beginning of construction would immediately increase the demand for iron, not only in the United States, but in Europe, and any stimulus to the iron trade would be felt throughout the whole industrial organization. Besides, manufacturers generally, though less confidently than before, are still hopeful that the improvement will continue for a considerable time yet, and any signs of decided improvement would immediately give rise to speculative transactions on a large scale. There seems no reason to doubt, then, that the hopes entertained five or six months ago would be realized if we could count with any confidence upon peace. Mere apprehension, such as has existed for the last three months, would not check the improvement that is going on; it would prevent a great revival, but it would not prevent a slow improvement. A very considerable increase of apprehension, however, would make the improvement even more gradual than at present. But the experience of the past two years seems to show that nothing short of actual war would completely stop improvement. Even war itself might not stop the improvement, for while it would injuriously affect some trades it would greatly stimulate other trades, and the immediate result might therefore be greater activity than now exists. Apart from politics, however, the signs are that the improvement now going on will be greatly accelerated if the United States Congress adopts such measures as will not only prevent the accumulation in the Treasury for the future, but will also enable the Secretary of the Treasury to pay out the vast surplus now locked up. If, on the other hand, Congress should separate without adopting remedial measures, there might be a continuance of apprehension in the United States which, for a time at least, would unfavourably affect trade, since it might disturb the European money markets.

BERLIOZ'S FAUST AT THE CRYSTAL PALACE.

THE Directors of the Crystal Palace concerts have been both timely and assiduous in bringing out Berlioz's least known and most important works. Certain compositions have been played here for the first time in England, and played well too, notably the gigantic Te Deum, for three choirs, orchestra, and organ. La Damnation de Faust, perhaps the best known and most widely esteemed of all, has never been heard here until last Saturday. The event caused considerable expectation, and drew together as large an audience as we have seen this season. The performance, though an adequate one, and in some points even of very high excellence, was not, on the whole, the best that has been given in England. The chorus was not steady enough or spirited enough in many places, and indeed every vocal part of the work has received at different times a better interpretation. The illness of Mr. Edward Lloyd, who gets such fine effect from the tenor part, contributed no little to this result. It is, however, a question whether the orchestral parts could have been rendered more finely. Certainly here and there a different reading might have done no harm; but a finer quality of tone is impossible to imagine. Happily, this is one of the most important conditions of success in rendering the works of the most delicately picturesque of modern musicians. The fulness of the Crystal Palace strings, and their perfect unanimity in shading and accenting when at their best, would not have been sufficient if all the instruments which emphasize colour or give relief to certain phrases had not been handled with admirable delicacy and sureness.

Mme. Nordica took the part of Margaret, Mr. Banks replaced Mr. Lloyd in that of Faust, Mr. Barrington Foote undertook Mephistopheles, and Mr. Hilton, Brander. There can be no doubt of Mme. Nordica's technique and of the beauty of her voice, though one may question, in places, her reading of the part. She was scarcely simple and pathetic enough; and no trace of her good operatic style in the love duet should have, been visible, we think, in her rendering of the two beautiful songs, "The King of Thule" and "Ah me, my heart is heavy." The first should be given as an old familiar tune, sung almost unconsciously, and as if under the domination of a strong absorbing sentiment. Mme. Nordica read in the meaning of the words with too much spirit. According to our view of the air, Miss Mary Davies's performance of it, under Mr. Hallé, was an inspiration of poetic feeling. The other song admits of more dramatic treatment, and the singer gave it with wonderful passion, and yet not with quite enough of the dominating sentiment of sadness and desolation. Mr. Banks with a refined manner of singing has hardly sufficient fire or power in his voice for the part he played. At times it was impossible to hear him, more especially in the early scenes before the audience fairly settled into their seats. Later on, however, as in the majestic "Invocation to Nature," he was scarcely more audible.

As Mephistopheles, Mr. Foote's clear incisive enunciation stood him in good stead in the general, although, in such rare passages of soft beauty as "Mid' banks of roses" his voice somewhat lacked sweetness. Neither he nor Mr. Hilton (as Brander) quite rose to the conception of devil-may-care sarcasm in certain songs, such as "The Flea," "The Rat," and "The Serenade." Perhaps many of the audience remembered the wonderful snapping suddenness and energy of Mr. Santley's singing of "The Flea." Mr. Foote succeeded best in the less pronouncedly comic passages, and in particular he declaimed the evocation "Ye Spirits of inconstant flame" with an excellent boldness and power. The chief honours of the vocal performance certainly belong to him and to Mme. Nordica.

The early choruses of peasants and the "Easter Hymn" were perhaps the weakest and the most wanting in finish, but the choir seemed to improve as they went on. Yet the drinking choruses in Auerbach's cellar were pumped out too mechanically, and the singers seemed to forget that the "Amen" is meant to be comic, that the entries of the fugue should be forced and emphasized into burlesque, and that, generally speaking, a staccato delivery would be more appropriate than their serious solemnity. The choruses of soldiers and students might have been more incisively phrased. The spirit of the sort of whooping hunting call which occurs was almost entirely missed. Much of the marked character of these scenes, however, was saved by the skill and enthusiasm with which the orchestra brought out Berlioz's superb instrumentation. The drums and trumpets sounded the retreat with an exquisite delicacy, which indeed characterized all the instrumental portions of the work, whether the full "tutti" or special instruments bore the burden of performance. The players accompanied the songs, interpreted the colour of the various scenes, and shaded the passage of feeling from one to the other with beautiful intelligence and sentiment. We can remember no faults on oboe, horn, or bassoon, instruments that have difficult and at times prominent parts, and if we could it would count for little in the recollection of the pure and exquisite quality of their tone. In the Rákóczy March we missed the usual increase of speed and the full force of the great crescendo at the "reprise," but the number was grandly done, and we never remember the trombone effects more startling. The whole scene of Faust's Dream, ending with the "Ballet des Sylphes," seemed somewhat too broadly uniform in effect, and scarcely piquant enough in character. On the other hand, the "Dance of the Will o' the Wisps," and, in fact, the whole scene in front of Margaret's house, one of the most striking of all, was unexceptionably rendered. The "Invocation to Nature," in the Fourth Part, reaches a level of grandeur and nobility not often surpassed by any musician. It is on a higher platform of style than the rest of the work. The grandly designed and yet delicately expressive orchestral accompaniment seems to paint a Poussin landscape with Constable's broadest brush. This combination of the voice in noble declamation with the full comment of picturesque symphony remains an unsurpassed model of the art which Wagner and the moderns have adopted as theirs. Whether it is clearer and more sympathetic to musicians than Wagner's music, or more allied to the spirit of older art, for some reason or other "The Invocation" was interpreted by the Crystal Palace orchestra with more judgment and feeling than they show in Wagner's work.

EXHIBITIONS.

Mr. MENPES has come back from Japan with more ideas of his own and fewer of other people's. Before he went his eye and his taste, stall-fed, as it were, in Mr. Whistler's studio, had not browsed abroad in fresh fields of nature. While the study of the style of a curious and great personality stands for the bulk of a man's experience his work cannot altogether escape an appearance of affectation. To regard nature as a pretext for re-stating the formula by which another man expresses his sentiments leads to insincerity, dulness, or that dreadful mixture, mechanical eccentricity, according to the natures of the model and the copyist. We understand eccentricity in art to mean a use of the strongest constituents and last resources of style unmotived by necessity—by a wish to convey some new observation, some real and personal impression of things. In the past Mr. Menpes was Whistlerian, sometimes rather mal à propos; in fact, he loved Mr. Whistler not wisely but too well. He has cured himself by the strong tonic of a single-handed wrestle with fresh phases of Nature. A man with an eye in his head gets good after all rather than harm in the long run from putting on the spectacles of a master, if it is only in catching a glimpse of some of the relations that exist between [illegible] and truth. In his preface to his Exhibition of Paintings, [illegible] and Etchings of Japan, on view at Messrs. Dowdeswell's, [illegible] Menpes acknowledges his obligations to Mr. [illegible] we are disposed to agree with him that they are [illegible] Art is art and nature something quite different, [illegible] whether consciously or not, has learnt from Mr. [illegible] is an art of picture-making not to be confounded [illegible] labours of the scientific realist. He [illegible] his impressions of Japan with an air of [illegible] that he has done so with taste [illegible] training. Very few of his sketches [illegible] obvious or undue extent; and most [illegible] in aim or price, [illegible] fulfil the first duty of an ordinary picture—to hang in a sitting-room and co-operate in household decoration. This is a worthy aim when so many men occupy large spaces with a very dull excuse for a window. Mr. Menpes, it is true, gives you a peep, as it were, out of his own window at Japan; but he secures in most cases a decorative ensemble, and he avoids the mistake of attempting realistic illusion on a large scale. Modern practice of painting convinces us more and more that, in landscape at least, between the large decorative conventions of the Old Masters and the equally large but circumstantially assisted illusion of the modern panorama, there is no half-way course. To speak generally, Mr. Menpes has contributed something to ideas of decoration and to the place of a picture in a room. New and neat designs in frames well suited to the style of work assist in this result. The room, hung with a silvery sort of pink, however it may suit frames and the white mounts of etchings, picks out one or two colours unpleasantly—as, for instance, the orange scarf in "Miss Almond Blossom" (104). As a permanent condition of a room or studio it would never do, and must be regarded as an occasional debauchery of the eye. Though Mr. Menpes has left off mannerism and affectation, he retains at times a curious taste for discords. We must hasten to say that the colour of almost all the sketches is both lovely and amusing in the ordinary human sense, whether we look at decorative ensembles, such as the bold yet exquisite "Lemon Bridge" (114), or more realistic schemes, such as "A By-Canal" (86), and innumerable street scenes and effects of sunlight. "Our Lord the Buddha" (119) and "A Religious Procession" (118) are bold and romantic views of open-air illumination. Most of the etchings are excellent, and manifest a true feeling for line. "A Baby" (7), showing a girl shading her eyes, seems to us the best, as it produces the best pattern, if one looks at the scrabble of lines without thinking of the meaning, and yet it lacks neither truth nor sentiment.

Mr. W. L. Wyllie at Mr. Dunthorne's Gallery exhibits sixty-two water-colours, illustrating a voyage in his own yacht through the Netherlands. He has taken the title of "The Water-ways of the Netherlands," and the catalogue is prefaced by a gay account of the trip. His work is very delicate, and intimately illustrative rather than strikingly broad or convincingly true. His neat and beautiful manipulation gives the pleasure of pen or pencil work rather than of painting, but in the best specimens, empty masses prevent an unpleasant feeling of overcrowded detail and interest. In these small things Mr. Wyllie yields less than in large pictures to the temptation to supplement effect by vivid and false prettiness of colour. He has taken a somewhat new departure also in making a tremendous rush at bright spring greens and a generally shining brilliancy of tone. He produces a sense of fresh effort and courageous vision thereby, even if he is not always true to fact. "Banks of the Ship Canal, Vlissingen" (21), is one of the best examples of this sort of style. It is a little neat and delicate surprise, very pretty, bright, and amusing to look at. Some of the faults of Mr. Wyllie's usual work are still to be seen, as in the spotty "Mouth of the Stour" (3), the flimsy "Stour at Low Water" (2), as well as in several hard and wiry treatments of water. He draws long lines of coast and mud, banks of canals, boats, houses, posts, and other rare objects, with delicacy and fidelity, as may be seen in "The Medway from Hoo Ness" (1), "Cadzand" (10), "Vlissingen from the Canal" (9), and many others. Perhaps best of all are those conceived in a larger and more robust style. "The Meeting of the Old and New Merwede" (22), a fine sunset, is the largest and most suggestive in manner, the truest in value, and the most full of motion and air.

At the Fine Art Society's Galleries Messrs. Alfred East, T. C. Gotch, and W. Ayrest Ingram exhibit a set of oils and water-colours illustrating the Duchy of Cornwall. They have chosen the sea and the coast as the scenes of their labours, and, in treating the coast, they have avoided high cliffs, storms, and extreme force of colour. This gives an unexpectedly quiet aspect to their exhibition, considering its title. Probably in making these sketches they had no very definite idea of combining them into a formal illustration of the country. Of the three Mr. Gotch perhaps maintains the most equal level of technique and performance; while Mr. East, falling below the mark at times, at others has succeeded in producing some charming little compositions full of life, air, and freedom. Mr. Ingram deals almost exclusively with the sea and boats. He is at times fanciful and rather flimsy; amongst the most notable exceptions we note his true, quiet, and broad water-colour, "Falmouth Harbour" (5), and the soft silvery grey "St. Mawes Bay" (15). Mr. Gotch's larger oil-paintings of figures, cleverly as they are handled, leave one somewhat cold; he, however, contributes some very sincere little sketches, such as "Porth-Towan Beach" (66) and "Sand Hills" (69). "The Little Nurse" (68) is a striking effect of light; but the tone is cold, and the wall on the left would certainly be better in shadow as a matter of composition. Mr. East sends some good things, both large and small, both in oil and in water. "A Glimpse of Tren-Com" (90) is one of the freshest, most lively, and best arranged of his compositions. "A Glimpse of St. Ives [illegible] Blue Day" (92), "Neon, St. Phillack" (45), [illegible] St. Ives Pier" (16), "Evening Glow" (56), [illegible] Cathedral" (86), are also good specimens. [illegible] pictures make a very pretty little show [illegible] Yet there is nothing [illegible] that it is simply of the [illegible] light upon [illegible] emerging in England [illegible] an exceptional mark in exhibitions during the past four or five years.

There is very little difference in the Continental Gallery in New Bond Street since we last spoke of it. Many of the pictures are the same, and any additions differ little in character. It, however, remains a far from dull lounging-place, where, for the most part, gay pictures with a story or amazing efforts of "chic" abound. In the midst of these it seems strange to come upon a few serious, deeply-felt, emotional works, such as J. F. Millet's pastel, "The Nut-Gatherers" (203). It is as if one came upon John Bunyan in the Bullier. There are also several works by "l'honnête manufacturier Van Beers," as a writer in the Courrier de l'Art calls him. "The Rendezvous in the Bois de Boulogne" (187), a lady lying on the grass in a black riding-habit, would seem too large and important to have come from the now celebrated manufactory; but who knows? Among the good landscapes are Th. Verstraete's "In the Woods" (199), a clever representation of the veil of fresh leaves that make the lower vistas of the woods hazy in the springtime; several conscientious studies by Van Luppen of Antwerp; "Landscape at Baune" (158), by G. L. Pelouse; and a quiet little picture, "Wood Landscape" (98), by J. Lamorinière. "May" (64), by A. Nozal, is a perfect dazzle of blossoms, a little hard and cold. Regarded simply as a coloured print, nothing could be more amusing than E. J. Boks's "En l'absence des maitres" (87). It shows a gayer dinner-party than the masters ever enjoyed—at least in their own house.

Messrs. Bellman and Ivey have opened another exhibition of reproductions, in bronze and marble, of works by well-known sculptors, and a few terra-cottas. In some cases they have been executed by the artists themselves. Mr. T. Nelson Maclean's work is largely represented. Some of the work, for instance "Art" (9), shows little of this sculptor's fine chiselling and his lively and vigorous touch in drapery. "Comedy" (30) is better in this respect, and has much of the charm of the large statue exhibited in the Grosvenor. The original of "Tragedy" (29) we thought one of the finest things in the last Academy. This small reproduction hardly does it justice unless viewed from the back. Amongst good busts are Mr. W. Couper's delicately and quietly finished "Evangeline" (1), Mr. Maclean's beautifully worked "After the Ball" (34), and, more robust in its modelling, and full of a splendid pride in the pose of the head, Falguière's cire perdue, "Diane" (17). Mr. Waldo Story's "Dancing Girl" (12); Mr. Maclean's "Fleur des Champs" (7), and "Fleur de la Ville" (8); Mrs. Edwards's "Marsyas" (38), copied from a bronze in the British Museum; and Mr. Michel's "Hebe" (3), are some amongst the good statuettes.

REVIEWS.

MR. AND MRS. BANCROFT.*

Mr. and MRS. BANCROFT have gratified a taste which is keenly prevalent among playgoers, if indeed it be limited to that class. It would be difficult to explain why so much interest and curiosity are felt about the private lives of actors and actresses; but that such feelings exist there can be no doubt, and in this book two of the most popular and successful players of the generation narrate the history of their doings not only on, but also off, the stage, taking their readers behind the scenes and telling them all about the inception and preparation of pieces which are now famous in the annals of the drama. It is no wonder that the first edition of the work was exhausted, as it is said to have been, on the day of publication. That was the result of general inquisitiveness; but the book has merits of its own which will ensure its popularity. The vein of humour which is so delightful a feature in Mrs. Bancroft's dramatic performances is happily exhibited also in her narrative. She writes brightly and pleasantly of her days of success, and tells the story of her early struggles and anxieties in a way which cannot fail to gain the sympathies of her readers. As for theatrical anecdotes, it is long since a book has been published which contained so many, and we are not acquainted with any book in which they are so neatly told. Knowing, and having been concerned in, so many good stories, it would have been a sad thing indeed if Mrs. Bancroft had omitted to give them to the world; but thanks for having done so are none the less due to her. We are speaking only of one of the authors, however, and this is to do scant justice to the other, for Mr. Bancroft's share of the book is interesting and important. Before proceeding to consider the work in close detail we must justify our position as critic by advising the omission from future editions of some few matters which, in point of fact, it would have been far better to leave out. Why should a letter from Sir Algernon Borthwick be published? Why, again, should it be recorded that the writers made the acquaintance on a certain occasion of Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice? Nothing turns upon or arises from the circumstance. Another incident which it is extremely injudicious of the author to include is the very discreditable behaviour of a late editor of the Times in putting aside his own dramatic critic on the occasion of Mrs. Langtry's début, and entrusting the task of noticing her appearance to a friend of the lady—the late Mr. Abraham Hayward. "Dear Mr. Bancroft," Mr. Hayward writes, "I have agreed with Chenery (editor of the Times) to write the notice. I know nothing of Mr. ——"—was Mr. ——, we wonder, the critic of the paper?—"but I have a stall given me by a lady." So readers looked to the Times for an honest account of Mrs. Langtry's promise or capacity, as the case might be, and found instead the abominably nauseous gush of a personal friend. Surely the less said about such an occurrence the better, and it is a serious mistake on the part of the writers to expose the incident.

Let us turn to the pleasanter task of briefly tracing the career of the authors, beginning naturally with the lady. Miss Marie Wilton was the child of an actor by inclination who had been destined for the Church; and that she inherited a genuinely artistic temperament, and was gifted with true dramatic perception, the following anecdote will show:—

> It was during my stay at Bristol that Mr. Charles Dillon came to play Belphegor, and I was chosen to act the part of the boy Henri, his son; when I rehearsed it, I did so as my mother had taught me, in a natural manner; but Mr. Dillon disapproved, and said, "This won't do, my dear; you'll kill the piece and destroy me! When I find that my wife, your mother, whom we both adore, has deserted us in our poverty to go away with some one who can give her wealth and luxury, I call upon you to curse her; then my conscience rebukes me, my love overpowers me, and I say to you, 'No, no, pray for her—pray for your mother, Henri; pray for her, my boy!' you are overwhelmed with grief, you fall on your knees, look up, and clasp your hands in prayer. Imagine you are saying, 'God bless my dear mother, and bring her back to me.'" I replied, "Yes, Mr. Dillon, that is what I was doing; only I can't imagine my tears and prayer—I must mean it and cry in earnest." He answered, "Yes; but you interrupt me. I have to look dazed, stagger to the door, look into the empty room, and faintly mutter, 'Madeline! my wife—my wife!' as the curtain falls. All this is very important, so you must be careful, and not say things audibly that take away the attention of the audience; you can mean your grief, but keep it to yourself." I said, "Well, but you are going to say things audibly, and beautifully you do it, for you make me cry; surely if my sobs and prayers are faintly heard through your speech it must help you, and it will be natural. I feel the scene so real that it makes me cry. Let me try it again to-morrow at rehearsal: we will ask Mr. Chute to be present, and if he says it is not effective, I will act it as you wish." He looked wonderingly at me, and then, with a smile, said, "You are a strange little creature; but it shall be so; the manager shall decide." So we had our rehearsal, and the scene affected Mr. Chute to tears. He said that if acted in that way it would cause a sensation. When the night came the applause was tremendous, and the success assured.

How many children are there who, placed in the position here occupied by the little Marie, would have exhibited the originality recorded? To such a child success was sure to come; but it came somewhat slowly, and there is quite a pathetic story of how the young actress, having obtained a London engagement, wandered about the streets searching for a benevolent shoemaker who would let her have a pair of pink silk boots on credit. Amongst her early memories is one of a brutal stage manager, who was under obligations to her mother which he repaid by making the daughter's lot as uncomfortable as he could; but she found a friend in the musical director of the theatre, Mr. W. H. Montgomery, and a kindly hand was extended to her by Mr. Toole, whose support in these eventful days Mrs. Bancroft gratefully remembers and gracefully acknowledges. Once in London Miss Wilton's talent soon brought her to the front, and the salary of 3*l.* a week grew to one of 15*l.*—a very exceptional amount at the time. Many readers will remember the days when laughing and admiring audiences nightly filled the Strand Theatre, Miss Marie Wilton being the chief attraction; and of these days—how little then did visitors to the theatre guess that they would ever read their idol's autobiography!—Mrs. Bancroft has many entertaining stories to tell, stories which introduce the names of her old companions, amongst others, H. J. Byron, James Rogers, John Clarke, and George Honey—all now, unhappily, passed away.

Mr. Bancroft's narrative breaks in upon his wife's at a period when she was the favourite burlesque actress. He was stage-struck, and while still in his teens made an undistinguished appearance at Birmingham as a masked courtier in a pantomime. A deep impression was made upon the young enthusiast by the acting of Robson, and we may digress for a moment from Mr. Bancroft's narrative to say a word on the subject of this extraordinary artist, for we have lately come upon the following graphic description of Robson in an unpublished memoir, which, however, it is to be hoped may in time be given to the world:—"Nov. 14, 1853, saw the new actor, Robson. He has an original genius which fits him peculiarly for the grotesque line of character, with a strong inward heat that enables him to express the fury of passion without rant, and to run into the utmost extravagance without offence, the vehemence of his own speech forcing the spirits of his spectators. His dance round the tragic Muse, he being in his own person the embodiment of burlesque, and performing the dance in an exulting and insulting humour, was so irresistible, that not only all the actors on the stage, but even the old prompter, were carried off their feet by the enthusiasm of this fiery little fiend. He would make a first-rate Quasimodo, Quilp, or Caliban, and he will always be at his best in characters where there is some touch of the diabolical. In passages of intense and wicked passion he appears natural, but he is abrupt in his transition and violent in all his effects. His appearance is mean, but his eyes have a piercing expression, and his features follow the working of his thoughts. A distinct articulation comes to the aid of his weak voice, and in certain passages makes it impressive. His acting is exaggerated, but not in the common way, rather as the writing of Dickens is sometimes exaggerated, because he cannot rein himself in. He is worth seeing and worth remembering."

To resume, however, our examination of the book before us, it may be imagined that these reminiscences would never have been written but for the chapter of accidents which led to Miss Wilton's lesseeship of the Prince of Wales' Theatre in 1865 (her partner being Mr. H. J. Byron) and to the production of Mr. T. W. Robertson's Society, which, as it were, decided the fate of the house, and led by degrees to a general reform in the method of presenting comedy. It is for their efforts in this latter direction that lovers of the stage are indebted to Mr. and Mrs. Bancroft, who broke through and finally overcame many conventionalities which would now be regarded as absurdities, though no one seems to have considered them absurd, apart from a little mild satire on the subject of "Adelphi guests," till a new state of things arose at the Prince of Wales' Theatre. The manager paid a regard to life and reality which was new to the comedy stage. "Perhaps I should say here," Mrs. Bancroft writes in commenting on the production of Society in November 1865, "how the elaborate and careful dressing of our plays astonished theatre-goers, and was admitted by the critics to be a revelation; for the reader should be reminded this was the era of much stage slovenliness—Mr. Bancroft and Mr. Hare should be justly remembered as the first reformers." Mrs. Bancroft, it will be seen, modestly disclaims any share of the praise; but there is every reason to suppose that her own good taste and feeling for artistic propriety had much to do with the new development. From this date to the 20th of July, 1885, when Mr. and Mrs. Bancroft retired from the management of the Haymarket Theatre (which they opened in January 1880), their course had been one of almost uninterrupted good fortune, their prosperity having been only mitigated by the failure of Mr. Edmund Yates's Tame Cats, of Mr. H. J. Byron's Wrinkles, and of Mr. Boucicault's How She Loves Him, of The Merchant of Venice, and Duty; and with regard to the first of these the author, in a letter to Mr. Bancroft here quoted, confessed the righteousness of its condemnation. "My dear B., it's poor stuff, and well deserved its fate," was Mr. Yates's admission on reading over the MS. some years afterwards. Mr. Boucicault was less frank. "The public pretend they want pure comedy; this is not so. What they want is domestic drama, treated with broad comic character," he wrote; but this is not an accurate diagnosis of the public taste. Any and every kind of play is wanted; but it must be good of its kind, though that is not asserting that bad plays never succeed.

We have so far reached in our discussion of the book only to the middle of the first volume, and it will be understood how impossible it is to do full justice to the work within the limits of a review. No new Robertson was forthcoming after the death of the author of Caste—and who will not be interested to read the account of that delightful comedy as related by Polly Eccles!—and at length, for lack of suitable work of English growth, the managers were driven to adapt plays from the French, though they also endeavoured to raise the traditions of their company by giving performances of Shakspeare and Sheridan. It used to be thought that there were plenty of good pieces written if managers would only let them be acted; but the introduction of matinées has effectually exploded this idea, for it seems that no one need any longer remain unacted, and an enormous balance of that which is presented at these morning performances is the most unmitigated rubbish. Incidentally we may express regret that the authors lend their countenance to the barbarous phrase "rendition"; they speak of the "rendition" of a character in Masks and Faces, and the dictionary does not warrant the use of the term in the sense in which they employ it—a comment we should not have made had not the general style of the book been so good that a high standard of criticism must be applied to it. We must not think of quoting any of the capital stories which enliven every chapter. Let the reader procure the book and find them there. Nor is this the place to perform the agreeable task of considering the artistic methods of Mr. and Mrs. Bancroft with a view to explaining the secret of their well-deserved popularity as actor and actress. It is chiefly as the managers, first of the Prince of Wales', and then of the Haymarket, Theatres, that the authors present themselves to us, and it is not hard to understand why they thus distinguished themselves. They were not content to follow in the old familiar groove. They thought for themselves. Possibly they attach too much importance to the "dressing" of their plays, as remarked upon in the passage quoted. They recognized that two chairs, a table, a shapeless sofa, and a cheap French clock are not the customary furniture for a lady's drawing-room, and there was a great deal in the discovering what was new to the stage; but it was rather the intellectual dressing of the plays that won for them their reputation. Their view of this work was at once broad and comprehensive and accurate in detail. In short, they took pains. Perhaps their success might be summarized by the remark that [illegible] nothing without a reason, and that the reason was almost [illegible] a good one. There is only one thing in the career of [illegible] Bancroft which we find it hard to forgive, and that is their [illegible] withdrawal from the scene they adorned. [illegible], there is reason to hope that they may yet be [illegible] from their retirement.

NOVELS AND TALES.*

A TEACHER of the Violin; and other Tales is a reprint in a collected form of five short stories by the author of John Inglesant. They possess all the well-known characteristics of that writer's style; pretty pictures of woodland and mountain scenery, a delight in the stately grace of the ancien régime, and an undercurrent of mysticism, sadness, and self-renunciation. The subject which furnished Scott with the episode of Sir Everard Waverley's love affair is here wrought into a most piteous tragedy; the other stories—of the dreamy Otto, of the noble-minded Princess Helena and her wasted life; of the boy who never found out his love for Little Ellie until it was too late, and even the Elia-like Apologue of the Cards—all are alike composed in a minor key.

The author of An American Marquis asks, "What can be more ridiculous and more deserving the lash of satire than for citizens of a Republic—and of such a Republic as the United States of America—to renounce this citizenship and this Republic, and to ape the mummeries of the Old World—mummeries of which even our most tinselled buffoons are tiring?" It was in order, then, to inculcate the foregoing high moral lesson that this book was written. By holding up to ridicule a bankrupt American dentist who poses as a French marquis he proposes to disgust Americans with the passion for old-world titles which he assures us is "their foible, and a recantation of the glorious creed of Democracy." Perhaps the book fulfils these functions; upon us it makes the same impression that a transcendental saga did upon the Amal in Hypatia—"Like one's dreams when one has been drunk." Nor is it a pleasant dream.

In The Cliff Mystery Mr. Hamilton Aïdé has produced a good specimen of the Called Back type of novel. We do not think that the experienced novel-reader will have much difficulty about divining the "mystery"—indeed, within the conventional eight chapters there is no room for dragging a red herring across his path, and where there are less than half a dozen characters in all the selection of the culprit becomes materially simplified. We must be permitted to doubt whether curiosity, or even the certainty that one's best friend is being murdered, would prevail upon most men to drop from a bedroom window with a savage mastiff waiting open-mouthed below; but, whatever may be thought of the probability of this incident, we must admit that the bite inflicted by the dog is cleverly made use of in the development of the story by confining the hero to the sofa at Muirhead Chase at a most critical time. Château Margot is probably a printer's error; but surely no woman's name was ever spelt "Hanah," and the word is repeated too often not to be meant.

A Lombard Street Mystery is an English version of the roman policier familiar to readers of the lamented Gaboriau. We recognize our old friends, Lecoq of the varied wardrobe, Toto Chupin, and the rest of them. It seems rather odd that "an able medical man who, on a second-floor in King William Street, had elected the victims of commerce for his special study"—whatever that may mean—should be able not only to "step on board the Ostend boat and go with his friend the Captain for a blow to the Belgic port and back," but even to undertake a voyage to the Cape and back, "partly for health's sake, partly to gratify a whim for acting as ship's surgeon, and chiefly because it was necessary that some one should pay a visit to Cape Town in connexion with the mystery in which Alice Bowering and Tom Rowles were involved"; moreover, "no sooner had he arrived at the dock than he departed on a flying visit to Paris," in search of the chief villain. He also obtains a situation for the heroine as nurse at St. Martin's Hospital, and makes himself generally useful to the persecuted couple, "his connexion with whom, and the interest which their troubles aroused in his mind, formed a transition period in his character. His frigid and prosaic disposition"—how ungrateful thus to talk about a man who had taken so much trouble!—"had become transformed by making use of the opportunity for the exercise of generosity and self-forgetfulness in aiding the cause of Alice and Tom. From the chrysalis of stolid reserve and self-complacency, these had developed a creature of benevolent impulses and humanitarian aspirations." The author's style, of which the above specimen may suffice, and his passion for making all his leading characters speak like books, somewhat interferes with one's pleasure in tracing out a really good plot of its kind. There are several villains, one of whom, while he believes himself to be unsuspected, is cleverly made use of by the detective to entrap another; there is a terrific struggle between the two on the top of Shakspeare's Cliff at Dover, down which one of them falls; there are the usual "clues," half-burned scraps of paper which when pieced together become photographs, cheques for 300*l.*, &c.; the title-deeds of houses are found in the lining of a dead woman's shabby skirt, and so on, quite in the old sweet way. Apropos of the hero's sentence, we have always understood that eighteen months' imprisonment with hard labour is regarded as being equivalent to seven years' penal servitude, and would hardly, therefore, be described by a judge as "a lenient sentence, owing to the prisoner's previous unblemished character."

A Perfect Demon will enable the lovers of transpontine melodrama to enjoy themselves to their heart's content. The Perfect Demon consists of two persons, male and female, exactly alike, and with a bewildering habit of wearing one another's clothes. The female demon, learning from the newspapers that a certain Mr. Debney, to whom she had once been married, needs a governess for his child by his second wife, offers herself for the situation, and obtains it by the aid of testimonials forged by the male demon. Here, then, we have the situation of East Lynne; but it is complicated by the appearance of a half-crazed scarecrow who, it seems, was once married to the female demon. He combines the professions of actor at a penny gaff and clerk to a village attorney, and has also adopted a waif who becomes the heroine of the story. After the governess's installation at Oak House, a building "representing most of the styles in vogue during the last seven hundred years," she proceeds to business at once, and, with the attorney's assistance, terrifies Mr. Debney into making a will, leaving all his property to her. Next morning Mr. Debney is found dead. An old family lawyer appears and talks about "unmasking villains"; the attorney "differs with" him. The scarecrow calls upon the female demon, now in triumphant possession of the house. She shoots him, and departs for the Continent. The attorney, fancying that a second will may have been made by Mr. Debney, searches the house and grounds for it, and contrives, "with the yell of a lost soul," to burn himself to death in an old tree. After this the story becomes a mere weltering chaos of shots and stabs, midnight scuffles with chivalrous burglars, and forcible abductions of women. The heroine—now a leading London actress—is decoyed into a "pavilion" by the side of a river. The hero, while trying to rescue her, is drawn into a mill-wheel. The unfortunate scarecrow is kept during many chapters in a subterranean dungeon, into which the hero, after escaping from the mill-wheel, accidentally falls. The female demon escapes from a petite-maison, which seems to be French for a lunatic asylum. The male demon chokes her. Virtue, we need scarcely say, is triumphant in the end. In his preface the author "begs that the imperfections inseparable from the disadvantageous circumstances under which this book was written will be regarded with leniency." What these circumstances were he does not inform us, nor can we conceive any circumstances which would extenuate the crime of writing such unredeemed balderdash.

THE SINCLAIRS OF ENGLAND.*

GENEALOGISTS are familiar with the fact that the blood of the old English kings runs in the veins of a large number of people of no great distinction now. It has been observed also that few persons of distinction are without a strain of the Plantagenet, just as every well-bred greyhound has a dash of the bull-dog. The rule holds good with all great statesmen, except those of pure Hebrew descent; Archbishop Tait and Dean Stanley shared with George Canning, Lord Derby, Lord John Russell, and many more in claiming Henry III. as their common ancestor. Indeed, it has been ascertained as an unquestionable fact, that all the Prime Ministers, except Lord Beaconsfield, have been descended from Edward I., not only such aristocrats as Portland and Wellington and Russell, but even such comparative plebeians, heraldically speaking, as Pitt and Peel and the late Premier. This is, of course, a mere coincidence, but it is probable that very few English gentlemen of four or five generations' standing are without a cross, however remote, of the blue blood of Anjou. This being the case, books on royal descent are a weariness to the reader, and even to the genealogical reader. The writer of The Sinclairs of England has endeavoured to perform a different task. He would have us believe that almost every figure of any great importance in our history since the Norman Conquest has been connected with the Sinclairs, the descendants of the father, or the uncle, or the grandfather of the famous Eudo "Dapifer." "Jonathan Duncan B.A. paid particular attention in his List of the Norman Barons who fought at Hastings, to the localities in Normandy whence Sinclairs came." Saint-Clair, it seems, is an arrondissement of St. Lo. "Around St. Lo all the blood-related families of Thorigny, Granville, Rye, had their shares of land, as the Saint-Clairs increased, the lords of the arrondissement, whence the general name." This sentence, which is a typical example of the author's style, is rather clearer than most passages in the book, which the reader has to construe as he goes on into ordinary English. "The earl of Rye"—the author always puts "earl" for "count"—"and his family were offshoots from St. Lo." The "earls of Senlis," again, were Sinclairs. The Scotch branches of the family were, according to "Father Hay, who was son to the widow of the last Sinclair baron of Roslin, and who had full access to the charters in the castle," descended from Walderne, earl of St. Clare, by his wife, "daughter to Duke Richard of Normandy." Of this family the author says in his odd English, "accumulation of record and history puts the Sinclair family within the ducal circle, and for centuries." He does his best to include Strongbow and his family; but hardly succeeds. Their history, he says, "is suggestive to the effect that they were somehow a branch of the French house of St. Clare." The "somehow" is, unfortunately, but too characteristic of the whole book, and, indeed, of many other books on family history. "All this"—namely, the derivation of Clare from St. Clare—"is professedly imaginative. The return," the author remarks, "to somewhat steadier ground is agreeable." But it is difficult to see how the conjectures as to St. Maur and the Seymours in the next paragraphs are on "steadier ground." There is a certain "Seamer," or "Seymer," who figures in the annals of the City of London early in the reign of Henry VIII., and who is generally skipped in modern pedigrees. It was not until his descendants had entered what our author calls "the ducal circle" that "Seamer"—in English a sower—was found to be a corruption of St. Maur. But these are small matters. The writer does not hesitate to adopt or endorse far greater errors and heresies.

Historically, the volume is made up of about equal parts of conjecture, error, and trustworthy fact. We have given some examples of the guesses. As to pure errors, we cannot too strongly remark on the author's use of titles. It is simply absurd to call the great Essex baron, best known by his office of "Dapifer," Eudo Sinclair. So, too, it is absurd to use the modern English form "viscount" for the law-Latin "vicecomes," a sheriff. "Hamo de Sancto Claro," as he is called in the Pipe Rolls, should certainly not be described in the heading of a chapter as "the viscount and feefarmer of Colchester," nor yet as Hamo Sinclair. It is but just to add that on p. 207 the author explains the meaning of the word, which he uses also with respect to a certain Gereberd, who is described as "Viscount of Norfolk and Suffolk." His enthusiastic admiration for Rose, the widow of Eudo Dapifer, translated into common English would be something romantic and pardonable; but it is impossible, considering how little he or any one else can know of her real life, not to smile at such a judgment as this:—"Rose Claire and Eudo St. Claro were the living poem of their period." To which we may add, that they were just what Artemus Ward would have called an episode or two episodes. On p. 88 we read a very confused and difficult account of John Sinclair, who, "if no interruptions occurred," would have had "fifteen years of the hereditary dapiferships (sic) of England and Normandy." But there were interruptions, some of them serious. The author accepts the very questionable assertion that John was made Earl of Essex, and a still more doubtful relationship with a certain William Dapifer, who in 1095 was "crucified," according to Madox. But what becomes of the idyllic loves and lives of Eudo and Rose, if these were their children? There is inextricable confusion here; and the author can only, as usual, conjecture. He makes Rose the second wife, and gives Eudo a first wife, a daughter of Baldwin of Flanders. This is purely gratuitous, and is founded, of course, on the supposed necessity of making everybody possible into a Sinclair, and especially everybody who in the reign of William Rufus was described as, or bore the surname of, Dapifer or Seneschal. The printing of considerable quotations from Court rolls and other old documents with their contractions is extremely reprehensible, and has long been given up by historical writers with any pretence to authority. Of the historical part of this curious book, then, we may safely say that it contains a great deal of guesswork and of irrelevant matter, mixed up with the results of a large amount of research, arranged in a manner most confusing to the reader of what is ostensibly intended for popular use. The author says plainly in his preface that, if the purpose of his work had been merely genealogical, it would have been printed only for "the delight of collectors." But, he says, "the direct appeal is to the large public, who accept with appreciation any real contribution to the history of their country." It is to be feared that "the large public" will hardly care to be told in very odd language—we are coming to the style immediately—that every second person of eminence is a Sinclair or the son of a Sinclair. We all remember with James I. that Adam and Eve were not Lumleys, and may add for our own satisfaction that neither were they Sinclairs. But it would seem as if the author was afraid that his views should be weighed comparatively; and he not only omits a pedigree in tabular form—a pedigree which would have consisted mainly of dotted lines—but also an index, and even a table of contents. There is no guide to the reader in a closely printed volume of more than four hundred pages other than a list of the titles of the fifty-four chapters, in which we have, among others, the following entries:—"XI. The Dapifer's Latter Years. . . . XIV. John, Comes Essexiæ. . . . XXXIX. Vicecomes and Escheator," and the oddly made-up headings already mentioned.

With regard to the style of the writer, a great deal might be said. No doubt, in a book which deals with names and hard historical facts, it is difficult to escape either of two faults. It is scarcely possible not to be dry, and it is very easy to be obscure. Fleeing from dryness, you fall into the errors of Macaulay. Fleeing from obscurity, you attain the painful reiteration of Carlyle. Green perhaps succeeded best in being both vivid and accurate; but his brilliant style led him into many an error, and the false perspective in which his views sometimes appear is rather the result of over-colouring than of incorrect drawing. But in The Sinclairs, though the author starts with this proposition, "Novelty and originality are great aids to all narration," he forgets that an incomparable style like Macaulay's would hardly have sufficed to make the subject entertaining; while, though he has evidently taken some pains in the construction of his sentences, his style is of a kind impossible to describe except by isolated extracts which are hardly fair to a sincere author, who is probably the one person in the world who will be surprised if "the large public" to which he "directly appeals" cares little or nothing about Eudo and Hamo and "the Dapifership," or the all pervading influence of the Sinclairs. Some gems of thought and expression must not, however, be neglected. Thus, of the Norman the author says, "He had far more than his share of all that was being done greatest in the world then." Of William, Lord Camville, we read that the barony falling into abeyance at his death, "Nicolaia had ultimately heired the title for her husband, if he had not already had baronial rank." Again, "Lachrymosity has not been put to the account of the Normans by the most depreciatory of their virulent critics." Historically, the author has evidently never heard of Gundulf. Idiomatically, he does not seem entitled to criticize as he does Sir Francis Palgrave. But there are stranger things than these in the book. The romance of Eudo and Rose is founded on a wild assumption; "his admiration she returned with an enthusiasm told by the fact that they were married before she was fifteen." Most people will think "the fact" shows that she was married, like other ladies of the day, while still scarcely out of the nursery, and probably had no more voice in the choice of a husband than a Circassian in a Turkish hareem. Two more quotations we cannot refrain from adding. The first is grotesque in its serious historical severity. "Here the British King, Cool, from whom it" (Colchester!) "takes its present name, lived an actual historical personage, though some ribald rhymes give an unreal tone to his existence." And lastly, here is something for which to be thankful:—"Had fees not been partible even to kingdoms . . . . the monarch of England now would be of this" (the Sinclair) "lineage, as the legitimate heir to Henry the First."

A BOOK ABOUT BEES.*

THIS little work "is primarily intended for the young," and "as a Reading-book in Schools," yet any one who wishes to learn something about bees and beekeeping without much trouble could scarcely do better than read it, provided he skipped the poetry and the moralizings. Not that we wish to find fault with either the quotations or the sermonettes; many of both are excellent of their kind; we only wish to point out that they will teach the eager student nothing about bees. On the other hand, while the book contains a good deal of both preaching and verse, it will be found very readable by children. The first chapter, although it has nothing whatever to do with bees, contains an admirable lesson for the young. The author recounts the usual sights which arouse interest in a child on its first visit to London, and then he tells his young readers that "every day, and all around" them "in the country, are many things to be seen quite as beautiful and wonderful, if" they will "open their eyes to look for them." He adds, that they "must always remember that many of the greatest wonders are found in the smallest things;" but he tells them not to get it into their heads that they cannot learn about or appreciate little things unless they possess a microscope. "Only use your eyes as you walk about; and, when you see anything that attracts your attention, try and find out and answer the questions, 'What is this?' and 'Why is this?' and 'What is its use?'" We give this as a fair specimen of the author's style from an educational point of view.

In tracing the history of the study of bees, he tells us that from the first century until about a hundred and fifty years ago little was written on the subject. To a great extent this is true. We have, however, before us Swan's Speculum Mundi, a book published considerably more than two hundred years ago, which treats at considerable length of bees and their habits. "And loe," says the author, "me thinks I see the painful and industrious Bees fly flocking to their hives"; and then he proceeds to say that, of all workmen, they have the "preheminence." Mr. Jenyns says that, although Shakspeare wrote of bees that "They have a king," apparently mistaking the queen for a king, Dr. Butler, in the time of Shakespeare, was aware that the most important bee is the queen. Yet his idea seems to have been "that the queen only laid eggs producing queens, and that the workers—known to him as females—laid all the other eggs." Now Swan, who was probably a contemporary of Butler's, evidently shared Shakspeare's error. He writes of "the king" that "he is of body far bigger than the hony Bees, hath shorter wings, but a brighter and more goodly head than they." This, of course, would be the queen. Yet even Aristotle wrote that bees have "two kinds of rulers; the best of them is red, the other black; their size is double that of the working bees. By some they are called 'the mother bees,' as if they were the parents of the rest." Mr. Jenyns infers from this that Aristotle had identified the queen. This is possible. The question, however, remains whether by "the mother bees," whose size was double that of the workers, he meant the queens or the drones. Even Swan, in writing two thousand years later, says, "as for the drones, they are supposed by some to be the female Bees." Mr. Jenyns [illegible] the Biblical story of the "colony of bees which actually [illegible] in the carcase of the lion which Samson had killed [illegible] before." Once more we would refer him to Swan for [illegible] held on this point more than two centuries ago:—

"And sometimes there is a kind of Bee bred out of putrefaction, as Authors write. A rotten Horse breedeth Waspes; a dead calf Bees, if the West wind blow; from an Ass proceed Humblebees; of a Mule, Hornets, &c. And whether the Bees, in Samson's dead Lion, were bred anywhere else, no man knoweth." Obviously this intelligent naturalist did not believe that the bees were bred in the lion. On the contrary, he seems to have inclined to the opinion that they had been bred in a dead calf, when the west wind blew, and that they afterwards swarmed "in Samson's dead Lion." On one point it is possible that future writers on bees may consider Mr. Jenyns himself somewhat behind his times, although it is but fair to say that many, if not most, beekeepers still share his theory. He thinks that pollen "is the food of infant bees." It may be. We express no opinion. All we wish to observe is that so great an authority as Mr. Cheshire says that bee larvæ, on leaving the egg, are neither "fed on pollen, honey, and water, as constantly asserted, nor on regurgitated material, as was taught by Dufour, but on a secretion from a gland in the head of the nursing bees—a secretion which is truly a milk."

After describing the process of egg-hatching in birds, Mr. Jenyns says:—"But with the egg of the insect the process is very different. It hatches and produces, not an insect, but a grub or caterpillar." What, may we ask, is a grub or caterpillar, if it is not an insect? It is surely allowable here to propound the questions recommended to the observant young friend in the opening chapter—"'What is this?' and 'Why is this?'" On the next page Mr. Jenyns tells us something of the egg-laying habits of the common white butterfly. "You see it flying round some cabbage plants rather than the gay flowers. And why? It does not want the cabbage for itself; but it knows, taught by the marvellous instinct given to it, that the cabbage will afford the best possible kind of food for its young when hatched." Now is Mr. Jenyns so very sure of this? Has he any good grounds for saying that the common white butterfly either knows or cares what its young will feed upon? Is he certain that it is even aware that it is going to have any young? Will he guarantee that it knows for what purpose it lays its eggs? Such a knowledge has been greatly doubted in the case of birds. Is he sure that it would recognize its own child if it met it in the form of a caterpillar? The "marvellous instinct" we readily admit, nor do we absolutely deny the knowledge of the butterfly as to "the best possible food for its young"; but, with due reverence, we beg leave to consider it at best an open question.

The account of beehunting in America will interest many people, and it is a subject which is by no means universally noticed in books on bees. The hunter betakes himself to a likely spot, and catches a bee; then he gives it as much honey as it can carry, marks it with a little red paint and lets it go. After making a circle or two, the bee darts off in a particular direction. Marking the line of its flight, the hunter awaits its return, and then he again catches it, feeds it, and carries it for some distance in the direction of its flight, when he lets it go a second time. Again he observes its line, and then returns to wait for it at its feeding-ground. After repeating this process several times, he discovers a considerable part of its road home, and then he ventures on another device. Taking the bee some little distance to the right of its line, he lets it go, and very carefully observes the angle of its flight with the old line. The next time he catches it he takes it to an equal distance on the left of the original line, and again takes the angle as accurately as he can. He has now done with his bee. All he has to do further is to calculate the exact spot at which the two imaginary lines on either side of the original line would meet, and at that point, if he has made no error, he will find his hive. The corollary of this is, of course, that bees always fly home in a direct line. Mr. Jenyns suggests that his young friends should "try and find a wasp-nest some day much in the same way." If they follow this piece of advice, it is far from impossible that they may live to curse the day on which they read A Book About Bees by the Rev. F. G. Jenyns.

Bees have been painted for other purposes than bee-hunting. Sir John Lubbock used to make a bait of honey at some little distance from his hives and mark a few of the bees that came to it with small spots of different coloured paint. He then noted exactly how often each bee came back from the hive for more honey, within a given space of time, and how long it took in loading itself. Usually he found that a bee took about two minutes to load, and that it occupied about six minutes in flying to its hive, unloading, and returning for more honey. Bees have also been marked, for purposes of observation, by sprinkling them with flour. A certain bee-keeper "dusted with fine flour his bees as they emerged from a hive. Then, driving to a heath five miles distant, which he knew to be much frequented by the insects, he soon found many of those which he had sprinkled at home." Mr. Jenyns says that "cases have been known of bees actually going seven miles from home on the same errand." It is very true that bees will fly a long way to a favourite ground; but it is at the expense of considerable time and trouble, and it is unquestionably [illegible] for them to gather honey near home. In the [illegible] the best honey is made from white clover; but some [illegible] prefer that gathered from the heather to any other. Many [illegible] under the impression that a bee, when honey-[illegible] kind of flower to another until it has filled [illegible] states that this is not the case, [illegible] sticks to it, although it may go [illegible] same kind [illegible] He lays great stress on the usefulness of bees in the fertilization of flowers and fruit-blossoms. In his chapter on the "Importance of Bee-keeping" he says:—"If more bees were kept, there would be yet greater crops of good fruit in many an orchard and garden. We see an orchard white with lovely blossoms, but a vast number of these fall to the ground, and never develop into fruit for want of the visit of a bee."

Mr. Jenyns estimates the life of a bee born in spring or summer at from six to eight weeks, and that of one born in September at as many months; but he thinks a queen usually lives from three to five years, and lays more than a million eggs. Other authorities calculate the average number of eggs laid by a queen at a million and a half; and the young readers of A Book about Bees might have been interested to learn that there is a small insect of the bee tribe which, according to Réaumur, lays about a quintillion of eggs in the course of her brief life of a month or six weeks. A good word is said in this little book for drones. It has long been the fashion to abuse these unpopular insects; but we are now told "that they serve one great purpose," which is "to keep the interior of the hive nice and warm at a time when most of the other bees are out at work," and that "we do not, as yet, fully know all the good the drone does." The number of drones in one colony is here estimated as perhaps "sometimes as many as 2,000 or 3,000." In the opinion of a lecturer on apiculture at South Kensington, from six thousand to eight thousand would be nearer the mark. Mr. Jenyns says that bees consume 20 lbs. of honey in making 1 lb. of wax. He might have added that 1 lb. of wax in the form of honeycomb will store 22 lbs. of honey. The chapter on "Superstitions with regard to Bees" will amuse many people. The idea that bees will all fly away if there is a death in the house of their owner, unless they are specially informed of it, is still common. So, also, is the custom of pinning a piece of crape to the hive under similar circumstances. The proper thing to do is to go to the hive at midnight, tap it, say "So-and-so is dead," and then pin on the crape.

The Baroness Burdett Coutts has written a graceful introduction to this little book; and the author, in dedicating his work to her, describes her as one who "has ever shown the warmest sympathy with those who seek to promote the more extensive knowlege of bees and the practice of intelligent beekeeping."

ENGLISH SCHOOL BOOKS.*

COMPOSITION Exercises adds another to the already existing shoal of little books intended to teach the art of original composition. It aims at fulfilling the double object of giving a set of exercises in composition and a key to composition tests, and thus being of service to both teachers and taught. It is a well-meaning little book, but its merits begin and end there. The good intentions are but indifferently worked out. The writer has lost sight of the two essential qualifications for writing on any subject—to wit, first to know something about it, and, secondly, to be sure that what you know is correct. Turning to the essay on Parliament, we find some very startling statements about that ancient institution. The important part played by the Crown, on which the very existence of Parliament hangs, is lost sight of, and Parliament is defined as consisting of the two Houses of Lords and Commons. Stranger still is the statement that the peers of the realm and the bishops have a seat, and that "seat is hereditary." We should be glad to know the titles by which the sons of bishops sit in the Upper House. We are also surprised to hear that there are only "two political parties in England." We half think the writer must be giving us a fancy sketch of what Parliament ought to be rather than an account of what it is. The tale of the work the members do runs thus. They "make the laws, and see that those already made are properly carried out." We had thought the latter part was the work of the police, and could only be taken up by private citizens when sworn in as specials. We find further on that they, these same M.P.s, have to keep the army and navy efficient, and the forts in good condition. Surely the author must mean this as a satire. Among other funny passages we find the writer bidding his young friends rejoice that England is an island; for the odd reason that, if it were not an island, it would "never have been more than a province of France." We cannot see the force of this reasoning. If it has anything to do with geographical position, surely France ought, on the same grounds, to have become a province of Spain. Both were independent provinces of the Roman Empire; and it is just as rational to suppose that, if the provinces were to be amalgamated, Gaul would become part of Spain as that Britain should be merged in Gaul. But he is a little hazy in his notions about Britain and England. Oddly enough, he feels most proud of being English when he reads of battles in which the British come off victorious against fearful odds. Full of patriotism as he is, he forgets that this implied the defeat of his own forefathers. He finds it hardly credible that his ancestors "dressed in the skins of animals," and ate the "flesh of animals killed in the chase, together with fruit and roots." Alas! we have not improved past these practices yet; for do not those of us who can afford it dress in fur and eat game still? and, not content with indigenous roots, we have naturalized the swede, and that popular tuber the potato.

Reviewing an arithmetic book is no easy task. One is hardly in a position to pronounce upon its merits unless one has worked out all the problems and tested the accuracy of the answers. This we confess we have not done; we can only judge it from a literary point of view. There is not much room for variety among manuals of arithmetic. The subject is one upon which the charms of style have no power. Two and two can only make four, whether few or many words are lavished upon it. Arithmetic is the one and only science which fashion touches not. No new theories affect its primary elements. Weights and measures remain the same from year to year. Alone in this world of changes the multiplication table changes not, but abides, like the Sphinx or the Pyramids, a monument to immutability. There is a striking sameness, too, about the problems in all these manuals. In short, there is no outlet for the ingenuity which in other departments finds vent in varying the dull ladder of learning by turning primers into playbooks. We wonder, however, that no one has yet thought of publishing a pictorial arithmetic. We believe that it would have an enormous sale. It would give new life to the old problems, whilst they would supply an endless variety of subjects for a clever pencil. There are the reapers who clear a field in so many hours against the slower lot, who take so much longer, though there are twice as many of them; the horses which are always sold at a prodigious loss per cent.; the flocks of sheep the profit of whose wool has to be reckoned; the horses and the oxen ploughing; the ships that sail round the world in marvellously short time, or else get into difficulties and have to summon tugs to their aid; the clocks and watches that show such discrepancy between the time they keep at the Equator and at the Poles; the public buildings and interiors; the railway-trains, which vary so often in speed. No lack of subjects for landscapes, seascapes, pastorals, and interiors of the true Flemish type. For what can be better fitted to fix the measures of capacity on the memory than a series of drinking boors? Thus for all styles of the limner's art an arithmetic book might supply an endless variety of topics. Although it has not got so far as illustrations, in some points the Handbook of Preliminary Arithmetic strikes out a new line among manuals of arithmetic. Hitherto these have been forbidding-looking little octavos, with the dullest and dingiest of bindings and the smallest of print and figures. In this handbook the quarto pages give space to make the figures a readable size. Thus the risk of spoiling the eyesight and making misprints is very much lessened. The handbook contains the papers set for candidates for all the open competitions of the Civil Service and the army entrance examinations at Sandhurst and Woolwich. It also states the time allowed for working them. The book will thus be found highly useful by giving candidates an opportunity of testing their powers before presenting themselves for examination, and so saving themselves the bitterness of rejection. It will also give the friends of rejected cadets an opportunity of sounding the depths of these youngsters' incapacity.

Exercises in English Word Formation and Derivation will be found useful as an assistant in teaching English spelling, failure in which too often comes from a want of knowledge of derivation. We must protest, however, against some of the phrases which the pupil is called on to explain as though they were classic English. Glancing down the list, we find such vulgarisms as "the upper ten," "to strike oil," and "a Mrs. Harris," side by side with time-honoured mottoes and quotations. French phrases follow on the next page, and among these we find, as we expect, the curious English-French "double entendre." This has literally no meaning; but it is in such common use that, we take it, many persons may be surprised to hear that it is not French at all.

A Skeleton Outline of English History for Beginners is a still further abridgment of the same authors' Handbook in Outline of the Political History of England. Long lines of sovereigns, tables of pedigrees and lists of events, with dates attached, form the contents, to which are added a few uncoloured maps. It is intended for the use of children, the authors believing that the failures in history arise from the want of a firm foundation of facts and dates. This is strangely at variance with the new school of historians, who scorn facts and dates as matters of little moment. Indeed, the most popular of modern histories omits most of the facts and dates altogether. The teachers of history have split into two camps. The one set, which includes all crammers, pin their faith on facts without philosophy; the other preach philosophy without facts, and say this and this alone is history. One thing is certain, that children cannot learn history or any other subject unless their interest is awakened, and that can only be done by means of stories simple in style and prolix in detail. Such a bald outline as this is worse than useless for young pupils, as it disgusts them with the very name of history for the whole term of their natural lives. We think, however, it will be found useful by men cramming for examinations as a guide to show them the points of knowledge that will be expected of them, and that they ought to read up to. In short, it contains the sort of notes which, if they were students in earnest, they ought to jot down themselves as refreshers to the memory by recalling the gist of lectures or the results of private reading.

An edition of Marmion and The Lady of the Lake, coming from the other side of the Atlantic, lays claim to being the very first correct edition of Marmion ever issued. The editor avers that this poem has never hitherto been printed correctly. In the case of The Lady of the Lake he asserts that this is the first correct edition published for more than fifty years. Scott, it seems, overlooked certain misprints and faults in punctuation in his proofs which have been perpetuated in every subsequent edition, and which Mr. Rolfe is the first to detect. He seems to have forgotten Scott's own words, "that corrections, however in themselves judicious, have a bad effect after publication." The alterations are for the most part very trifling, and only touch the placing of a period, the substitution of "nor" for "and" or "was" for "were," and have but little effect on the sense of the text. But Mr. Rolfe has so firm a belief in the superhuman intelligence of the average schoolboy that even practical experience as a schoolmaster has failed to shake it. He is strong in the conviction that this phenomenal boy will at once perceive that his, Mr. Rolfe's, reading is the only one that gives the true meaning of the poet. The American schoolboy must use his brain a vast deal more than the English one if he stops to investigate such delicate shades of meaning. His prototype on this side of the Atlantic seldom looks at Scott's poems at all, unless they are assigned him as a holiday task. Then he defers casting even a hasty glance at them till the last day of the holidays, and then gallops through them at express speed. The only corrections we can discover which do seriously affect the meaning are, first, in the lines from The Lady of the Lake, Canto XII.:—

> Found in each cliff a narrow bower.

Thus the lines are printed in the ordinary editions. Mr. Rolfe has gone back to the reading of the first edition, which is "clift," and obviously the word intended. Of course, primroses and violets do not grow on the face of cliffs, but they do nestle in clifts or clefts, so that this correction bears its own justification on the face of it. Again, in the same Canto, when Roderick Dhu, in excusing his violent language, says in apology

> I meant not all my heart would say.

Mr. Rolfe restores the original reading "heat" for "heart." Mr. Rolfe retains Scott's notes, though abridging some of them. In these same notes he has found out a curious oversight of Lockhart's. In a long quotation from Froissart a whole page of manuscript has dropped out. The head and tail of two sentences that have no connexion with one another have been fitted together, thus making nonsense that by fifty years' repetition has come to pass for sense. To Scott's notes Mr. Rolfe has added a vast number of notes of his own, topographical and etymological. No doubt there are many expressions and allusions in Scott's poems which must require explanation to the English, and still more to the American, reader, though they seemed to himself so much a matter of course that he never thought of making notes about them. Mr. Rolfe's notes are rational, and fairly accurate. Here and there we find much room for improvement. For instance, he takes the "Links of Forth" to mean the windings of the Forth, instead of the meadows through which the river winds, though, if he has ever heard of the golf-playing on the links at St. Andrews, he might know better. Then, again, a foray in the Lennox is described as a raid in the lands of the Lennox family. This is taking the cart for the horse. A branch of the Stewarts took their title of Lennox from the district of Lennox, the strath of the river Leven. It was the earls who were called from the country, not the country from them. In the note on Maronnan's Cell he has nothing to add to Scott's dry comment that about the "saint's sanctity very little is now remembered." Yet on both sides of Scotland this saint's memory is embalmed in the local nomenclature. Inchmarnock, Kilmarnock, Kilmaronock, and many others, bear witness to the high place he held in popular estimation. Quaigh, too, we can tell Mr. Rolfe, is not invariably "a wooden cup composed of staves hooped together," as he defines it. It is quite as often made out of a single piece of horn. Again, in commenting on the passage "In Holyrood a knight he slew," he falls into the mistake of supposing that the turpitude of this act lay in its being homicide within the king's palace, and obviously does not see that it was the sacrilegious violation of the sanctuary that was the hideous part of the crime, Holyrood being originally an abbey, and only secondarily a royal palace. Despite these few blemishes, the notes will be found useful elucidations of the text by the majority of readers. The illustrations are good. They are copied from Osgood's illustrated edition.

Mr. Wade's Elementary Chapters in Comparative Philology fully carries out the promise of its title, and makes no pretensions beyond it. Such a very elementary book cannot, as the author [illegible], contain much original matter. Nor is it to be desired that it should. The aim of the compiler ought to be not to air his own views, but to put before his readers the latest [illegible] of the acknowledged masters of the science. To do this to any purpose he must first himself know who rank first as [illegible] the subject. This knowledge Mr. Wade possesses in no [illegible] degree. And he not only presents their views on philology as [illegible] from their works by himself, but gives a list of the [illegible] works to serve as a guide to [illegible] who may desire to follow up this slight sketch by going deeper into the subject. Mr. Wade divides his short treatise into six chapters. In the first of these he deals with the nature of language proper—that is, articulate sounds and their generally accepted symbols as the media for the interchange of thought as contrasted with the language of signs, whether expressed by gesticulation or hieroglyphics. The last chapter is devoted to the origin of spoken language. This is, of course, purely speculative, as no one has yet arrived at a satisfactory solution of the difficult question as to which is the original tongue in which the wants and emotions of primeval man first found utterance in a way intelligible to his fellows. Experiments in the isolated rearing of infants have been made by many philosophers. But from the time of gentle King James to our own day they have none of them produced a result definite enough to support any of the many theories extant; while the first unprompted gurglings of the most carefully nurtured infants have hitherto been too dissimilar to afford either confirmation or negation to the conflicting claims of contending savants eager for distinction in that interesting, though narrow, field of linguistical research. The gist of the book lies in the intervening chapters, in which the influences that have been at work to produce the countless variations in modern tongues are discussed under the headings "Dialects," "Change in Language," and "Morphology." Of these the chapter on "Change in Language" is, as might be expected, very much the longest and most important, and the explanation of the phonetic laws which regulate these changes is at once simple and forcible. The examples produced in illustration of the various processes of transmutation and contraction which words have suffered in the mill of time are apt and original. Mr. Wade has selected them for himself, instead of falling back on the well-worn stock which one meets over and over again in all the manuals on the subject. The section on the creation of new words takes in all such recent accessions as "Healtheries," with which the yearly colossal exhibitions have enriched the vocabulary. On the change of English from a purely Teutonic tongue by the admixture of the Romance element Mr. Wade is rather ambiguous. He writes that the "Battle of Hastings was followed by the introduction of numerous Norman-French" words into English; and, again, that the conquest of England by the Normans had the effect of substituting French terms for English ones in all higher relations of society. He forgets to point out the length of time that passed before this result of the Norman Conquest made any impression on the national speech, of the centuries that separated the Conquest from Chaucer. A happy illustration of the wide gulf which parts the ideas of the extremes of society is the different meaning connected with the phrase going to "the House" by the upper and lower classes. To the one it suggests, or rather once suggested, the highest dignity; to the other, the lowest depth of degradation.

A BOOK ABOUT BEER.*

MR. MARCHANT "would fain hope" that this book of his "may be one means of inducing the public to revert back to good, honest beer." The hope is laudable enough, but the wish is altogether vain. As well might he expect to convert society from the use of dress-clothes by exhibiting a rag-bag. The poor word "book" has covered multitudes of sins in its day, but it has covered none lustier or less abashed than this farrago In Praise of Ale. Mr. Marchant means well, no doubt, and is no doubt a fanatic in the worship of Gambrinus; also, he has read whatever he could lay hands upon in relation to his subject, and has been at the pains of making innumerable extracts. But there is really no more to be said for him than that. His work produces the effect of Mr. Boffin's mounds. There is more order in a howling wilderness, and less confusion in the "wild anarchy" of an Irish night at the House. True it is that the thing is divided into chapters; that these chapters have headings, and that with these the material collected under them will as often as not be found corresponding. But, on the other hand, Mr. Marchant is capable of the strangest excesses in the way of misquotation and improper arrangement; his ideas of dates and sources are as loose and inconstant as the reputation of the moon; he hops about among the ages with incredible agility; he skips from author to author and from book to book—from Leviticus to Pierce Egan, from the Penny Magazine to Fletcher's Bloody Brother, from Othello to the lyrists of the Catnach Press, from Diodorus Siculus to the Morning Post, from the poetical works of Milton to the poetical works of Mrs. Newton Crosland—with such a celerity of inconsequence that, to keep up with him, one had need to be a Japanese ogre. What he has produced, indeed, is only a kind of scrap-book. Viewed in that light, In Praise of Ale is neither useless nor unamusing, for it is crowded with prose and verse which is always curious and very often entertaining, and it may be read at random—beginning at the end, or in the middle, or at any page you like, and reading either back or forwards—almost as easily as the "Varieties" column in a popular weekly print.

Beer, it is true, has not been fortunate [illegible]. Its tendency is rather to [illegible] than to inspire. [illegible] sherris-sack in that it ascends us into the [illegible] it is that it does not fill the brain with delectable shapes, or make it quick, fiery, and apprehensive. Tom Warton himself when he came to sing the praises of Oxford ale did little more, as our author (in a moment of unwonted lucidity) is moved to remark, than produce an imitation of The Splendid Shilling; and Tom Warton was one of the aboriginals of Romanticism. Even Burns, though he had the right sentiment of the liquor, and wrote about it as no one else has done, was better, we take it, when he was objective and dramatic than when he was lyrical and subjective. As for the minor masters, the common herd of poetasters, they have found the Hippocrene of the ale-tub a mere provocative to vulgarity. The exception is, of course, the jovial bishop who wrote that hymn in praise of "Jolly brown ale and old," which will last as long as ale is drunk or English is spoken. But this lyric even—admirable as it is, in melody, in inspiration, in humanity alike—has had no successors. Fletcher knew something of what Mr. Meredith has called the Magnanimity of Beer (Mr. Meredith, by the way, as was to be expected, is not represented in our author's gathering), and so did some of his rivals and contemporaries. But, though Fletcher's example was good as far as it went, and though many a roisterer of to-day bawls out his enthusiasm in the very words of the poet of The Faithful Shepherdess, his influence has not proved the fertilizing agency it should. The work of this excellent drink has been rather Roman than Hellenic—has been rather practical than æsthetic. An element in British valour, an important component in the British constitution, it has gone, in conjunction with beef, the round of the battle-fields of the world. It is the potation, not of men who dream, but of men who do. As we have said, the Muse is no beer-drinker. For one good song of beer there are fifty better songs of wine. The poet who depends on ale writes only for harvest-homes and wakes or for music-halls and free-and-easies. At best his enthusiasm is merely prosaic; he misses the rapture, the ecstasy of contemplation, the inspired and heaven-scaling headiness that comes of the frequentation of wine. True it is that "wi' tippenny we fear na evil"; but also true it is that "wi' usquebaugh we face the devil." There is the root of the matter in a single couplet. Mr. Marchant—as we have said, a leal worshipper of Gambrinus, the Primeval Brewer—quotes rather more verse than prose in honour of his patron; but the verse is mean in style, in effect unliterary and disconcerting, in inspiration base, common, and popular. The effect conveyed is one either of fat-witted and vulgar joviality or of a dull and obtuse and unenthusiastic kind of craving for imbibition. In the one case the poet gets no higher than Burns in "We're a' noddin'"—that admirable yet deplorable picture of the minds and the morals of a company of beer-drinking ladies—or that other and scarce less admirable and deplorable report of Skelton's ("John Skelton," says our author, in a burst of erudition, "who wrote and compiled from Old Authors and Old Books") The Tunnyng of Elinor Rummyng; and in the other it is either the sturdy and uncompromising drunkenhead of the singers of that Song of the Barley-Mow who, beginning with the nipperkin, pass by way of the pint-pot, quart-pot, kilderkin, hogshead, tun, till they achieve the consumption of the ocean itself, or the "damnable iteration" of the tradesmen met to guzzle themselves drunk to the tune of "When Joan's Ale was New." Between these extremes is the sentimental beer-song, of which the only decent example out of Burns is "All Among the Barley," beloved of unaccomplished choral societies and those exulting in school feasts; is the local ditty by the local poet in praise of the local tap—Dorsetshire, Wiltshire, Yorkshire, Edinburgh, or what not; is the lyric of life and wit and fashion achieved by "Tom D'Urphey" (as our author calls him) and his descendants. The retrospect is disheartening enough; but the fact is more disheartening a thousandfold. Does any one remember Ross's canticle in praise of home-brewed? 'Tis one of the best of its class; Thackeray must have listened to it often, as to the tremendous chant of "Sam Hall"; it is only, when all is said, a picture of the Perfect Sot:—

> Ale, brown ale, thou art my darling,
> My consoler night and morning.

Thus it runs, and thus run scores besides. Mr. Marchant, with his habitual infelicity, omits this particular testimony to the effects of his favourite beverage; but he quotes a number more, and they all go to the same tune. In their company Richepin's "Pâle et blonde" would have been positively exhilarating by sheer force of contrast. A song of beer, it would seem, is inevitably a song of soaking. "Mighty drink of mighty men" (as somebody, ignored by Mr. Marchant, has said of it) as it is, its Anacreon is "mostly a brute." The poet who should arise and wipe away its reproach among drinks has, one would think, an easy and an honourable task. He has but to dissociate it from the tendency to mere fuddlement which appears to be, in the eyes of its laureates, its chief attraction, to produce, one cannot help thinking, something the world will not willingly let die.

Mr. Marchant's chapter-headings are probably the most encouraging—as they are certainly the most original—parts of his work. Here is a complete list of them:—"History," "Carols and Wassail Songs," "Church Ales and Observances," "Whitsun Ales," "Political" (a dreadful and grimy disappointment, this one!), "Harvest Songs," "General Songs," "Barley and Malt," "Hops," "Scotch Ale Songs," "Local and Dialect Songs," "Trade Songs," "[illegible] Songs," "Ale Wives," "Brewers," "Drinking Clubs and [illegible]," "Royal and Noble Drinkers," "Black Beer," "Drinking Vessels," "Warm Ales" (which contains some notable receipts for flips, purls, and other forms of drunkenness, that for dog's-nose not included), and "Facts, Scraps, and Ana." This last might well have sponsored the volume itself; but let that pass. We have dwelt at length on the quality of the inspiration of beer, because the fact of its coarseness and "fat-headedness" is, as Mr. Marchant is unfortunate enough to show, the fact which of all others "leaps to the eyes" most vigorously in the course of the most cursory study of the literature of the subject. It remains to add that Mr. Marchant, though he is continually being brought to grief by his inability to distinguish between the cause and the effect—between good beer and bad literature—has collected a vast amount of odd, amusing, and (to him that hath the sentiment of beer) suggestive and interesting matter. He is often inaccurate, as, unless the question is one to be resolved by physical force, your good beer-drinker is apt to be; and he is absolutely incapable of arriving, whatever his premisses, at any but a sentimental conclusion. But, for all that, his volume (we refuse to call it a book) is a volume to have. If only as a manual of quotations, if only as a collection of songs, it is a volume to have. We confess to having read in it, for the first time in our lives, the right and authentic text of "A Cobbler There Was" and "Why, Soldiers, Why;" and to have remarked, as regards the first, that our ancestors were very easily amused, and, as regards the second, that it has a curious air de famille with the triolet. These are very far from being Mr. Marchant's only finds; but that is all the more reason why we should linger upon them. In respect of the second (a good song in its way), the suggestion is really striking. It consists of a certain number of stanzas, and in each the formula of the first four lines—

> Why, soldiers, why
> Should we be melancholy, boys;
> Whose trade it is to die?
> Why, soldiers, why—is invariable. Was the poet "privately French" without knowing it? To us it seems proved that he knew the triolet, and was influenced by it; even as it is demonstrated by one of the lyrics in The Lady of the Lake that Scott knew the ballade, and was influenced by it. Triolets and the drinking of beer do not often go together; and the coincidence—to say the least of it—is strange.

NOVELS AND STORIES.*

WHEN the ship containing the autobiographical gentleman who tells the story of Marahuna penetrates, after startling adventures, the barrier of ice separating the greater part of the Antarctic Circle from the explored seas, and goes ahead across comparatively open water in the direction of the South Pole, the experienced reader confidently assumes that he is about to emulate the heroes of Messrs. Haggard, Westall, and Company, and find a new but not surprising country. For once, however, the experienced reader is wrong. What Mr. Percy Grayhurst and his companions find is a furnace—they call it an island—of crimson fire, so big that they cannot get round it, and so hot that they cannot get near it. Just as they are giving it up in despair and coming away a boat comes out of the fire. It collides with the ship and sinks, but not before Grayhurst has pulled out of it a young woman, very oddly dressed, and of surpassing loveliness. As she comes on board she says "Marahuna." It is the only word of her language—if she had a language—that she ever speaks, so they give it her for a name. Having taken her on board they manage to escape from the Antarctic Circle, and never go back. The substance of the book is how Marahuna behaved when they brought her to England, and what were her relations with Grayhurst, who had received her when she came out of the fire, and with a young lady called Ethel, who was Grayhurst's promised wife. It turns out, first that Marahuna knows nothing about where she came from, and remembers nothing before coming on board the ship. Secondly, that she is a person of inhuman cleverness. Thirdly, that she is free from all, or nearly all, human passions. Fourthly, that she has no morals. She is, in fact, a far less commonplace and better conceived character than Frankenstein's celebrated monster, with whom, in her isolation from the human race, she has a good deal in common. If Miss Marriott Watson's powers of execution were equal to her felicity of design Marahuna would be an extremely remarkable book. As it is, it is a story of a good deal more than average ability. It need hardly be said that Marahuna makes mischief; whoever cares to know what mischief she makes must read the book. Her extraordinary quickness in learning the English language and the habits and slang of cultivated modern Englishmen is, of course, necessary to make the story interesting and to get on with it at a fair pace. It will be remembered that a similar intellectual pre-eminence was characteristic of the Monster, but in Marahuna the topic is managed less clumsily, more being left to the reader's imagination. One feat of hers which is worthy of mention is that, having left the crimson fire at a time when her subsequent memory ran not to the contrary, she sailed straight to England, being arrayed all that time in a very peculiar crimson garment, apparently all in one piece. On arriving at Plymouth, Grayhurst, as well as he could, bought her the apparel of an English lady. She immediately put it on by the light of nature, in such a manner, if we may take her biographer's word for it, that other ladies did not notice anything particularly odd about it. Of course there may be nothing surprising in this; but how many men could do it? The catastrophe of the story is impressive, as, indeed, are some other passages, notably the drowning of a baronet who was in love with Marahuna, and the way she took it, and a scene between her and Grayhurst in a cave. (Has Miss Watson ever heard of Dido?) The conclusion is picturesque, not to say tragic, and the mystery of Marahuna's origin and nature is not solved any more than a reader of taste would wish it to be solved. The pugnacious love-making between Grayhurst and Ethel is rather tiresome, and that is perhaps the most serious fault in a very clever story, and one deserving to be read by the judicious.

It is not so widely known as it ought to be that a thoughtful person may get a great deal of amusement out of Dissenting novels. They are, therefore, somewhat rare. We are not speaking now of temperance novels, which occasionally rise to such heights of splendour as My Milliner's Bill, played by the two regular performers of it, occupies among farces, but of novels embracing the whole field of Dissent, in which teetotalism is only one feature. The best writer of these is Dr. Parker of the City Temple. One of the fascinations of Bigotry and Progress is that while reading it one is never quite sure that that eminent man is not the author of it. It concludes with a short extract from his works, with his name attached, but that circumstances throw no light on the problem, of which no solution is offered here. It is the story of a horrible youth called Henry Humboldt. He has a bigoted father, whom he defies (and who becomes an idiot), and he moves, with ever-increasing prosperity, amidst circles of profoundly sleek, odious, and vulgar friends. Of course he is a minister, and loses no opportunity of styling himself "Rev." Whenever he can he makes a speech, preaches a sermon, or delivers an address. Here is a characteristic extract from one of his letters:—"I have passed through my first experience of a death-bed scene. It was a happy transition . . . . . Another death, horrible to tell, was enacted near here yesterday by barbarous hanging. The poor fellow was a victim for many years to cruel tyranny inflicted by one who, in a moment of provoked exasperation, was assaulted by a deadly blow. Upon the one ground of the many shades of guilt involved in the crime of murder my belief is becoming stronger that the law of death is wrong and must soon be abolished. Martin Tupper has written with great force, and in terms which apply directly to the case." He then quotes sixteen lines of Mr. Tupper's terms. Who would not welcome such a correspondent? The author's own style is like this:—"With a pleasure begotten in this instance of no factitive propriety, but grown of habitude, yet super-lustred with the glory of gratulation, Helen Earle hastened to admit her now heart-linked guest before the hand had ceased the knocking." Once Henry was trying to persuade an elderly lady married to a fellow-minister to go to a garden-party. She hesitated. He said:—"There is no question about your being heartily received. The grounds are spacious and attractive, and will afford you pleasant privacy should you be disposed to court it." The book is less one to be read through than to be kept for years on the table and taken up at moments of depression. It contains many gems that we refrain from quoting only by the most heroic efforts. But we cannot part from it without observing that "Henry Humboldt is an abstainer from inebriants, from smoking, from inerrancy, and from egotheism." We will bet 10,000 to 1 that he admired Mr. Gladstone and is a convinced Home Ruler. What takers?

Herr Richter's Strange Experiment is a very good shilling's-worth, as shilling's-worths go. There is a murder in it which is only a little better than the murder in the Mystery of a Hansom Cab; but that is merely a necessary incident. The point is the experiment, which consists in making two men temporarily change souls. Their bodies sit still, and their souls travel along specially prepared cords in consequence of the ingenious manipulation of certain chemically adjusted fluids. The disembodied soul is somewhat arbitrarily alleged to be able to see and hear, but not to have the other three bodily senses. No reason for this difference is alleged. The end of the book, though a little obvious, is the proper one, and the mystery of how the transfer was managed is not explained.

Queen Money is rather a fraud. It is in one volume, and looks rather short than long. It is, in fact, rather long than short, and is exceedingly difficult to get through. It is an American novel, not of the analytical, but of the fluently eventful kind. The most pleasing thing in it is the name of one of the prominent ladies. She was called Arria. It was her name; and it was her name because she was a female 'Arry. All the people in the book are [illegible] or male 'Arries; but the others are not so honestly [illegible]. They all prose terribly, and either swindle each other or [illegible] flirtations with unattractive and more or less [illegible]. They all exhibit a pleasing lack of [illegible] manners, and everything which [illegible] of metropolitan from the [illegible] ing sort of provincial individual. One of them was the greatest critic in America, and an astonishing wit. We have searched 513 deadly pages in vain for an example of his wit, but he does seem from one passage to have been a partly competent critic. His wife wanted to make some money, and asked him why she should not write articles like some which she specified. He replied "that, although it might seem an easy matter to write like the experts of the —— ——, he knew of but one man in this country who could do it—and that man, he remarked, with unobtrusive frankness, was himself." The newspaper here indicated (to prevent jealousy) by blanks is English.

Mr. Hatton has selected as the text of a shilling novel Southey's well-known ballad of "Mary, the Maid of the Inn." The murderous lover who there figures simply as "young Richard," who "was idle and worthless" is here transformed into Richard Parker, a bandit of noble birth, but of great fame on the road. The story is elaborated to a suitable length; a virtuous rival of Parker's is introduced; the trial occupies a chapter—and we are sorry to say it is not a bit better done than trials in shilling stories usually are—and the story is carried on some little way beyond the moment when "Where the old abbey stands on the common hard by, His gibbet is now to be seen." If the ballad had never been written the story would be exceptionally good, as it is told with much romantic feeling. Mr. Hatton would do well to change the title in future editions to Mary, the Maid of the Inn. Then the reader would know at once where he was, instead of finding it out by degrees in the first few pages.

"Peregrinator's" two volumes about Florida consist of a mixture of guide-book and novel which would be offensive if it were less ingenuous. As a guide-book writer the author has some merit, though if he could ever write English he has lost the art in the course of his peregrinations. As a novelist he does not deserve to be criticized in earnest. Here and there are episodes of extremely wild but tremendously heavy farce, which seem equally out of place in each category of his labours. There is nothing that can be called a plot, and the conclusion, arrived at only by the help of a crudely introduced family ghost, is feebleness itself. The information about the animals, vegetables, climate, and circumstances generally of Florida looks as if it were accurate, but is not made amusing. Perhaps the following should be excepted:—

> But they had many other pleasant things to do besides admiring scenery, during this delightful excursion. For example, whilst they were journeying through lacustrine Florida they had capital duck-shooting, and when they came to the banks of rivers they used to shoot alligators as well. This, therefore, imparted much fresh interest to the tour.

CHURCHES AND TITHES.*

LORD SELBORNE'S volume on Disestablishment may claim, with certainty of establishing its claim, to be the most successful volume on a somewhat dry and technical subject of recent times. Without the attraction of innovation, and with the undoubted disadvantage that the author was burning certain things that he has adored, if he adored nothing that he had burnt, it has gone through three editions in a few months, and that with the still greater feather in its cap of having simply frightened off all opponents from any serious attempt to reply to it. It would have been the height of diversion if Sir William Harcourt, who used to think himself an historical lawyer, and who is never tired of telling us how he was brought up near to the Church, had attempted the task of an answer; or Mr. Osborne Morgan, or Sir Charles Russell. They have more wit than to be there; they leave the reply to those who assure us that Lord Selborne cannot be a lawyer because he edited the Book of Praise. But there were some gaps in the Defence of the Church of England against Disestablishment, and Lord Selborne has set to work to fill them up. As a mere matter of method it might have been somewhat desirable that he should separate the tithes question, which is highly complicated and at the same time quite peculiar, from the general subject of Church sustentation funds, and the means of their formation. But he has chosen to treat the two together, and he was well entitled to choose his own mode of treatment.

The earlier chapters of the book are devoted mainly to the general enactments which, in early times, governed the allotment of funds, which were, from whatever sources, devoted to Church purposes. There may be said to be two main principles of division; the older, which gave quarter shares to the bishop, to the clergy, to the poor, and to the fabric and maintenance of churches, and the newer, which excluded (though the authorities on this vary greatly) not the bishops, but the poor, and gave the shares to the bishop, the clergy, and the material church. It is noteworthy—and the Liberationists are welcome to make the most of it—that the lay holding of tithes is undoubtedly discouraged by all good early authority, and was first brought in by the Church of Rome after it had assumed or usurped central authority. Equally early is the principle that the right of access is held secure to every Christian, for the addition [illegible] vestiantur is purely modern. The other addition [illegible] not so modern, but is equally [illegible]. It is, however, of great importance, and is well [illegible] by Lord Selborne, that the ancient divisions, the [illegible] partite division, and the much more [illegible] tripartite, were both practically antiquated by the introduction of the parochial system. This system may in a certain sense be said to be contemporary with the establishment of the tithe system. In other words, when tithes in the modern sense, as allocated to the Church and clergy of the place, became usual, the parochial endowment rested on them, and was sharply separated from the endowment from diocesan or general purposes. The allocation cannot be said to have carried with it any liability to the expenses which had been earlier charged on the general contributed Sustentation Fund, to use a modern but very appropriate term, in ways very imperfectly understood for the Church at large. It had definite purposes, a definite mode of collection, and, in particular, was the offering, not by any means of the people or the faithful at large, but of particular persons who for all time provided at no expense to others the source of the funds they gave.

* Ancient Facts and Fictions [illegible] By the Earl of Selborne. [illegible]

The second branch of the subject with which Lord Selborne deals is the emergence of the parochial system—again a question separate from that of tithes proper, but closely connected with it, inasmuch as it was to the use of the parish that tithes, when not diverted, were especially dedicated. Our author shares the just scepticism of the best historians as to the institution of parishes in our sense by Honorius or even by Theodore, and, indeed, it is impossible to understand how any critical student could fail to see that at the very furthest nothing can be built on the use of such a vox ambigua as parochia, which was certainly at first identical with "diocese." But he agrees that it is pretty certain that, in our own country, parishes in the modern sense must have begun to exist soon after the end of the seventh century, while the general existence of them throughout Christendom and the dedication of tithes to their use (sometimes to the great wrath of the regular clergy) is a fact altogether beyond controversy. It is unquestionable, however, and this is one of the points which make us rather regret that Lord Selborne has not kept the subject of tithes to itself, that the mixing up of debatable points of this kind gives some advantage to controversialists so unscrupulous as our Liberationists. "See," they will say, "even Lord Selborne does not believe in the Honorian theory!" To be sure, most of them may be justly credited with a perfect ignorance of what the Honorian theory is, and of the fact that, whether the parochial system had been established by Honorius or by Archbishop Parker himself, it would make not the slightest difference either to the general question of the rights of the Church in its property or to the particular question whether John Jones, being trusted by his landlord to pay a certain sum out of the landlord's pocket to the Rev. Richard Richards, is entitled to put it in his own pocket because he calls himself a Particular Baptist.

It is by slow degrees, one of the most important of which as regards this country is, in the negative side, a very proper waiving of the supposed donation of Offa, and another an equally proper insistence on the recognition in the late eighth century of tithes as an acknowledged and universally incumbent duty, that Lord Selborne comes to the actual discussion of tithes themselves. As regards the Church at large, there is no certain indication of their existing as a legally recognized due before the end of the sixth century, if even then; as regards Britain, despite casual mentions of "the tenth," we may wait another two centuries for certainty. Indeed, Lord Selborne, here stricter than Selden, would hold that no lay acknowledgment by sanction of the duty of tithes existed previous to the agreement between Edward the Elder and Guthrum, where the omission to pay is enforced by penalties on English and Danes alike. Thenceforward there is no doubt about the matter. Athelstan's ordinance, call it a law or not, is certain even if we dismiss Ethelwulf's charters. This history is followed by an equally searching criticism of subsequent documents and Acts down to the undoubted establishment of parishes at the end of the tenth and the beginning of the eleventh centuries. We have, unfortunately, not space enough to go through this, and, besides, enough has been said to show how thoroughly Lord Selborne himself has gone into the matter, and how impossible it is to charge him with credulous reception either of theories based on documents or of documents themselves.

It is important, however, in reading the book, though we are not sure that it will be done by most of Lord Selborne's adversaries, to remember the purpose with which it is written. He speaks of it as dealing with "some historical questions which, though they have not any real bearing on the controversies of the day, are sometimes represented in a way which makes it desirable that the facts concerning them should be understood." In order to understand the full force of this remark it is further necessary to remember that the attack on Church establishments and on tithes is conducted with a wonderful unanimity from two entirely opposite points of view. The Liberationist is by turns a frank Erastian and a mystical touch-not-the-ark man. At one moment Church endowments are to him public taxes diverted by certain constituted authorities to special uses and resumable (we trust that the wonderful dunces who object to "presumable" will not have a fit at "resumable") by the representatives and successors of the same authorities. At another they are represented not only as the freewill offering of the piety of Christians, but as a freewill offering which must continue to recommend itself to the piety of these Christians, or else may be withheld as the Christian's conscience or his cupidity may dictate. Of course these two things cannot be true together, but that does not matter to Mr. Osborne Morgan and Sir William Harcourt. The opposite and the true theory which this book is designed to support is that the general religious or ecclesiastical obligation of Christians to devote a tenth of their substance to pious uses, ecclesiastical and eleemosynary, is, however closely it may be related, independent as a matter of law, politics, and history of the existing prædial tithes, and that these latter, entirely distinct from the former, are, in fact, endowments or gifts of a certain amount of property to certain persons and their successors for their personal use, though couched in the form of a perpetual rent-charge instead of a lump sum. In yet other words, it was open to any Josceline or Miles in the twelfth century to give one of every ten fields to the Church in fee-simple or to give the tenth of the produce of the ten fields. He gave the latter; and, for convenience more than anything else, his representative in the nineteenth century, instead of taking the ten parts and handing over one, takes nine from the farmer and tells him to hand the tenth straight on. He is not obeying Offa or Ethelwulf or anybody else; he is simply paying a private debt secured in a certain fashion.

That this is the true view of the case hardly any one as regards present circumstances denies, unless he simply speaks out of his inner consciousness. That it is the true view of the case as to the question of historical origins is more easily deniable, because the facts are more obscurely known. It would not really make the conduct of Welsh farmers one jot better if King Offa had made a donation as well as a dyke. As it happens, he did not, and so throughout the chapter. Of Lord Selborne's own contribution to the question it may justly be said that it increases one's regret that so few lawyers are historians and so few historians lawyers. To those who demand the picturesque, the picturesque, and always the picturesque, as the sole merit of a history, and who dismiss solid criticism as "wiredrawn argument," Lord Selborne will, of course, be unsatisfactory. We, on the other hand, only hope that he will continue this study, so as to make a complete history of this side of the English Church.

HILLINGDON HALL.*

MR. JORROCKS is one of those evergreens whom age cannot wither nor modern culture stale. Handley Cross certainly used to be, and probably is still, the delight of every well-constituted schoolboy; while the somewhat soberer Hillingdon Hall should have considerable interest for country folk at the present day, both as a picture of life in the early days of Queen Victoria, and as containing several eloquent dissertations by the hero and others on the effect of the abolition of the Corn-laws upon the agricultural interest. Pregnant aphorisms will be found scattered throughout the work—e.g. "Fools are always mysterious." "Women always smile at the mention of bride-cake." "No constitution, however strong, can long withstand the united effects of eating and drinking," &c. Of eating and drinking there is, indeed, an inordinate quantity. The degenerate modern cannot repress a shudder when, after the Agricultural Association dinner, Mr. Jorrocks, having even then well drunk, orders the waiter to bring "a dozen of your strongest military port." Equally interesting details will be found upon the subject of costume. Mrs. Jorrocks appeared at a harvest-home festival "in a dress of many-coloured muslin, done in tiers like house-slating; next her dumpy waist came a pea-green tier, immediately below it a bright yellow, followed by red; then a sky-blue and a white, fringed with broad lace at the bottom. Each tier was understood to be a separate affair . . . . she 'stood out,' looking like a rainbow dumpling." Since Mrs. Jorrocks's day ladies have learned how to "stand out" without wearing such multitudinous garments; indeed, we detect the germ of crinoline in the "horse-hair bustles" so frequently mentioned. Nor was male attire less elaborate. The Jorrockian jacket must always have been unique; but a young nobleman is described as appearing at a dinner party dressed in "a pink silk underwaistcoat and diamond studs, his waistcoat of cerulean blue satin, worked with heartsease, buttoned with buttons of enormous bloodstones, and pink silk stockings"—they are called pantaloons a few pages further. The same person appears in the morning "in the extreme of London fashion. A gold-laced, gold-tasselled blue foraging-cap, set jauntily on his well-waxed light brown ringlets; the ample tie of his rich blue and gold satin cravat, secured by enormous pearl pins, covered the wide opening made by a very broad roll-collared white waistcoat, loose down to the two bottom buttons, while the narrow hem of a collar to his blue coat barely came up to the nape of his neck, and the nippy waist began considerably higher up than nature had put his own. His trousers of lavender-coloured merino," &c. Such must have been the coat in which Colonel Newcome made such a sensation at Mrs. Hobson Newcome's conversazione. What a zest it must have added to life to feel that one might meet one of these superbly-attired beings any day in the street! Truly says Alfred de Musset, "Qu'on ne s'y trompe pas; ce vêtement noir que portent les hommes de notre temps est un symbole terrible; pour en venir là, il a fallu que les armures tombassent pièce à pièce, et les broderies fleur à fleur." There is very little hunting in Hillingdon Hall, and what little there is—a little trifling with beagles—is rendered pathetic by the fact of Mr. Jorrocks being too old and fat to keep up with them on foot, so that he sits down on a stone and weeps at the thought that his hunting days are over; but his vitality directs itself into other channels, and when we take leave of him he is M.P. for the county, pledged to resist the Anti-Corn-law League and Free-trade to the utmost of his powers; stimulated thereunto by the pathetic appeal of one of his farmer constituents, "Let the Marquis"—i.e. the Repealers—"get a start, and it's all over with us. You may give your land away, if you can get anybody to take it, that's to say."

THE SPANISH WAR OF SUCCESSION.*

IT will be generally agreed, though for reasons other than those given by Colonel Parnell, that there is still room for a history of the War of the Succession in Spain. This part of the struggle against Lewis XIV. stood so entirely apart from the great war in Germany and Flanders that it can well be taken by itself. Then, it is interesting and picturesque, full of examples of "little war." Further, it has a real historical attraction for Englishmen, both because of our countrymen who figured there and because the war itself was a half-way house between the Spanish adventures of the Black Prince and John of Gaunt and the Peninsular War. Lord Stanhope's History—though still, as we propose to show, the best we possess—is mainly political, and is in the military parts somewhat superficial. A new writer who could add to Lord Stanhope's knowledge of the politics a sound understanding of war might make a valuable book. There is much which needs explaining in the strategy, in the organization of the armies, and we are not aware that anybody has yet shown what real share the guerrilleros of Castile had in establishing Philip V. on his throne. It would be interesting to have a good military estimate of the services of such a man as the guerrillero Zerezeda, of whom Berwick said that he never neglected his advice without having cause to be sorry for it.

This exhaustive history has, however, still to be written, for Colonel Parnell has not filled up the empty place. For one thing, he omits the politics of the war, though they had a most direct influence on the military movements. This might be pardonable in a soldier if he gave his reader intelligent professional criticism as a compensation. But of that there is next to none in Colonel Parnell's book. We expect more from a military gentleman than vague statements that Berwick's strategy in retreating and omitting to harass his enemy on a certain occasion is "open to grave criticism." We ask why? and should like to hear what other course he might and ought to have taken. Indeed, generally speaking, Colonel Parnell's accounts of military operations are not more soldierly than Lord Stanhope's, and are frequently less clear. To quote Napier's criticism on Sir William Hoste's letters, "His descriptions of actions are meagre, dull, and borné; he seems never to have taken a view of the causes of success or defeat." (This quotation is made without acknowledging the justice of the Whig soldier's estimate of the Tory sailor of Lord Nelson's "bad school." It is taken as a useful definition of a large class of writers about fighting.) Now it is just this "view of the causes" which we ask for from a soldier writing of war. Colonel Parnell does, however, flash up into some sort of sprightliness from time to time—and nobody will be surprised to hear that it is when he comes across Peterborough, who was not only lively himself, but the cause of liveliness in others. It must not be supposed, however, that Col nel Parnell is among the admirers of Mordaunto. Much the reverse, as will be seen from the following adjectives and phrases which we select at random. According to this historian, Peterborough was "a contemptible impostor," was "notorious for foul living, open Atheism, and boastful talking"; his "motives appear to have been a mixture of cowardice, disaffection, and jealousy of the Prince" (of Hesse); his conduct "was treacherous"; he was "a deserter," and "the Parolles of Queen Anne's reign," and so forth. The Colonel appears to have studied the oratory of the party which follows his distinguished namesake in the House. May we adapt George Fitzboodle and ask him "from what Irish member he learned his language"? But the O'Brien-Dillon style is common with him. Here, for instance, is a summing-up of St.-Simon:—"His membry [Vendôme's, to wit] has been greatly calumniated by the animosity of the Duc de St.-Simon, whose Memoirs, written, according to Lord Macaulay, 'for the delight and instruction of many lands and of many generations,' are a mass of malicious gossip, indecency, and falsehood." This would sound better from the Irish stump, where such transcendencies are more allowed. We notice with pleasure that the authority for this sort of thing is "original manuscript and contemporary records." The State Paper mania is producing fruit after its kind obviously. It is characteristic that a gentleman who blethers in this fashion should refer to all kinds of unpublished things which he never quotes, and should give references [illegible] at large, to "Burke 1872," whatever that may mean, and should accept Stephen Leake's Life of Sir John Leake as an [illegible] authority. Colonel Parnell's references to authorities [illegible] a string at the end of his chapters, and where we can [illegible] they have very commonly the air of being put in to [illegible]. His great reason for condemning Peterborough is [illegible] was not a trained soldier and could not have done the things attributed to him. To which it may be replied that military life produces the military pedant as well as the trained soldier. Colonel Parnell would probably maintain that Braddock could not possibly have been in the wrong and Washington in the right on a melancholy occasion, for the Englishman was a trained soldier and the Virginian was not.

Very naturally Colonel Parnell dismisses Carleton's as a "mendacious concoction," yet in an examination into the authenticity of the Memoirs he has to acknowledge that there was a Captain George Carleton present at the operations described in the book. The author, however, is sure that he could not have written it, because he could not, and there is an end on't. There is much in it which "could never have entered the mind of a trained officer" (smoke the military pedant, as Peterborough would have said), and then, too, "there is frequent mention of Irish persons (and especially Irish priests)," together "with impiety and indecency." Peterborough, says Colonel Parnell, wrote the Memoirs himself. They were a part of his Atheism and foul living. It will be seen that the Colonel is hardly sufficiently endowed with the critical faculty to say the last word on Peterborough's Life or Carleton's Memoirs. Of his general knowledge two specimens will be enough. He thinks that England retained possession of Minorca till she had acquired Malta. The second is from the history of his own profession. He says that Galway introduced a novelty by mixing infantry with cavalry on his wings at Almanza. It had been the habitual practice of Gustavus Adolphus, and was done by the Marquis of Pescara at Pavia, who again learned the trick from his master Gonsalvo de Córdova. 'Tis indeed delightful to find mistakes of this kind in a book professing to be based on original MSS. and to contain much which had never been published. Nothing so distinctly marks the State Paper historian as his ignorance of what is in print.

MATHEMATICAL BOOKS.

NOW that the delegates of the Clarendon Press begin to issue elementary mathematical works, we may hope for some useful books in that department. A Text-Book of Algebra, by W. Steadman Aldis, of University College, New Zealand, is a well-written and comprehensive treatise, much less ambitious in its aim and scope than Professor Crystal's Algebra, which we noticed some time ago, but more suitable perhaps for some instructors and instructed. On points of theory, such as that extension of the meaning of symbols which raises algebra from the prosaic level of arithmetic, Mr. Aldis writes clearly and convincingly. Even in his second chapter (there are thirty in all) he introduces and fully illustrates that notion of transference or motion which is the basis of the science of "Quaternions," though carefully avoiding the use of so hard a word. We note his use of the term "scalar," also, and think it should in many applications supersede the awkward distinction of lengths as rational and irrational, or "incommensurable." Is the diagonal of a square not as rational as the side of it? The numbers representing both lines are scalar quantities. In this connexion we note that "surds" and "impossible quantities" are instructively treated, the latter under the much more presentable name of "operational quantities" or non-scalars, a term which at once recommends itself to the reader who is really desirous of interpreting. The treatment of factors now admits of interesting developments corresponding to the extension of meaning given to certain symbols. As a further application we find in Chapter XV. a short and simple solution of the general cubic equation. There are other interesting and suggestive passages—e.g. the chapters on the theory of numbers and probabilities, the generalization of the binomial expansion, and an excellent introduction of beginners to determinants, which Mr. Aldis utilizes for the solution of simultaneous equations.

Mr. Roberts's Treatise on the Integral Calculus (Dublin: Hodges & Co.) seems mainly characterized by its treatment of the functions which Legendre called elliptic. The opening chapters, it is true, set forth clearly the different methods of integration, with abundance of examples and exercises; but why is it that in introducing such a subject in elementary books our authors all begin from the modern standpoint? In dealing with any abstruse subject we believe the historic mode to be the best for inducing the student to think for himself; since the successive stages of development of the science naturally arouse his sympathy. In this special case there is no branch of mathematical learning more full of interest than that of integration, from the great names associated with the problem of summing up an infinite series of infinitely small quantities. A mere sketch of the subject as connected with the ancient Greek Geometers, with Galileo, Descartes, Gregory, Leibnitz, and Newton, as well as with Euler, Lagrange, and other famous names, must surely be full of human interest if duly set forth. We note in Mr. Roberts's work some skilful applications of the calculus to plane curves, and notices of the leading theorems relating to areas and rectification. The numerous [illegible] for practice are sufficient to make this a capital [illegible]

In an Elementary Treatise on [illegible] (Macmillan & Co.), by Professor Macgregor, of [illegible] Halifax, Canada, we have [illegible]

abstract Dynamics, the first half discussing the mathematical treatment of motion, or what is sometimes termed Kinematics, and the rest occupied with Dynamics, or that branch of physical science which investigates and explains the action of force. It seems somewhat forced, to some readers, to postpone Statics, with all its gear of levers and screws, tension and friction, moments and reactions, till long after the study of velocity and acceleration, the pendulum and harmonic motion. Such, however, is the new method, and our author defends it, "not only because it is more logical, but also because it has been found to be the better from an educational point of view." We doubt not that Professor Macgregor will own Professor Tait as his magnus Apollo. In another particular he agrees closely with the Edinburgh professor—namely, an intense antipathy to the term centrifugal force—and shows in a long note that the use of it has led to great confusion. We suspect, however, that the phrase will hold the field, all special pleading notwithstanding. Professor Macgregor has modified the definitions of velocity, acceleration, &c., "on account [he tells us] of the adoption of the distinction between velocity and speed." Under Kinematics there is some well-written matter under the heads "Rotation," "Motion of Rigid Systems," and "Strains." Under Dynamics we might also mention the chapters headed "Dynamics of a Particle," "Dynamics of Rigid Bodies," and "Elastic Solids and Fluids."

One of the "Students' Aids Series" (Baillière, Tindall, & Cox) is Mr. Heppel's Conic Sections, with Solutions of Questions &c. It is evidently written by one skilled in mathematical work; and, in fact, some of the demonstrations are too compressed or concise for beginners. The arrangement is good, with some excellent specimens of solution of questions, and the book should prove useful to B.A. candidates of the London University, for whom it is principally intended. In Chapter III., where the curves are treated as sections of an actual cone, his proofs are perhaps too algebraic; in any case, why is the parabola neglected in the first section of that chapter, and again (unless by implication) in section 47? In the appendix there is a chapter which many students will appreciate, as it consists of solutions of all the London B.A. papers from 1882 to 1886. Mr. Heppel occupies six pages with hints to students, some of which seem valuable—for example, that relating to the actual tracing of conics. Correct drawing of the higher curves is often left to hazard, and beginners thus deprived of an important aid to the study.

Mr. Bourne's Solutions to Problems in Plane Coördinate Geometry (Macmillan & Co.) will prove useful, we imagine, to many teachers and self-instructors. We have carefully examined the problems relating to the ellipse, parabola, and hyperbola, and can pronounce them, as a whole, models both for brevity and clearness. Mr. Bourne has taken such pleasure in his work of solving more than half a thousand problems, which is our estimate of the number in the original work, that in many instances he gives two independent solutions, and thus illustrates different modes of attacking the difficulty, as all skilled masters do. Rarely, indeed, can one find an opportunity of suggesting any change in his treatment of a problem. In Chapter X., Problem 24, however, the ellipse might have been referred to a different pair of conjugate axes—namely, where one passes through the point of contact—and a shorter solution obtained. In 25 also the work is simplified by making use of the eccentric angle; and 26 by using a simple result of the theory of equations—one of those indicated in Mr. Bourne's introduction to his work. A good aliter to his proof (7 of Chapter XI.) that an ellipse and hyperbola, when confocal, cut each other at right angles, would be its deduction, without construction, from the general theorem that a tangent to a conic is equally inclined to the focal radii. Positively the only fault we can detect in Mr. Bourne's book is that his introduction seems quite unnecessary, though so short.

First Steps in Geometry (Longmans & Co.) is written by Mr. Proctor to assist students in finding solutions of problems; but we doubt its utility in that direction. It seems too unsystematic for the practical ends of teaching, being mainly a sort of popular sketch of what is done in studying geometry and the various ways of doing it—such as the devices that the student gradually becomes familiar with in every regular course. Some of the notes and criticisms on Euclid may prove suggestive to beginners, though much of the matter written in the second book will naturally occur to them at a second or third reading of the text. With some clever remarks here and there we find much that is slipshod, if not trivial, which may be explained by the fact mentioned in the preface, that the book consists of papers written for the magazine called Knowledge. Another work of Mr. Proctor's which we have received had the same origin—Easy Lessons in the Differential Calculus (Longmans & Co.) It is one of the many attempts to define differential coefficient in a semi-popular way, and, like most of them, serves to show how a man's performances often come far short of his promises and sometimes of his intentions. Thus, Lesson III. is headed "Illustrations of the Use of the Calculus," and when we turn to see how Mr. Proctor applies this great engine, we find only two little problems, neither of which requires anything of the sort. The first is a question about a straight line. In this there is nothing wanted beyond the fifth proposition of Euclid's Book II. to do easily in two lines, or three, what Mr. Proctor occupies a printed page with. Need one have a telescope fetched, tripod and all, to look at the clock on a chimney-piece? The second problem, or "Illustration," is [illegible] simple and equally undeserving of having so great an [illegible] in fact, it is easily shown to depend on the same proposition of Euclid when a rectangle is interpreted algebraically, and can thus be done more quickly than by Mr. Proctor's mode. We think the geometrical illustrations of Chapter XII. should have come much sooner if the beginner is meant to acquire any clear notion of the subject under one important aspect at least. In the table of contents we were astonished to find the heading "Elliptic Integrals"; but on looking up the chapter found not a word about them, as ordinarily understood, but only a proposition about finding the area of an ellipse by integration. Must we conclude that the author did not know what the phrase meant, especially since he says in his preface, with reference to the present elementary work, "At Cambridge I took up for my degree rather less of the Differential Calculus than is presented here"?

The Arithmetic for Children, by A. E. A. Mair (Swan Sonnenschein & Co.), appears to be due to some enthusiasm, combined with inexperience. The instructions to teachers are so multiplied, and in some cases almost hysterical, that the child's progress seems practically forgotten. One command, in bold type, is to "teach thoroughly the component parts of every figure up to 10"; and, again, we find on p. 17 that "the two halves of the figure to be added" must be perfectly known by the child undergoing this Procrustean process. To increase the mystery of those "figures," we are told that the above is "taught entirely by word of mouth," and the multiplication table will occupy about eight weeks in learning. If such knowledge is a fine thing, well do we find on the title-page the motto Ardua quæ pulchra put by the publishers—perhaps a translation of the ancient line ἐν μυρίοισι τὰ καλὰ γίγνεται πόνοις.

Mr. Layng's edition of Euclid, Book II., with Notes, Examples, and Exercises (Blackie & Son), is carefully and skilfully prepared, and so arrranged that each proposition opens a fresh page. The demonstrations are neatly and concisely put, with a line for each step of the argument, and we detect no violence done to the text. There are, however, spots on the sun; and we may ask the author why, after forbidding the use of algebraic symbols to students, he is tempted to use plus and minus. Personally we find the former of these indispensable in all geometric work, but rather object to the latter. From its excellent arrangement and the beauty of the type and diagrams we should think that Mr. Layng's Euclid when completed will become a favourite with many teachers.

Mr. Hamblin Smith's Elementary Hydrostatics (Rivingtons) seems a successful attempt to explain the mathematical theory of the science more clearly than has been done in the previous elementary works, besides giving some of the more obvious applications. The book is well adapted for teaching purposes, with abundance of suitable examples and exercises and carefully drawn diagrams. In discussing the few principles on which the science of the equilibrium of fluids is based, we find it strange not to be told of "Pascal's Law," which some writers termed quaquaversus, and "Boyle or Mariotte's Law." A serious omission under the properties of air is that of the application of the barometer to find the height of a place; the exact determination should be indicated with derivation of the formulæ used, and some actual results. We also note an omission under the head of specific gravity, and another under thermometer, where an equation should be given to show in one statement the relation between the three or four scales at present in use. Some purists in scientific terminology would condemn Mr. Smith's retention of the word suction, when discussing pumps, but it is no doubt convenient, if not accurate, like the term centrifugal force, and must long be retained technically.

Mr. Brabant's Elements of Plane and Solid Mensuration (Rivingtons) seems designed to improve on the treatment which this important subject has hitherto received. He employs geometry and trigonometry as well as arithmetic, and can thus construct a more comprehensive system of rules and formulæ. We observe some omissions, such as the mode of applying logarithms, since they are necessary in many of the problems set, and further practical details of measuring heights and fields. When it is remarked that the surface of a sphere is two-thirds that of the circumscribing cylinder, it should be first noted that it is equal to the curved surface of the cylinder; further, that the volume of the sphere is also two-thirds that of the cylinder; and, lastly, that a cone, sphere, and cylinder of the same height and base have their volumes as the numbers 1, 2, 3. The book evinces good, accurate workmanship throughout, and is illustrated with neatly-drawn woodcuts.

Mr. Crowther's Elementary Text-Book of Projectional Solid Geometry (John Heywood) consists mainly of about a hundred problems and examples, with neat and accurate diagrams, in simple projection and its application to lines, angles, plane figures, and solids. It has a thoroughly practical tone, every paragraph being terse and to the point, and therefore strangely contrasts with the language and sentiment of the preface, which tells us that the "domain of Solid Geometry demands the application of a faculty"—namely, "the imagination or power of mental picturing, and the value of the study arises exclusively from the exaltation of this attribute." Now the work is intended, among others, for artisans and mechanical draughtsmen, as we are told on the title-page; and what, then, becomes of the "exaltation of the attribute"? The latter half of the book is a separate treatise on Plane Geometry and Graphic Arithmetic, and seems also well adapted for instruction in the use of rulers, compasses, and protractors, and in the construction of angles of every size, figures of every shape, and plane scales of every dimension or degree.

FRENCH LITERATURE.

FRANCE has few more indefatigable rummagers of libraries and communicators to the public of the unpublished than M. Charles Henry (1, 2), and it must be said to his credit that he does this work in the best possible way. He is none of your book-makers who see in half a dozen unpublished letters the "bones" of a bulky volume spun out with infinite matter that is very much published indeed. He gives his discoveries by themselves, or with now and then a modest introduction, and despatches them for the use of whomsoever it may concern. His two volumes (one extracted from the Transactions of a learned Society, and containing chiefly mathematical matter, the other more miscellaneous) of as yet uncollected works of D'Alembert are not exactly light or engaging reading; but, then, D'Alembert, though he was the son of one great wit and beauty and the, as it were, left-handed or Platonic husband of another great wit, who, if not a beauty, was passionate enough for half a dozen beauties, was not exactly a light or engaging person. He was, however, given to the production of "extremely valooable thoughts" in the moderate philosophe manner on all sorts of subjects, and there are plenty of such here. The volumes, it need hardly be said, add, if anything could add, to one's amusement at that astonishing dream which Diderot, his fantastic friend, chose to father on him.

M. Jules Adeline, who is a practised artist and a worthy man of letters, has produced a very interesting and handsome volume on Water-Colour Drawing (3). It is a purely practical and technical treatise, and, as such, does not lend itself to detailed review in this particular place; but we may at least safely give it the praise of careful detail and of exceptionally excellent getting up.

M. Xavier Marmier's manner of dealing with folk-lore, travels, popular history, and other miscellaneous literary work is well known, and his Contes populaires (4) are a good example of it. He does not seem to have given himself any trouble to secure any extraordinary accuracy, in the folklore sense, for his versions or attributions of stories to different nations, and his mode of telling them has neither the quaint, authentic manner of Grimm, nor the elaborate literary form of Musäus, nor the inimitable grace of Perrault; but it is a good manner and worthy of an Academician.

The comparatively recent period at which foreign travel has become an at all usual thing with Frenchmen still shows itself in the books of their globe-trotters. We are not, heavens knows! free ourselves from the traveller who gravely prints as the result of his private discoveries accounts of the way in which the beds of a sleeping car are made up, of the different shape of an American and an English locomotive, and of the exact distances from Wimbledon to Wombledon. But it is not done with quite that air of a Columbus or a Magellan which comes naturally to a Frenchman. M. de Biancour (5) is by no means a bad specimen of his class, though he is too fond of typographical means, such as italics and capitals, for expressing his sentiments. He is very anxious that more Frenchmen should go into North-American business, especially mines. They have, indeed, gone further (to Panama), and will perhaps fare worse; but still the pleasing name of "Emma," softly resounding in the memory, may perhaps make cautious Gauls hesitate before following M. de Biancour's advice.

We have before us two books of the philosophico-scientific kind—a treatise on the Will (6), which of course begins with Schopenhauer, and which, to tell the truth, does not seem to us to advance any further a question which the greatest thinkers of the world have not advanced one inch; and a translation of Herr Piderit's book on Facial Expression (7). In turning over the latter we have been once more struck with the difficulty of getting together a sufficient body of acknowledged data on which to argue. For, in the first place, different persons express the actual emotions in a very different way; and, in the second, the emotion expressed by this or that arrangement of an actual, still more of a pictured, countenance by no means always seems the same to different observers.

M. Gabriel Ferry (8) has made a sufficiently interesting book, and by no means a scandalous one, about Balzac's friendships (of both kinds) with women:—his sister, his wife, Mme. de Berny, Mme. de Castries, Mme. de Girardin, and not a few others. A good deal of it is, and must necessarily be, gossip or founded on gossip; but more is known about Balzac than about many men of letters, and there is no reason to doubt that, as M. Ferry thinks, he reproduced his friendships and his loves freely in his novels.

Mme. de La Rochejaquelein's, or rather Mme. de Lescure's, charming account of the Vendean War (9) is well known, and Mr. Scudamore has done well in preparing it as a reading-book. But he should not have fallen in with the practice of loading his notes with etymology. What earthly business has the information that "genêt" comes from "genista" in a note on Mme. de La Rochejaquelein?

NEW BOOKS AND REPRINTS.

THE two volumes of The Memoirs of Prince Adam Czartoryski (London: Remington) are very well worth reading. The writer's father, Prince Adam Casimir of that ilk, was one of the most distinguished men of his time—he lived for some time in the house of Lord Mansfield; he was the correspondent of Joseph II., and the protégé (in some sort) of Frederick the Great; he commanded the Lithuanian Guard, and as the chief officer of the Corps of Cadets he had the honour of directing the beginnings of many famous men, among whom was Kosciuszko; he would, it is said, have been King of Poland had not the Empress Catherine, for reasons of her own, supported the candidature of his handsome cousin, Poniatowski. He married the Countess Fleming, "daughter of the celebrated Minister of Augustus II.," and their eldest son was Prince Adam George, whose Memoirs—published last year in French, with an introduction, &c., by M. de Mazade—are here presented to the English public, with notes and additions by M. Adam Gielgud, and a selection from the writer's correspondence and notes of conversation with Alexander I., Pitt, Fox, Brougham, Palmerston, Talleyrand, Bentham, and others of not less repute. He was born in 1770; in 1789 he visited London and Paris; in 1751 he went to St. Petersburg, where he resided during the last years of Catherine (of whose goings on with Zuboff he tells some quaint stories), all the reign of Paul, and a great part of that of Alexander I., whose Foreign Secretary he was, and with whom he went the Austerlitz campaign; he was for twenty years the Curator of Wilna University; in 1830, when the Grand Duke Constantine was driven out of Poland, he was elected President of the National Government; he fought in the ranks during the unhappy campaign of 1831; for many years he laboured in his country's cause in all the Courts of Europe; at eighty-three he is found advising Napoleon III. as to the conduct of the Crimean War; when he died, in 1861, at Montfermeil, he wanted but nine years of his century, yet was his mind as active, his patriotism as ardent, his hope as inextinguishable as ever. He was not a great writer, but his lot was cast in strange and troubled surroundings, his experiences were many and varied, and he may be read with interest always, and often with instruction.

Mr. Barrie's Auld Licht Idylls (London: Hodder & Stoughton) has been read "by inchmeal" in the St. James's Gazette, and dedicated, as so many similar things have been, to the editor under whose guidance it appeared. It is good enough reading; at all events, it is good enough reading to those who have some acquaintance with Scotland, and any liking for and interest in the Scots character. To the general, it may be, Mr. Barrie's sketch of Thrums—the stern and "awfu' dour-like kind o'" village in which the scene of his Idylls is laid—will prove a trifle disappointing. The saying that it takes a surgical operation to get a joke into a Scotchman is not more true than that other to the effect that all the surgical operations in the art are insufficient to enable an Englishman to appreciate a certain sort of Scots humour. Englishmen of this type may as well leave Auld Licht Idylls alone; they will get nothing out of it but disappointment and a tendency to yawn. To such as are better provided the book may be commended with a certain warmth. They will find it, not merely readable, but amusing and suggestive in no mean degree.

For those whose delight is in tales of sport and adventure there is good entertainment, of a kind, in Mr. Crawford's Reminiscences of Foreign Travel (London: Longmans). Mr. Crawford, well and favourably known as the author of Across the Pampas and the Andes, writes neatly, thinks clearly, is not afflicted with that excess of vain-gloriousness which has ruined so many travellers in the eyes of posterity, and has really a great deal to say of a great number of "foreign parts." To analyse his work—which is a kind of scrapbook, an omnium gatherum of anecdote and experience—is neither necessary nor desirable. "Sardinia," "To Egypt in a Hurry," "The Lake of the Thousand Islands," "Mustafa," "At Sea," "Intelligence of Animals," "Opposition to Railways," "Beasts and Birds of Algeria"—such are the titles of some of his chapters. To say that there are twenty-eight of them, and that, so far as we have seen, there is not one but is worth reading, is to say enough.

"An electric impulse actuated Mah Shway in the course she should pursue; and, as quick as thought, she placed her arms around his neck, and, overcome with the emotions that were swaying her heart, confidingly rested her head on his shoulder." This pleasing picture occurs on the last page but one of A Burmese Maid: a Tale of Pathos and Incident (London: Trübner), by the author of Reginald Vernon, a work with which we do profess ourselves completely unacquainted. Mah Shway has long loved the beautiful, the brave, the Anglo-Saxon Dick [illegible]; they are parted by fate and an early Burmese War, and the [illegible] of the aforesaid "electric impulse" is, like [illegible] and a brother, the unbought and undefeated [illegible]. There is all the "pathos" and most of the [illegible]. Of The Poisoned Chalice [illegible] the author is Mr. W. Pryce [illegible], B.A., and that the only point about it which will interest the discerning reader is the question whether it is more offensive or more silly. The Found yet Lost (London: Ward, Lock, & Co.) of Mr. E. P. Roe—described somewhere about the volume as the "Most Popular of Living American Novelists"—sells at a shilling, as American novels go, it is well worth the money. Mr. Marion Crawford's Marzio's Crucifix (London: Macmillan) appears in a new edition. Mrs. Riddell, in Idle Tales (London: Ward & Downey), is not the Mrs. Riddell of George Geith and those other admirable stories of the City which we know, but she is good enough for all that, and may be read with pleasure for what she has still to give, as well as for auld lang syne.

The Henry Irving Dream of Eugene Aram, by F. D. Niblett (London: Leadenhall Press), is printed in red ink on black paper, and illustrated in the same harmony with sketches intended for Mr. Irving in "comic" positions. No further description can possibly be required.

We have also to acknowledge the receipt of a new edition of Mr. Morley's Burke (London: Macmillan) in the "English Men of Letters" series, a new edition of Thomson's The City of Dreadful Night, and other Poems (London: Reeves & Turner), among them some translations from Heine, which are scarce less depressing than the principal work, a new edition of Rokeby (London: Rivingtons), with an introduction, notes, and a glossary by Mr. R. W. Taylor, editor—for this same series of "English School Classics"—of The Lady of the Lake, of Money and Common Sense (London: Wyman), a pamphlet of ambitious intent, by "Ant. Ct. Cutkoff", of Mr. Baker's Everyday Dictionary (London: Griffith), which contains 35,000 words, and sells at two shillings, of a Handbook of the Royal Naval and Military Bazaar, 1888 (London: Woolmer), to be held some weeks hence in the Hotel Metropole, of the Complete Press Directory (London: Shelley) for the current year—an excellent piece of work, and of Sell's tremendous Dictionary of the World's Press (London: Sell), revised and brought down to date.

Miss Maxwell Scott writes to inform us that the Abbotsford Catalogue, noticed in the Saturday Review of April 7, can be obtained of Mr. Flynn, Abbotsford, at the price of one shilling.

"THE VICTORIES OF LOVE,"

By COVENTRY PATMORE,

Being Part 2 of "THE ANGEL in the HOUSE," forms Vol. 122 of

CASSELL'S NATIONAL LIBRARY,

Price 3d. (or in cloth, 6d.) By the Author's kind permission this popular copyright work is now placed within general reach, and the volume will, it is believed, meet with a welcome similar to that which attended the issue of the First Part of "THE ANGEL in the HOUSE," which appeared as Vol. 70 of the NATIONAL LIBRARY, and passed through Four Large Editions within a few weeks of its publication.

Professor RUSKIN says:—"You cannot read him (COVENTRY PATMORE) too often or too carefully; as far as I know, he is the only living poet who always strengthens and purifies."

CARLYLE wrote:—"Full of delicacy, truth, and graceful simplicity; high, ingenious, fine, pure, and wholesome as these breezes now blowing around me from the eternal sea. Few books are written with such conscientious fidelity nowadays, or indeed at any day."

A List of the 122 Vols. now ready of Cassell's National Library will be sent post free on application to

The LIFE of BENVENUTO CELLINI.

Newly Translated into English. By JOHN ADDINGTON SYMONDS.

PUBLISHER'S NOTE.—The high appreciation which Mr. Symonds's new and scholarly translation of the Life of Benvenuto Cellini met with, both from critics and the general public, has induced the publisher to issue a Second Edition in two volumes, crown 8vo, but without the etchings and embellishments contained in the first, more expensive, and limited edition.

THE TIMES.—"Mr. Symonds has gone upon the sound principle that suppressions in such a book are out of place, and, after all, though the autobiography is not meat for babes, there is little in it that need shock or scandalize maturity."

SATURDAY REVIEW.—"Mr Symonds has made good use of his many qualifications for the task, and this latest work of his will take rank among the best translations that have ever been made into English."

ATHENÆUM.—"As a piece of workmanship, Mr Symonds's translation deserves to rank amongst the best translations in the English language."

The WORKS of SIR GEORGE ETHEREDGE.

Plays and Poems Edited, with Critical Notes and Introduction, by A. WILSON VERITY, B.A., Scholar of Trinity College, Cambridge.

Only 500 copies will be printed for England and America, each of which will be numbered as issued.

NOTE.—In announcing a new and complete edition of the works of this eminent man of letters of the seventeenth century, the following remarks may be offered. Etheredge is a very important writer, and is recognized by all competent critics as the forerunner of Wycherley, Congreve, and Sheridan—in the founder, in fact, of the English prose school of comedy. Such a writer ought to be accessible, and that his works have not been reprinted during the century appears to be an anomaly.

BY AUTHOR OF "HANDLEY CROSS" &c.

Demy 8vo. 520 pp., 12 Full page Illustrations by Wildrake, Heath, Jellicoe, printed on Whatman paper and coloured by hand, 14s.

HILLINGDON HALL; or, the Cockney Squire.

A Tale of Country Life. By R. S. SURTEES, Author of "Handley Cross," "Jorrocks's Jaunts and Jollities," &c.

NOTE.—This, one of the best of Mr Surtees's works, was originally commenced in the "New Sporting Magazine" and illustrated by the inimitable artists Wildrake and Heath, but was not completed in that magazine. It was afterwards published complete in a three volume edition. The five illustrations now added are by John Jellicoe, and illustrate the latter portion of the work not done by Wildrake or Heath.

A Novel.

By PAUL CUSHING,

Author of "Misogyny and the Maiden," "A Woman with a Secret," "Doctor Cæsar Crowl, Mind Curer," &c.

3 vols crown 8vo. 25s 6d.

The merit of Mr Cushing's book, however, does not rest principally upon its plot, although this is developed with a skill which never lets the interest flag. It arises chiefly from the characterisation of the different personages in the tale and from the stimulating force and energy of a few remarkable episodes. ... Is a powerful and interesting novel which should increase the reputation of its talented author.—Scotsman

THE HEIR of the AGES. By JAMES PAYN,

MRS. HUMPHRY WARD'S NEW NOVEL.

NOTICE.—The THIRD EDITION of "ROBERT ELSMERE," 3 vols., by Mrs. HUMPHRY WARD, is now ready at all the Libraries.

From the ATHENÆUM.—"In 'Robert Elsmere' the burning questions between old-fashioned faith and the new Christianity are worked out in the lives of the characters with a fulness of knowledge, a breadth of appreciation, and a critical talent which show a rare combination of gifts of a very high order."

From the SPECTATOR.—"This is a very remarkable book.... ...Profoundly as we differ from Mrs Humphry Ward's criticism of Christianity, we recognise in her book one of the most striking pictures of a sincere religious ideal that has ever been presented to our generation under the disguise of a modern novel."

AND

EDITHA'S BURGLAR.

By FRANCES HODGSON BURNETT.

Illustrated by R. B. BIRCH.

Small medium 8vo. cloth gilt, price 5s.

As a beautiful story, filled with an exquisite pathos and sweetness, "Sara Crewe" will take rank with the Author's "Little Lord Fauntleroy." As the latter story had a boy for its hero, so this has a girl for its heroine—a weird, queer little creature, whose elfish cleverness and odd ways are made of striking interest by the exquisite art with which the author has woven them into the texture of the story. The trustfulness and generous kindness of the little waif are very winning, and her natural warmth and tenderness of heart will make every reader her friend. Mr. Birch's illustrations admirably reflect the spirit of author and story.

"Editha's Burglar" may be considered one of Mrs. Burnett's most charming stories. Although not previously issued in book form, it has met with the warmest approval from the public. Mr. Birch's illustrations, done specially for this issue in book form, will add to the charm of the work.

TWELVE ENGLISH STATESMEN.

WILLIAM the CONQUEROR. By EDWARD A. FREEMAN, D.C.L., LL.D., Regius Professor of Modern History in the University of Oxford. Crown 8vo. 2s. 6d.

The Saturday Review says:—"A little book of which the learning and solidity are beyond dispute. ... Mr. Freeman has given in this volume a vigorous sketch, which is more than a summary of what he has said before. He has given an admirable account of William's training, William's character, and William's work—an account which could not be amended within its own limits."

The St. James's Gazette says:—"It is fitting enough that the first volume of a series dealing with 'English Statesmen' should be devoted to William the Great. For on the one hand, the English polity can never be rightly studied without a firm grasp of the Conquest and its results; and on the other there is perhaps no life which strikes so sharply the key-note which prepares us for the influence exercised on the development of that polity by a handful of individual men."

THE QUEEN'S VISIT TO BERLIN.

THE partial recovery of the Emperor FREDERICK seems to have had at least one good effect—that of reducing to a little more sense and decency the partly angry and partly alarmed gabble of which there was so much a week ago. It is true, of course, that it is a little difficult for Englishmen with good memories to condemn very virtuously the recent outbreak of German patriotism of the baser and less intelligent kind at the expense of our own countrymen and countrywomen. We seem to remember periods of English history, neither few nor far between, nor in some cases very far off, in which persons and things "German" were discussed with quite as edifying a liberality and as transparent a justice as now mark the utterances of the Cologne Gazette. And we have at the present moment among ourselves some conspicuous instances of those who, despite all advantages of birth, education, and fortune, appear to think that the height of political wit and wisdom is reached as PRAED writes in one of those pleasant political poems which have at last been adequately published. This being so, it behoves Englishmen not to be too virtuous in their condemnation of the certainly deplorable outbreaks of bad taste, bad feeling, and, considering all things, bad citizenship as well, which have occurred in Germany of late. It is, however, permissible to note with satisfaction that the actual arrival of HER MAJESTY at Berlin seems to have been received entirely as it should have been received, and that the attempt to twist into a semi-political intrigue an act of the most natural family affection is at last discouraged by all the respectable organs of public opinion in the German capital.

When people write the K— a fool,
And call the Q— a frow,

The cause already mentioned, the improvement in the health of the EMPEROR, does not, however, and cannot, affect to any great extent the operation of those general influences which are making for war or peace in Europe. One of the most important of these is undoubtedly the agrarian disturbance which is taking place in Roumania, and it is certainly not a mere natural disposition to cry "Wolf" which is disposed to see in this the hand of the usual disturber of peace in the Eastern part of the Continent. There can be little dispute among competent politicians as to the quarter to which not merely the famous Cassian argument but others as strong point in this instance. In the first place, Roumania is a serious obstacle to Russian operations and designs in the Balkan Peninsula so long as she continues either well disposed to Austria or even strictly independent. The Russians have not forgotten what the Roumanian army did for them ten years ago, and may naturally wish to have it not only with them, but with them on easier terms, and in less degrading circumstances. The famous enfranchisement of the Russian serfs, once so greatly lauded, represented now by many well-informed persons as an exceedingly dubious benefit to the country, is exactly the thing to hold up to the Roumanian cottiers and farm-labourers in their revolt against absentee landlords, tyrannical stewards, and niggardly farmers. It is not quite without bearing on the matter that part of the distress is apparently due, and that more can be represented as being due, to the act of the Austro-Hungarian Government in closing the markets of Hungary and Transylvania to Roumanian cattle. And last, but by no means least, Roumania has for some time enjoyed the presence in some authority of one of the most notorious and unscrupulous of Russian agents, who has had at his disposal in the Bulgarian and other refugees sub-agents less notorious, but more unscrupulous still. It is not necessary to think that the CZAR has personally filled Roumania with large blue flies; but it is certainly not over suspicious to suspect that Russia may not have been unwilling to profit by the rise of the quartern loaf and the peasantry.

For the present, however, these disturbances appear to have been checked by the vigorous action of the Roumanian Government; and, in any case, they must have been rather a remote and indirect than a direct and immediate occasion for the breach of European peace. The old difficulty or squabble about the concentration of troops on the Galician frontier seems to be more obstinate; and the latest Russian allegation is that the Austrian mobilizations (which, be it remembered, were the result of previous Russian movements) make it absolutely necessary to bring up more Russian troops. This game may, of course, go on indefinitely; and the result will shortly be, if it has not been reached already, that two complete armies will stand face to face on a frontier which is, to no small extent, an artificial one. This state of things is never conducive to peace and quietness. It will, however, be a good thing if, as must almost certainly happen, the scare of the last two months leads the Austrian Government to keep its Eastern frontiers in a somewhat better state of preparation than, by the testimony of most military authorities, they have been in since the Triple Alliance lulled Austria into that state of rather idle security which for centuries has been the bane of Viennese statesmen. It has now been demonstrated pretty clearly that an ill-garrisoned and ill-fortified Galicia is one of the most fertile sources of anxiety, not merely to Austria, but to Europe, and the good relations which fortunately exist, and which with good management need not soon be disturbed, between Austria and her only formidable neighbour in the West and South-west should enable her, without undue exertion or expense, to keep a good look-out and a full powder-magazine in the East and North-east. For there is, unfortunately, little or no chance that the present state of suspense can be put an end to by anything but war, or by a possible, but quite incalculable, combination of personal and national accidents.

Meanwhile the QUEEN has had more than enough of the purely domestic kind to occupy her at Berlin, and the sympathy of all Englishmen must be with her. Few persons know better, none can represent with more authority, if politics must be brought in, the mutual ties of a quite other than personal nature which bind, or ought to bind, Germany to England. And if—which is an "if" not necessary to determine in one sense or the other—the much talked of interview with Prince BISMARCK had any political purpose, HER MAJESTY could have been at no loss for weighty observations. Prince BISMARCK has not a certain English statesman's foible of infallibility, and he knows very well whether or no his assumption ten years ago of the famous "Fourth Plenipotentiaryship" to Russsia was a really profitable speculation for his country. For many years nothing but the sudden and rather intempestive German haste to be colonially rich has occurred to cause dissension between the two countries, and it is sometimes forgotten that, if Germany obtained some of her colonies at England's expense, her naval power is anything but large for their safe maintenance without England's aid. The French navy may or may not be that match for our own which gallant officers of the COURBET type believe or hope it to be; but it is quite certain that it ought to need no foreign assistance to be strong enough, if the fancy so took France during a war, to remove the German flag from every seaport in Atlantic and Pacific waters where Prince BISMARCK has established it. During the last war Germany was only vulnerable by sea at home, and the Baltic coasts are not hospitable to invaders. She has now given other hostages to fortune. This is only one consideration which shows how important English good will still is to Germany. It is not mere coquettings with Russia that will lose that good will, so long, at least, as the coquettings do not become too compromising or pass into positive "helping the "Bear." And, this being so, it seems to be unnecessary to cumber ourselves about the bogies which were conjured up last week, or with gossip about marriages and givings in marriage, or with anything but the plain facts of the case. Those facts may really be reduced to two—on the one side, a well known and not in the least mysterious domestic trouble; on the other, the certainty that England is strong enough, if she chooses, to meet all dangers; and that, if she does not cultivate her own strength and look after her own interests, no one will look after her interests for her or supply the needs of her weakness.

THE SERVICES.

THE speech which Lord WOLSELEY made at the dinner given to Sir JOHN PENDER was hardly so considerable an event as some of his friends in the press, where he has many (for those whom the General would chasten love him), seem inclined to think. Its importance was revealed to them at a rather late date, and it is funny to compare the painfully brief report given the day after the dinner with the full text and comments of the day after that. Neither are the occasion and the form of the manifesto above criticism. Since Lord WOLSELEY desired to give his countrymen a solemn warning, we could wish that he had done it from his place in the House of Lords rather than after a complimentary dinner of no great importance. The great speech by which General ROBERTS profoundly influenced the administration of our army was, indeed, delivered after dinner; but, then, it was a military one, and the distinguished Indian officer had no other platform from which to speak. Then the speech itself compares unfavourably (and that we make the comparison is to Lord WOLSELEY's honour) with the Duke of WELLINGTON's famous letter to Sir JOHN BURGOYNE. His attack on "government "by party—that curse of modern England which is sapping "and undermining the foundations of our country, which is "depriving our statesmen of the manly honesty which was "once their characteristic," does to our taste a little smack of the style of another brave general over the water whom we value in his proper place, but not here. Leaving the form aside, this onslaught on party government is still a little out of place. England has been so governed for two hundred years of almost continuous expansion and triumph. If it is not so manfully governed now the fault probably lies with the men. Moreover, it is really time we gave up believing that good administration can be secured by machinery. Armies have been allowed to become weak and inefficient by military despotisms as well as by parties. Lord WOLSELEY must have seen that in 1854 and 1870. It was not a change of system, but a change of men, which brought the Prussian army up from its condition before the "humiliation of Olmütz" to its state in 1866.

It is, however, not much to the purpose to argue over the nature of government with Lord WOLSELEY, and particularly once he has done well in the spirit, whatever his mistakes have been in the letter. His speech is a warning —a necessary warning—and one which will be listened to. He has plainly said—and, we imagine, has taken some pains it should be known he has said—that the fighting forces of the country are below the level of necessary strength. This is the substance of his speech, and it deserves every attention. Since it is Lord WOLSELEY's conviction, he is thoroughly justified in holding that "it behoves public "men to speak the truth, and not only the truth, but "the whole truth." What they would tell us we can in a general way make out. There is no belief anywhere that either of the services is in a really satisfactory state. We have Lord GEORGE HAMILTON's own word for it that several of our battle ships are still waiting for their guns—which are being made in little batches very slowly and tentatively. This is, almost by the Admiralty's confession, a type of much else. Cruisers are found on trial to be inferior in coal-carrying capacity, in armour, and in speed to what they ought to be. It is extremely doubtful whether there are enough of them with all their faults. It is a notorious fact that Sir JAMES STEPHEN's Commission discovered that the stores of ammunition had been allowed to be drawn to the very dregs. This, of course, means shameless mismanagement in any case, and something practically as bad as treason if the St. James's Gazette is right in asserting that the powder needed for heavy ordnance is not made in the country and must be imported from abroad. The belief of military men as to the condition of the army may be taken to be very fairly represented by the Duke of CAMBRIDGE. In the course of his evidence before the Select Committee of the House of Commons on the Army Estimates the Commander-in-Chief, though obviously speaking with studied moderation, gave what practically amounted to evidence that the army is eleven thousand below its proper strength, even for the current work of peace time. This is at the very lowest figure, for, as he expressed it, "all depends on what the cir- "cumstances of the world are," and "you might require a "very much larger increase." In other words, the army cannot get along without eleven thousand more men in peace, and in war—for which it is theoretically being prepared—would unquestionably need further strengthening, over and above the Reserves. The reinforcement is not to be given. Only 1,900 (why not 1,899½?) men are to be asked for from Parliament, and the rest are to be smuggled through whenever they can be run without shocking anybody's feelings. The DUKE gave indirectly some useful criticism of the new army administration scheme. It has not, to be sure, been properly applied yet. The present Estimates have been prepared in an experimental way, and mainly under the old system, which treated the army as existing purely for the Parliamentary convenience of the Cabinet. Still, the Commander-in-Chief gave the exact measure of the value of the new scheme when he said, that of course he would not be responsible for Estimates which had been cut down and rearranged by the SECRETARY for WAR, who is supreme, and could not well be otherwise. Under the new scheme, as under the old, everything will depend on the honest determination of the Cabinet to have a good army. By way of estimate of the wisdom of our recent administration there is considerable value in the DUKE's round declaration that the Horse Artillery should be restored to its former strength. Why, the reduction of the arm is the one undeniable and visible measure of Mr. STANHOPE's administration; and if that is a mistake what are we to think of the rest? The DUKE has since spoken more openly at the Fishmongers' dinner, and has assured his hosts with the utmost possible frankness, first, that the army is too weak, and secondly, that its efficiency is all a question of money. The first proposition is undeniable, and the second, if it is not all the truth, is at any rate nothing but the truth.

At the end of his evidence the Commander-in-Chief was asked "whether he was prepared to give an estimate of all "that was required to make the army in all its branches "thoroughly efficient," and HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS naturally answered that he was, when properly called upon to do it. Here, we believe, as we have frequently argued before, is an indication of the one way in which we can hope to put a stop to the miserable hand-to-mouth system on which our naval and military administration is conducted. It is the construction of a proper estimate of all that is required to make them really efficient, and then the establishment of a proper standard of strength. Of course these could only be obtained by inquiry, but the process need not be long. The work has been rough hewn already by the Intelligence Departments of the two Services, and all that is necessary now is the call from Government which would justify the publication of their opinions. The appointment of that Committee to inquire into the state of the national defences which was recommended by Sir JAMES STEPHEN's Commission, asked for in the House and refused with nervous terror by Mr. SMITH and his colleagues, would unquestionably result in the presentation of a sound estimate and good working scheme in a few weeks. The refusal was undoubtedly due to the "party system," if that is the name which it is decided to give to the moral cowardice of the generation. Perhaps a less compact but more accurate account would be that the public men of this generation were too exclusively brought up under the cheeseparing and shopkeeper Liberalism of the middle of the century to be able to understand what naval and military efficiency really mean, or to understand how to obtain them. From the mere party point of view a politician would probably gain who came forward honestly, told the truth, and boldly asked for large resources. But since politicians will not see their interests, they must be forced to attend to ours by pressure from without.

THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BILL.

THE Government had no reason to regret the concession of ample time for the debate on the second reading of the Local Government Bill. The prolonged discussion of details may have been irregular; but there was some convenience in the anticipation of objections which would have been urged at a later stage. It is something to have drawn the fire of the temperance fanatics, though Sir WILFRID LAWSON will probably repeat his speech when the licensing clauses are reached. It will be difficult to say anything new on the subject of compensation. The majority will not share the desire of the temperance philanthropists to be revenged on the licensed victuallers after driving them out of their lawful occupation. The SOLICITOR-GENERAL raised, perhaps unavoidably, a partially irrelevant issue when he undertook to prove that unoffending publicans had a strict legal right to the renewal of their licences. Even if his argument had failed to satisfy the House, the claims of the trade would scarcely have been weakened. By long-established custom licences have been annually renewed, and the holders or their predecessors in title have given valuable consideration for the privileges of which they will now be liable at any time to be dispossessed. The agitators assert that the right to renewal will be, for the first time, recognized by the Bill; but a business for which several thousand pounds may have been paid undoubtedly constitutes a vested interest. Chance, which almost amounts to a certainty, may well have a definite value. There will, of course, be one or more divisions on the subject; but the result is not doubtful. The cynical injustice of Sir WILFRID LAWSON'S proposals will deter impartial members from concurring in a measure of confiscation; and even the fanatics will be aware that, if they commanded a majority, their victory would on this occasion be barren. Mr. RITCHIE has given notice that, if the opponents of the Bill succeed in refusing compensation, all the licensing clauses will be withdrawn. The consequence will be that the present law and practice will remain unaltered, and that the boon of modified Local Option will be wantonly forfeited. The demand for a popular vote will certainly not be conceded by the House of Commons. If a representative government is worth anything for national or local purposes, it must exclude the crude form of direct legislation by the constituencies. Sufficient inconvenience will be caused by the confusion which may probably arise if county elections turn on the issue of granting or withholding licences. The brewers and publicans, though they dislike the Bill, have the good sense to confine their opposition to one or two provisions. They will be heavy losers if Sunday trading is generally prohibited; and for the most part they would, if they had a chance, deprecate any new legislation; but they are more ready than their implacable enemies to accept a reasonable compromise. They perhaps made a tactical mistake in reserving their defence for the Committee; but they probably reflected that Sir WILFRID LAWSON could say nothing new.

One powerful body or class which will be affected by the Bill has hitherto reserved any opposition which it may be disposed to offer. The largest towns, to the probable number of nineteen or twenty, will have no complaint to make. In their new character of counties their Corporations will retain their present powers, with some additions created by the Bill. The smaller incorporated towns will perhaps acquiesce in virtual disfranchisement. They will be represented on the governing bodies, and there will, therefore, be an additional field for municipal ambition. The towns of the third or fourth magnitude may be more formidable opponents. The line of division is, as in all such cases, arbitrarily drawn; but it seems strange that Mr. RITCHIE should be guided by the census of seven years ago. There is no difficulty in procuring an approximately correct estimation of the subsequent increase of population, and in some instances the inquiry might justify the removal of a borough into the higher class. Almost all large towns would probably prefer independence to the share which they might acquire in the government of the counties; and Mr. RITCHIE has not yet explained the reasons which prevent him from gratifying their probable wish. One considerable advantage of his scheme will consist in the amalgamation, if it is effected, of the county and borough police. Residents in suburban districts know by experience the amount of impunity which is allowed to crime on the frontiers of police districts. The borough and county constables, even when they have no jealousy of one another, are often unable to act efficiently in concert. Other questions will arise as to the respective scales of rates; but the Government will answer many objections by the statement, already often repeated, that the Bill is not final. The powers of the District and County Councils cannot be positively defined until some experience of their working has been gained. The relations of the counties to boroughs within and without their jurisdiction will probably be tentative or provisional.

The few speakers who discussed the principle of the Bill in the debate on the second reading to a certain extent wasted their energies, while they pursued the regular and constitutional course. Mr. AMBROSE'S suggestion that the powers of the Local Councils were for the most part to be withdrawn from the Local Government Board was an argument against the whole Government measure. As a large majority was pledged to support the Bill, and as no division was to be taken on the second reading, it was too late to object to unnecessary legislation. Both the great parties are committed to the principle of the Bill, though most of their members regard it with indifference or dislike. Mr. STANSFELD knew that the Government could not possibly accept his scheme of parochial government, and it was equally certain that the administration of the Poor-law could not be at this time transferred to the County Councils. If the question is again raised, Mr. RITCHIE will do well to remind the House that Boards of Guardians afford a security for the due control of the rates which will not be furnished by the Councils. The plural or graduated vote is far more equitable than complex and equal suffrage in the election of persons entrusted with the administration of the Poor-law. The same principle has been often advocated in the United States as applicable to local government, and the proposal has only been defeated by the inveterate prejudice in favour of universal suffrage. There is no reason to fear that any amendment will be carried on the present occasion for the transfer of Poor-law administration to the new Councils, but the Ministers ought to guard themselves against any admission of the future expediency of such a change. They have little to fear from any opposition which may be offered to some of the most questionable parts of the Bill. Mr. GOSCHEN'S financial boons will be eagerly accepted by the proposed recipients, and criticisms on a gift have an ungracious sound. The liberal contributions to local government which are to be given will probably within a few years be exceeded in amount by the additional rates which will be imposed by elected bodies of local rulers. The Councils will be elected by majorities consisting of non-ratepayers, and it is by no means certain that economy in expenditure will be popular; but all questions of the kind are superseded by the unopposed second reading of the Bill. Few of the Ministers spoke in its defence; and it must be admitted that their reticence was justifiable. They may have more to say when the clauses are examined in Committee.

One of the most important portions of the measure has hitherto attracted little notice. Mr. FIRTH was almost the only member who either supported or opposed the inclusion of London in the Bill; yet the proposal to legislate for a populous province which is at the same time the capital of the kingdom might have seemed to require some attention. A county is a well-understood area, though its extent may vary as widely as Yorkshire from Rutland; yet it is by no means certain that the existing divisions will be in all cases preserved. The counties which might otherwise be too large for simple and separate government will be largely reduced in population by the exclusion from the provisions of the Bill of large cities within their limits. Lancashire, which is the most populous county, will be relieved to a great extent by the separate organization of Liverpool and Manchester, and perhaps of two or three other great towns. Yorkshire, in the same manner, will be separated from Leeds and Bradford, if not from Huddersfield, Halifax, and Hull. Even in Kent a movement has begun for the separate incorporation, for municipal as for Parliamentary purposes, of the Eastern and Western divisions of the county. It is evident that at a certain point provincial unity is inconsistent with the doctrine of decentralization. The establishment of a single metropolitan municipality ought, if it were in any case desirable, to be the subject of a separate Bill. While the great manufacturing counties are unincumbered by the population of the great towns within their borders, a score of enormous and crowded cities in the district which is called London will be thrown together into a single community. It is true that Croydon, West Ham, and perhaps other suburban towns, have had the prudence and good fortune to establish municipal governments of their own; but Paddington and Marylebone, Finsbury, Hackney, and the Tower Hamlets, are to be wards in the overgrown borough which will pretend to be a county. Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT and Mr. FIRTH may fairly congratulate themselves on the conversion of the Government to the project which found little favour when it was suggested by themselves. If the policy of applying the same forms to the most dissimilar materials is carried still further, the demand for the transfer of the control of the Metropolitan Police to an elected Council will perhaps be conceded, if not by the present Ministers, yet by more Radical successors. Mr. FIRTH has lost no time in insisting on a ruinous uniformity of procedure. As he truly remarked, the National Government now disposes of a force of 14,000 disciplined men in London; and he might have added that the same body under an elected Council might in certain contingencies form the nucleus of a revolution. M. FLOQUET, the most thoroughgoing of Democrats, has within a few days refused to place the Paris police under the control of the Municipal Council. English legislators may at some time be rasher and more short-sighted; and the Metropolitan clauses of the Local Government Bill do little credit to their caution. If the London clauses should not be reached in time to pass the Bill as it stands in the current Session, an opportunity for further consideration would not be a subject for regret. A late vote of the House certainly showed that the Metropolitan Board of Works is not at this moment in good odour; but an unwieldy Council elected by household suffrage would scarcely be more trustworthy.

SIR FREDERICK ROBERTS ON TEMPERANCE IN THE ARMY.

THE abbreviated reports in the newspapers of a speech which the Indian Commander in-Chief made at Meerut on the 3rd of last month seemed to show that, as is the wont of Sir FREDERICK ROBERTS'S speeches, it was a very sensible one; and the full text certainly does not lessen that impression. We are afraid, indeed, that all the pretty compliments which Sir FREDERICK pays to the admirable intentions and labours of the total abstinence party will not induce them to refrain from seeing in him that worst of all fiends, an apologist of moderate drinking; but it is just possible that this very fact will make other persons think all the better of his utterances. These utterances are also the more welcome inasmuch as—partly, no doubt, from a very well founded conviction that drunkenness had been one of the greatest curses of the British army; partly, we fear, from a certain desire to curry favour with popular fads—some military and naval authorities of late years have gone a long way in the total abstinence direction. A part of the speech is devoted to a different subject, and one which is sometimes tabooed to ears polite—to wit, the senseless, and for the most part perfectly unmeaning, foulness of language which is another of the British soldier's besetting sins, and which in the public places of garrison towns is often a very real and a very intolerable nuisance. Sir FREDERICK'S words on this subject also are worth attention; but, as there is not much possibility of difference of opinion here, they need discussion less.

The best part of the speech is to be found partly in the remarks on moderate drinking and partly in the description of the kind of substitute for, or rather supplement to, the old canteen which Sir FREDERICK ROBERTS would like to see everywhere, has seen at Rangoon, and seems to have persuaded the Indian Government to set up in all but the smallest stations. "If it were possible," says the General, he "would like to see every man in the army a total "abstainer. But it is not possible, nor perhaps in some "constitutions, and from some points of view, especially "in such an exhausting climate as that of India, is it "desirable. Moreover, the man who has sufficient control "over himself to take what is allowable, as St. PAUL says, "for his stomach's sake and no more is, in my opinion, "a finer character than he who takes the pledge because he "cannot trust himself to touch stimulants without taking "more than is good for him. It is the man of strong will "and self-control who makes the best soldier, and who is "required for the army." These last words would not be a bad inscription for every canteen on the one side and every "Temperance Room" on the other, though we do not know that the temperance people would like them. Fortunately, as we have said, it seems that they are not mere talk, and that their principle is going to be carried out by the provision all over India of garrison Institutes where men can drink or not drink as they choose. And we confess that some at least of the promoters of a certain People's Palace in a certain other East would do well to blush as they read the description of the refreshment-room "occupied by "men enjoying their evening meal, with which those who "wished for it could have beer, brought them from the "neighbouring canteen." In this plan there is nothing of the childish forbidding of things lawful and the childish keeping out of things forbidden which our good folk at home believe in. The canteen is to be reduced to an appendage to the Institute, so that the Indian soldier, like his betters, can have his beer or his diluted spirits with his meal, or his game, or his book, and not be forced to drink, and nothing but drink, if he wishes to drink at all. The English East ender is to be dealt with on a different principle, and must make up for lost time in the other "palace" as he goes home. We only ask every sensible person to consider which is likely to be the better and which is actually the more reasonable plan. But, then, perhaps our wise men do not think that "it is the man of "self-control and of strong will who makes the best" citizen and "is most required" in London. In that case the wisdom of the nearer East is scarcely equal to that of the further, and Mile End is a long way behind Meerut.

THE FISHERIES TREATY.

THE announcement that the proposed Fisheries Treaty has been virtually rejected by the United States has almost escaped notice in England. Mr. CHAMBERLAIN has more than once reminded his countrymen that their congratulations on his success might perhaps prove to be premature; but his own apparent satisfaction with the result of the negotiation has diverted attention from his occasional warnings. He has good reason for thinking that the unanimous approval by the Commissioners on both sides of the draft of Convention may facilitate a future agreement. The assent of the Canadian Parliament has been assured, and it was well known that the English Government would accept any settlement which had satisfied the Imperial and Colonial representatives. It might have been thought that an arrangement on which all parties to the negotiation were agreed could hardly fail to terminate a long-standing controversy; but it is not easy to conclude a treaty with the United States, inasmuch as the ratification depends on the consent of three branches of the Government, and as some of them are affected by considerations which have nothing to do with the merits of the agreement. If the Convention were to pass the Senate, having already been recommended by the PRESIDENT, its provisions would render an Act of Congress necessary; but there is no doubt that the Democratic majority of the House of Representatives would support the decision of the PRESIDENT. Grave doubts were from the first entertained as to the course which the Senate might pursue. In that body the Republican party is the stronger, and the Committee of Foreign Relations has, of course, been nominated by the majority. It is now known that the Committee has advised the rejection of the treaty, and there is no doubt that the Senate will act accordingly. The Democrats in the Senate, accepting their defeat, propose not to pass the treaty, but to postpone the discussion till next winter. By that time the result of the Presidential election will be known, and the advocates of the treaty think that it would become more popular after some experience of its temporary and provisional operation. The Republicans are fully determined that the question shall be decided while they have still the control of the Senate. It may therefore be assumed that, except as far as their agreement may exercise an incidental or collateral influence, the conclusions of the Commissioners have been altogether nullified.

The Republican Senators and other members of the party will have no difficulty in devising excuses for a proceeding which certainly seems to need apology. The apparent objections to the treaty have been repeatedly urged by its opponents; but friends and enemies are perfectly aware that it was defeated neither on its defects nor on its merits, but with exclusive reference to the coming election. The Senate, unless it has changed its intention, was about to consider the treaty in secret session for the apparent purpose of securing a strict party vote. The hostility of the Republicans is directed, not so much against England or Canada, as against Mr. CLEVELAND. His recent declaration in favour, not of Free trade, but of reduced protective duties, has raised the hopes of his adversaries. The managers could not allow him the credit of putting an end to a dispute which has lasted for seventy years. It is not a little remarkable that the names of the Republican candidates for the Presidential nomination have scarcely been as yet publicly mentioned. They will be required to pronounce themselves in favour of the most stringent system of Protection, both because it is necessary to secure the votes of the producers, and for the still stronger reason that a section of the Democratic party may perhaps on this point secede from its allegiance. Mr. CLEVELAND'S prospects are at present not altogether brilliant, though he enjoys more fully than any of his recent predecessors the confidence of the best class of American citizens. His chance of success depends on the strength of the organization which is known by the elegant name of "mugwumps," and which is more anxious to promote purity of administration than to support the interests of party. On the other side, the cause of commercial monopoly, of jobbery, and corruption is personified in Mr. BLAINE, though it is doubtful whether he will be selected as the Republican candidate. His formal undertaking not to seek nomination, though it may, perhaps, be sincere, is not believed by either his supporters or his opponents. His candidature would be the more formidable because he has exerted himself with some success to detach the Irish voters from their ancient connexion with the Democratic party. In the probable contingency of his yielding to the gentle violence of his friends, Mr. BLAINE will not fail to indicate his hostility to England, and he will almost certainly condemn the defunct Fisheries Treaty.

It is not clear whether the modus vivendi, as it was called, which was to last for two years, will be put in force during even a portion of that time; but it will probably be necessary at once to fall back on the existing relations of the American and Canadian fishermen. It is possible, but not certain, that the good temper and moderation of the Commissioners who negotiated the treaty may outlast their abortive agreement; but it is easy to see that the concessions which were made on behalf of Canada may be used as pretexts for encroachments. Mr. CHAMBERLAIN has repeatedly explained that some of the strict legal rights of the Canadian fishermen were deliberately waived by their representative and his colleagues as part of a friendly compromise. There is no more unprofitable or more inconvenient possession than a valid legal pretension against a formidable adversary. The claim, like the man's hold on the wolf's ears, is difficult to maintain and dangerous to let go. The capture of American fishing-boats by Canadian cruisers may be regular and justifiable, but it is a hazardous practice. It is not certain that the Government of the Dominion will be able or willing to prevent the fishermen from insisting on the strict letter of their rights. It is also doubtful whether the Canadian Parliament will repeat concessions which have been summarily renounced by the American Senate. The Commissioners are in no way to be blamed for the failure of the experiment which they seemed to have tried with success. There is no reason to suppose that the Senate and its Foreign Relations Committee would have approved any compact unless it had amounted to an unqualified surrender. Some critics of the policy of the English Government have asserted that it chose an unseasonable time for negotiation. It is impossible to say whether any other date would have been more auspicious. It is true that a year hence the business would not have been complicated by the imminence of a Presidential election; but it was possible that a new President and a new Secretary of State might have been less pacific and less reasonable than Mr. CLEVELAND and Mr. BAYARD. As long as there was anything for the English Government to do the affair was transacted with skill and success. The untoward action of the Senate was wholly unconnected with the conduct of the Foreign Office. It must be assumed that the proceedings of the Conference were laid before the Foreign Relations Committee; but its decision had probably little or nothing to do with statistics or with argument. The fate of the treaty was known as soon as the matter passed into the hands of the Senate. If Mr. CHAMBERLAIN had been a second TALLEYRAND, he could have exercised no influence on the body which absolutely controlled the result.

This is not the first project of a treaty between England and the United States which has in modern times been rejected. Mr. REVERDY JOHNSON, once American Minister in England, negotiated with Lord DERBY, then Foreign Secretary, a settlement of the Alabama dispute which purported to be final. The ratification of the treaty was refused either by the American Government or by the Senate; and it is not surprising that the precedent should be followed by the Republican party. The failure of the arrangement left the question open till it was at last settled by the humiliating Treaty of Washington, followed by the iniquitous Geneva award. The great merits of the American Constitution are now more fully appreciated in England than at any former time; but there may be some difference of opinion as to the expediency of the diplomatic supremacy of the Senate. It is true that no other body in the United States commands equal confidence and respect; but among the functions which can be exercised by elected assemblies, the management of foreign relations is perhaps the more anomalous. The Senate includes many members of experience and ability; but no large deliberative body is an effective instrument for the transaction of administrative business. The power of holding secret sessions, though it may be in many respects convenient, necessarily diminishes individual responsibility. As in the present instance, the Senators are believed to act, even in international affairs, under the influence of political motives. An English Foreign Minister, though he may often be mistaken, is almost always independent of party influence in the negotiation of treaties or understandings with other Governments. No advantage can arise from expressions of resentment at a proceeding which was within the competence of the United States. It may be permitted to regret the continuance of a fertile cause of dissension. It is not impossible that Mr. CHAMBERLAIN'S anticipation of future benefit may sooner or later be realized. The rejection of the treaty by the Senate is a virtual intimation of unwillingness to improve the relations between the two Powers. If hereafter the feeling of the majority should change, the Commissioners will have provided a practicable scheme for effecting the object which is at present unattainable.

IRELAND.

BY far the most satisfactory piece of news from Ireland during the present week is the report of the action taken in the case of NORAH FITZMAURICE. In commenting the other day on the vile persecution to which this unfortunate girl is being subjected, we urged that the boycotting provisions of the Crimes Act might surely be put in force against the known instigators of these cowardly cruelties, and we are glad to see that the authorities in Ireland were of the same opinion. THOMAS DOWLING, Secretary of the suppressed branch of the National League at Lixnaw, the petty tyrant at whose signal the boycotters left the chapel in a body the Sunday before last on NORAH FITZMAURICE entering it, has been promptly summoned, in company with another man named GALVIN, before two resident magistrates, and both men were sentenced to six months' imprisonment with hard labour. They have, of course, appealed, and are at large for the present on bail; but we are disposed for once to accept that arrangement contentedly, and to reconcile ourselves to the delay of an appeal for the sake of insuring the infliction of an adequate and exemplary punishment. No one, we feel sure, who has not allowed the spirit of political faction to extinguish every honest and manly sympathy in his breast will think that this sentence, severe as it is, should be shortened by a single day. We are glad to record the fact that the conviction has already produced a most salutary effect. NORAH FITZMAURICE, it is reported, "attended Mass last Sunday "without being subjected to the least hostile demonstra- "tion." This is a conclusive answer to those who have pretended that the offence of boycotting is not to be brought under control by a sufficiently resolute application of the Crimes Act. Like every other form of concerted human action, it requires the continual intervention of organizers and leaders to keep it at work. We have only got to make this intervention a service of sufficient danger, and the system will soon fall to pieces from sheer lack of any one who cares to risk his liberty by assuming leadership. There is no man who has less of the martyr's spirit in his composition than the Irish boycotter.

Pending the appeal lodged by the man DOWLING and his companion, who have been convicted at Listowel, there are other parts of the country to which the authorities would do well to turn their attention. At Knocknagree, near Kanturk, for instance, there is work for them to do of exactly the same kind as they have so successfully accomplished in Kerry. Mrs. KEEFE, whose husband has been severely boycotted for four years, went to hear Mass in her village chapel the Sunday before last, when, her attendance being unexpected, no demonstration occurred. On her attempting, however, to repeat the experiment last Sunday, the entire congregation of about 300 persons left the chapel when she entered it. It should not be impossible to find out who acted during the week as the principal contrivers of the very different reception given to Mrs. KEEFE on her repetition of the offence of going to chapel, and to bring them, as has been done at Listowel, to speedy justice. At Miltown-Malbay, again, the attention of the authorities is due to the case of HANNAH CARROLL—Mr. PARNELL's "hale old woman of about fifty," who, singularly enough, is the mother of a man about fifty-three. In this instance the sharp enforcement of the law is not at first producing the desired effect. The rector of the parish has written to an Irish newspaper stating that the punishment of six months' imprisonment inflicted by the County Court judge at Ennis on HANNAH CARROLL's boycotters, as the result of an appeal from a sentence of three months' imprisonment passed by the magistrates at petty sessions, has aroused against her in the neighbourhood a feeling so relentless that she and her son cannot possibly hope for any means of subsistence unless it comes to them from without. "They are now," he says, "entirely dependent "on the aid and sympathy of the Loyalists." This dependence, however, ought not, we think, to be, or at least ought not to continue to be, so entire as Dr. BONYNGE represents it. We should not allow the boycotters to suppose that we shall tire of vindicating the law before they tire of violating it. Let the authorities try the experiment of sending another batch of HANNAH CARROLL's boycotters to keep company with the men already in gaol, and we shall see if the behaviour of Miltown-Malbay does not improve as much as that of Lixnaw has improved under similar treatment.

We observe that Mr. JUSTIN M'CARTHY, who formally included the case above mentioned among those cited in support of his recent Parliamentary protest against the enhancement of sentences by County Court judges, was careful not to enlarge upon it. He dwelt eloquently on the wrongs of Father M'FADDEN, "a model parish priest and a "pure patriot whose acquaintance he was proud to possess"; and he referred in feeling terms to the hard case of his "hon. friend the member for South Armagh." Why, then, did he pass so lightly over these humbler friends of his whose sentence has been doubled by a harsh judicial functionary for the patriotic act of persecuting an old woman? If Mr. M'CARTHY is ashamed of these lowly allies and their conduct, he has no business to be; for they are implicitly obeying the instructions of Mr. M'CARTHY's leader. We can well understand, however, that examples of the kind may have been regarded as not the most suitable to the taste of the House of Commons, and that it was thought better to confine the complaint mainly to the case of the "model parish priest" and the interesting Mr. BLANE. For our own part, however, we shall take the liberty of drawing special attention to the circumstances of the appeal in the boycotting cases, inasmuch as it appears to us to dispose of the whole mass of calumnious insinuation with which Mr. GLADSTONE and Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT, to their deep disgrace, assailed the Irish judiciary. The judge before whom the appeal was brought went fully into the case, and came to the conclusion, on all the facts, that the offence was one deserving the full punishment which he had to inflict. We have no doubt that he was abundantly justified in so thinking, and, if so, he would have been neglecting his obvious duty if he had allowed the inadequate sentence to stand. The virulence displayed in the Gladstonian ranks in the extemporized debate of last Tuesday, and the indignant protests of that profound lawyer Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT against the "unconstitutional" character of the decision on these appeals, are intelligible enough. The Irish patriot is always, and always has been, filled with wrath and consternation at the discovery that he is not to be allowed to play the game of disorder "with the advantages." He has assumed, and his Gladstonian friends pretend to have assumed with him, that, in giving him the privilege of appeal, the Legislature were simply handicapping justice for his benefit, and that every attempt on his part to get off punishment by resort to a higher tribunal was, as between himself and the Crown, to be essentially a case of "Heads "I win, and tails you lose." What makes the assumption the more unreasonable in the present case is that it is in direct conflict with the demand put forward last year by the Parnellites themselves. It would have been quite possible for them to have contented themselves with a mere right to have cases "stated," on points of law alone, for the decision of the County Court judges; but they were not satisfied with this, and loudly maintained that it would be quite inadequate for their protection from gross injustice at the hands of a "removable" magistracy. They clamoured for an appeal which should be eo nomine a rehearing. Nothing less would serve them than that a County Court judge, whose independence of the Executive they delighted at that time to compare with the subservience of the resident magistrate, should be invested with complete cognizance of the whole case on the occasion of an appeal from Petty Sessions. It was in deference to these demands that the Government extended to the County Court judges in Ireland the jurisdiction exercised by the Quarter Sessions, and it thereupon became the duty of those judges, as the SOLICITOR-GENERAL for IRELAND pointed out, "upon "the evidence brought before them, to exercise their dis-"cretion, independently of the sentence which the Court "below might have pronounced." It is just possible that some of the more feather-headed of the Parnellite agitators might not last year have grasped the fact that a possibility of the aggravation of sentences is legally and logically involved in the notion of a "rehearing." But it must have been perfectly well known to men like Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT and Mr. SHAW LEFEVRE, and their audacious affectation of surprise at the discovery deceives no one.

DISHING CE BRAV' GÉNÉRAL.

WHEN a thousand gentlemen or so are all striving together for the upper hand, it is likely that there will be a good deal of change in their relative positions from day to day. And yet nothing may have happened to alter the odds in favour of any particular one of them. Taking the two Chambers and the outsiders of various kinds together, it may be roughly calculated that the political battle in France is being carried on by the number of persons given above. As they are mostly pretty active and can all shout, it is not wonderful that this or the other handful of them should attract exclusive attention for a space. It would, however, be very rash to conclude that this temporary prominence will hide General BOULANGER for long. M. FLOQUET may persuade Senators or Deputies to vote the order of the day, the Count of PARIS may set the town talking by a manifesto, President CARNOT may go on his travels, and be applauded at his native place, Limoges, and yet the General be none the worse. His luck has been singularly persistent. Not once or twice, nor even twenty times, has he been hidden for a moment, and thereupon pronounced dead and buried, only to turn up again more vivacious than ever. It will be well to wait a little before deciding that M. FLOQUET has got him, or is likely to get him, under lock and key. Even the quarrels between his supporters in the press, the Cocarde and the Lanterne, ought not to encourage his enemies. It remains to be seen whether they were not arranged for one thing; and then they have this advantage, that whatever happens in the approaching elections, it will be competent to the General to say that he foresaw and arranged it. He has only to wait and choose his prophet after the event. In the meantime he can stand with a clove-pink in his button-hole—an elegant and poetic flower—and watch for his opening.

The reality of the General's power is proved by the fact that he is the cause of all the effervescence. Everything done in France now is done for him, or against him, or merely because of him. President CARNOT has gone on tour—not without doubts and fears—mainly to counteract his popularity. The politicians are equally busy in their way. So much of our language has been naturalized in France that it will not be wonderful if the verb "to dish" is also recruited before long. "Disher" will look quite as classic as "five-o'cloquer." The newspapers will easily make the exact force of the word understood. M. FLOQUET will supply one example of its proper use. He, having come into office pledged to revision, has discovered that the General would be the person most likely to profit by it; accordingly he would rather not revise for the moment. But, as an alternative, he offers abundant Radicalism—separation of Church and State, after due legislation designed to keep the Church gagged and handcuffed; a democratic Army Bill; and autonomy for Paris—anything, in short, the Radicals please, if only they will keep down that abominable BOULANGER. As one half the General's popularity is due to the hatred and fear inspired by the Radicals, this does not seem the kind of policy likely to damage his chance. It is also doubtful whether the Moderates will long continue to behave as if it were better to support measures they dread and detest than to improve the General's position. For the rest, the Chamber, though it did vote the order of the day at M. FLOQUET'S request, also voted the urgency of revision. It may soon be impossible to postpone the experiment any longer, and then who knows what may happen? The Count's attempt to dish the General will be even less dangerous for him than M. FLOQUET'S. Revision and a plebiscite have the Count of PARIS'S entire approval. He foresaw that they must come, and urged the necessity of them long ago, only it is self-evident to him that the proper person to profit by them is the Count of PARIS. Therefore he tranquilly awaits the appearance of his name at the head of the poll. The Count does not present himself as the born King of France, but only as one candidate among others for the favour of the most sweet voices, and he expects to secure them. A more wonderful delusion never arose in the brain of any exile. With a rival on one side who has no resource but to intensify and extend the policy of social disturbance, which has already excited almost rabid hatred against the Republic, and on the other a Prince who will not use the only claim which entitles him to any attention whatever, General BOULANGER ought to have an easy game. He has hardly more to do for the present than hold his tongue, and that he has shown he can do with excellent effect.

CONVOCATION AND THE COURTS.

LAST week we had some remarks to make upon the lighter side of certain proceedings in the Convocation of York. The judgment of the Queen's Bench Division in the case of Canon TRISTRAM, which was delivered by the LORD CHIEF JUSTICE last Wednesday, has a grave historic interest of a very different sort. Canon TRISTRAM himself deserves much personal sympathy. He possesses a great reputation for learning, and he has for many years been one of the Proctors for the Archdeaconry of Durham in the clerical Parliament of the Northern Province. In the year 1886 he was suddenly declared to be disqualified by the Archbishop of YORK—a prelate who answers very well to the famous description given by a cabman of the late Mr. JOHN FORSTER. At the election of that year three candidates were nominated for two vacancies, and Canon TRISTRAM was second on the poll. But the ARCHBISHOP decided that the first and third candidates were duly elected, to the exclusion of the second, on the ground that Canon TRISTRAM did not hold a benefice in the constituency which he sought to represent. The Canon appealed to the High Court of Justice, but the judges held that Convocation was independent of the Court, and that the ruling of its President could not be controlled by any secular tribunal. It will be seen that Lord COLERIDGE, with whom Baron POLLOCK and Mr. Justice HAWKINS concurred, refused to consider the question whether the ARCHBISHOP was right or wrong, or whether, if he had declined to act altogether, he might have been compelled to do so. What they state is that, having acted, he cannot be ordered by mandamus to alter his determination, which must be regarded as final. The public are not, perhaps, greatly concerned with the ARCHBISHOP'S dictum that, whereas the diocese is the unit in the Convocation of Canterbury, in the Convocation of York the unit is the Archdeaconry. The Convocation of York has been prorogued since we last wrote, apparently without having done anything in particular. But Lord COLERIDGE'S cursory review of Convocation from the earliest times, sketchy and imperfect as it naturally is, throws some light on the relations between Church and State, and on the meaning, in this sense, of the word "Establishment." At the conclusion of the arguments some weeks ago, the Court intimated that Canon TRISTRAM'S application must be refused, mainly on the ground that no precedent could be discovered for it in the annals of the law. It was admittedly not authorized by any express statute, and the weight of unbroken custom, or rather the negative effect of no instance being producible, might in itself have prevailed.

Everybody, or almost everybody, knows that Convocation is a very ancient body, "probably in some shape older than "Parliament," and that before the reign of CHARLES II. it was charged with the duty of taxing the clergy. "Our "supposed jurisdiction," says Lord COLERIDGE, "rests on no "statute; if it exists at all, it exists at common law, and "existed, therefore, in days when Convocations were as "important as Parliaments, as independent, perhaps as "powerful. This writ, if the argument be correct, might "have been directed to CHICHELE or SUDBURY, to SCROPE or "WOLSEY, as well as to Archbishops BENSON or THOMSON." The present constitution of Convocation is at least as old as the Council of Northampton, which met, under EDWARD I., in 1283. The writ drawn up by Archbishop PECKHAM on that occasion directed that "each of the bishops, as was "provided in the said congregation, shall about the aforesaid "day cause the clergy of his diocese to be assembled in a "certain place, and shall there have carefully expounded to "them the propositions made on behalf of the King, so that "at the said time and place at London, from each diocese "two proctors in the name of the clergy; and from each "cathedral and collegiate chapter one proctor, shall be sent "with sufficient instructions, who shall have full and ex-"press power of treating with us and our brethren upon the "premisses, and of consenting to such measures as for "the honour of the Church, the comfort of the King, and "the peace of the realm, the community of the clergy shall "provide." There are probably not many people left who think that the Church of England was established by Act of Parliament or invented by Henry VIII. Lord COLERIDGE understates the case when he says "that the separation of "Convocation and Parliament has been complete since the "days of RICHARD II., if not of EDWARD III." The clergy, though now specially represented in Parliament only by a limited number of the bishops, were an estate of the realm, and Convocation was summoned directly by the writ of the Archbishop. Even now it is contended that Convocation, with the assent of the Crown, which means, of course, the Ministry of the day, may bind the clergy, though not the laity. The Bishop of CHESTER, whose authority on such points is second to no man's, declares that "the Convoca-"tions of the two Provinces, as the recognized constitutional "assemblies of the English clergy, have undergone, except "in the removal of the monastic members at the dissolu-"tion, no change of organization from the reign of "EDWARD I. down to the present day." These facts are not to be contemptuously dismissed as mere antiquarianism. They have an important bearing upon some secular as well as upon many ecclesiastical controversies of the time.

THE GREAT ATHENIAN RUMMAGE.

THE public is indebted to the Athens Correspondent of the Daily News for one of the most delightful stories (we really do not care in the least whether it is true or false) which have relieved the dulness of modern politics. M. TRICOUPIS, the Greek Minister, is known to many Englishmen as a clever person, but many clever persons there be whose cleverness has never been rewarded so much in the manner of the Land of Novels as his, always according to the Daily News' Correspondent. For it was so that M. TRICOUPIS, who has been called (it is a great shame) the "Greek GLADSTONE," arranged budgets which were to make the revenue of his glorious, but not wholly pecunious, country advance by leaps and bounds. The money came in, the seasons were favourable, it was Greece, and exceedingly living Greece once more; but somehow nobody could make out where the money went after coming. The more freely it poured in the less there was. Then M. TRICOUPIS, like the grey-eyed goddess of his country and city, thought of something else. He appeared at the Ministry of Finance at seven o'clock in the morning (a hideous act), got the necessary quorum of Ministers or heads of departments together, asked the Chief Cashier (what is cashier in Greek?) for his keys, and said, like the great hero of DICKENS, "Let's have a rummage."

So they had a rummage. And the first thing they came upon was a bundle of notes to the tune of two hundred thousand—francs only, but francs are not to be despised. And the second was another small bundle, and the third was like unto it, and the fourth was a bag of napoleons, and the fifth a ditto of dollars. And so they went on till they made up six millions of tenpences, to which a postscript adds three millions more, and, for all we know, they are adding still. We do not know whether M. TRICOUPIS did what an eccentric London Bohemian of the last generation is reported to have done, determining for once to realize the actual sensation of "rolling in money," but, if he did, he had some excuse for it. The state of the Chief Cashier is not reported as equally gracious. He says he meant it as a surprise; but the sons of the Greeks, though an amiable race, do not appear quite to believe him. The charitable allege that he did not mean to convey the money himself, but only to hand it over to his Hellenic Majesty's Opposition, who have, oddly enough, been prophesying deficits. But these things lie in the lap of the gods and the law. The Public Prosecutor is said to be moving in the matter, and, as was once remarked in the Greek language, "the Courts are "open." Meanwhile, the millions lie in the lap of M. TRICOUPIS, and a joyful man we ween is he. He has had none of the uncomfortable experiences of the Heir of Lynne (for, after all, you can never be quite certain that the hook will come down and bring a key with it), and yet he has the chests of gold and eke of the white money. Except in the point of getting up at seven o'clock (which, we own, is not pleasant and makes one yawn horribly in the evening) his labours are nothing to those of him who had the Gold Bug. Yet nobody ever had a more pleasing taste of what picking up gold and silver means. As for the Cashier, there is much to be said for him. All mankind is akin, and the practice of hiding sums of money which you feel sure you shall spend if you do not hide them is not unheard of. Only it is so hard really to forget where they are, or else to remember when you have forgotten. In this case, however, the happy inspiration of M. TRICOUPIS prevented the Cashier's little plan from coming to nought, owing to a lack of resolution on the planner's part, and at the same time gave the Minister and his associates what, even though it happened in the neighbourhood of the Parthenon, we may be excused for calling a high old time. If the Greek Minister has inherited the historic pen of his father, this ought to give him a noble subject:—

ὁ δὲ Χαρίλαος, μυὸς ῥάττης ὀσφραινόμενος, πρωαίτατα ἐξ εὐνῆς ἀνέστη, κ.τ.λ.

It is doubtful whether any Greek chronicler since his time, who drew for us the picture of the gentleman with the large boots and the loose tunic all full of gold dust staggering out of the treasury, has had such a cheerful theme.

MUSICAL COPYRIGHT.

THE Musical Copyright Bill, which was read a second time in the House of Lords on Tuesday last, promises redress for a minor social grievance of a rather serious kind. The case of WARNE & Co. v. SEEBOHM, in which Mr. Justice STIRLING has reserved his judgment, presents a new shape of the old controversy between the novelist and the dramatic adapter. The nervous citizens who have persuaded themselves that legislation in this country is conducted with indecent haste may perhaps be comforted by reflection on the fact that the Bill of which Lord ONSLOW has charge in the Upper House embodies the recommendations of a Royal Commission which sat in 1878. To be sure, there is no political capital to be made out of traps laid for unwary singers at public entertainments, nor have performers at village concerts ever risen in their might to organize the intimidation of the House of Lords. The simple object of the Musical Copyright Bill, introduced into the House of Commons by a private member, but since amended at the instance of the ATTORNEY-GENERAL and taken up by the Government, is to provide that there shall in future be no minimum penalty for the unauthorized performance of copyright music. At present the damages recoverable in such cases cannot be less than forty shillings—a circumstance of which the "Authors' and Composers' Copyright "Dramatic Office" has not been slow to avail itself. According to Lord KNUTSFORD, a member of the Commission, who replied to Lord BRAMWELL's paradoxical caricature of the sacredness of property with great spirit and force, the Authors' and Composers' Dramatic Copyright Office consists of "a Mr. WALL," whose name must be familiar to all readers of legal reports. "This "gentleman," added Lord KNUTSFORD, "has three clients, "and his plan is to watch the occasions on which these "songs are sung, and then to pounce down upon the giver "of the entertainment, or proprietor of the hall, where the "song was sung." By means such as these damages have been recovered from a child of thirteen, and the whole proceeds of a charitable concert have been swallowed up in legal expenses. Under the Bill the sum to which the plaintiff is entitled will be fixed by the Court, and the judge will have, as in other cases, full control over the costs. It was estimated by Sir ARTHUR SULLIVAN, who gave evidence before the Royal Commission, that the real loss to the composer or owner of the copyright from the singing of a song seldom exceeded sixpence, and there can be no doubt that full justice will be done to all parties by the Bill. Lord BRAMWELL's argument that the measure involves confiscation, because copyright has been bought and sold under the existing system, may be very powerful in a court of law. But its recognition in Parliament would reduce the Legislature to impotence.

THE POPE AND IRELAND.

THE effect of the PERSICO mission on the POPE's mind, and the expression of that mind in set terms, are matters of so much importance to the future of Ireland that one cannot be too careful in anticipating what they may be. The ordinary rules of evidence, however, give some help in the present case. The Roman Correspondent of the Times (who has generally shown himself to be somewhat more trustworthy than some foreign Correspondents of that journal) says not only that the POPE "will publicly condemn "the Plan of Campaign and boycotting, reserving other "matters," but that Mgr. PERSICO's Report is "strongly "adverse to the Nationalists" in all ways. This, of course, is information from Unionist sources. But we turn to the only anti-Unionist source of information which retains a rag or shred of respectability among the newspapers of London, and we find there, not only no contradiction, but a caveat which amounts to the strongest confirmation. "The "reports," it says (such as those we have quoted), "must "not be accepted without correction." "The SALISBURY "Cabinet has no doubt obtained certain advantages." The POPE will make renewed efforts "in the sense of inducing "Irishmen to respect the law." But he will "take no steps "which might displease the Roman Catholics of Ireland."

Unless Unionist and Separatist authorities are alike deceived, the interpretation to be placed on this is unmistakable, and it may be added that any other interpretation or anticipation would be utterly irreconcilable with the character which LEO XIII. has won in all Christendom for statesmanship, honour, and Christianity. To hear an impartial, or even a moderately partial, account of the Nationalists and their methods, is for any person who (not being an English Gladstonian, which is a fourth species) belongs to either of the three classes just referred to quite enough. That the Plan of Campaign is a negation in terms of the Eighth Commandment, that boycotting is a happy and ingenious arrangement for contravening by a single operation every precept of the Sermon on the Mount, that Parnellism is crime in three syllables instead of one by the laws of all countries, are propositions which it may suit our Gladstonians to deny, but which both they and every one else know to be true. If LEO XIII. had come to any other conclusion, there could be choice between two comments only. Either Mgr. PERSICO must have borne elaborately false witness, or His Holiness the POPE must have been a very different person from the person for whom all reasonable Christendom has, since his elevation, taken him. Fortunately, it would seem that there is no need for either of these uncomfortable decisions, and it need hardly be added that there is no need for any "Roman Catholics," except criminals and the abettors of criminals, to be "displeased." There may be some good people who think that there is a natural friendship between the Roman branch of the Catholic Church and crime. We do not think so here.

A NEW SNUB FROM AFRICA.

THERE is always something new and disagreeable turning up in Africa. At the present moment it is the danger that a considerable English commercial and missionary establishment may be choked out of existence between Arabs, Portuguese, and Germans. The difficulty would seem to be this, for us not unusual one—namely, that we have assumed certain responsibilities, and British subjects have been allowed to invest their labour and their capital in a region where they are not safe unless they can fight, and for the moment they cannot or are not allowed to fight. So they are being menaced on all sides and are calling for help from Government. The district in question is the valley of the Zambesi and its affluent the Shiré, together with the basin of Lake Nyassa. At a time when we were more enthusiastic about LIVINGSTONE, the suppression of the slave trade, the elevation of the black, and the extension of British influence than we seem to be to-day, missionaries were encouraged to follow the famous Scotch explorer into this country. The invitation, or perhaps it was only hint, of the British Government was taken with great spirit, particularly by the Mission Societies of the Established and Free Churches of Scotland. It will not be forgotten that the remarkable Mission establishment of Blantyre ran its curious career in this region. The errors of that venture, however, have been atoned for, and of late the Missions—notably and honourably the Scotch—have been creditably at work converting the heathen native to a purer faith, combating the Arab slave-hunters by more humane trade, and securing for the British merchant adventurer a moderate percentage on his invested capital.

Things were going on nicely in this way till Germany thought of extending its influence in a colonial way, and we simultaneously began to be less anxious to extend our own. Then the Germans stepped into the continental dominions of the Sultan of Zanzibar, and stopped our road one way. Stories began to float about of what had been happening further south in Africa, and the Arab man-hunters were spirited up to attack the intruding white men who interfered with their business. In the meantime, since in these days every puny whipster can have our sword, the Portuguese laid hands on the Zambesi. They have forbidden any flag but their own to navigate it, and have laid a heavy transit duty on all non-Portuguese goods. Consequently, the British missions in the Shiré and Nyassa country are entirely shut off from the world, and are at the mercy of their savage enemies, the slave-hunters. This is the state of things which a meeting of delegates from Missions, Scotch and English, and of members of Parliament, held at the Westminster Palace Hotel, on Tuesday, has asked the Government to consider and amend. It is not a creditable one, either to our sense or our dignity. The claim advanced by the missionaries, that they went in as the agents of Government, may be exaggerated. There can, however, be no doubt that they were tacitly encouraged to go. At a time when it was politically convenient to profess great zeal for the suppression of slavery, Foreign Secretaries were in the habit of pushing adventurers (honourable adventurers, of course) on into Africa. There was an understanding that they were to be supported more or less. This may not have constituted them agents of Government, but it is a valid reason why they should not be left in the lurch when trouble comes on them. The sudden activity of Portugal in the country is a provocation. Its vague claim on the Zambesi has never been enforced for centuries. Nor would it have been heard of now if our missionaries and traders had not shown that there was something to be got. It is a little too much that, when the Lake Company and the Missions have laid the eggs, the weasel Portuguese should come in and suck them. At least it is not for us to tell them that they are the mair sumphs to lay in such exposed places. What course ought to be taken is not so easily settled. Unfortunately we have allowed our relations with our neighbours of all colours and races in Africa to fall into such inextricable confusion, we have been so contradictory and unsteady, that we have made it difficult for ourselves to follow any plain course now. With Portugal in particular we have carried on all kinds of negotiations at cross purposes, and have left them in the air. Still, past mistakes supply no reason for neglect of our interest and dignity now, and we can at least insist on a free trade route to a district of recognized British influence which has been entirely opened up by ourselves.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL.

IT would be unjust to Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL to suppose that he intended, or even desired, to produce any such effect upon the position of the Government or the situation in Ireland as the delighted Gladstonians have ascribed to his speech of Wednesday last. To begin with, he no doubt knows very well that the exultation is absurdly exaggerated, and that his recent Parliamentary attack on his late colleagues is not "worth many elections," or worth any election, to the Separatist party. He is well aware that he does not possess anything like that power of mischief, even supposing him capable of exercising it of malice aforethought, if he possessed it. That, however, is a supposition which, as we have said, we entirely reject. Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL, to do him justice, is not the kind of politician who is capable of a deliberate attempt to wreck an Administration from which he has withdrawn. His performance of last Tuesday was, we fully believe, no outbreak of animosity against the Government. So far as it was not due to mere honest wrongheadedness—and we are afraid we cannot refer it wholly to that—it is to be regarded simply, we think, as the sally of a naturally uneasy vanity, rendered still more restless in Lord RANDOLPH's present position by the consciousness that a rival whom he once probably regarded as a disciple has unmistakably outstripped him in the race.

Nevertheless, while willing to adopt this comparatively indulgent view of his motives, we are bound to add that, if they had been all that the enemies of the Government assume them to have been, we doubt whether it would or could have affected the outward aspect of his conduct for the worse. If he had actually wished to embarrass his late colleagues as much as possible, and to retard to the utmost of his power the completion of their task in Ireland, he could hardly have gone a better way to work. If he thought it due to his own consistency—though it is strange that he should regard that creditor, who to every one else seems leniency itself, as so exacting—to protest against what appeared to him a too indefinite postponement of Irish claims to an extension of local government, we have not to look further than Mr. CHAMBERLAIN's speech for a specimen of the manner in which this might have been quite harmlessly and inoffensively done. But, as a matter of fact, it seems to us quite impossible, even for the most strictest interpreter of the Ministerial pledges given through Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL in 1886, to come to the conclusion that they need have compelled even the most sensitive of political consciences to a protest against the present attitude of the Government. Lord RANDOLPH's own account of these pledges—to say nothing of the timely and telling commentary on them which has been since supplied by Mr. CHAPLIN—sufficiently answers his speech of Tuesday last. The undertaking which he gave in behalf of the Government in 1886 was expressly cited by him as an undertaking to take up the question of Irish local government, "with "similarity, equality, and simultaneity" as between Ireland and England, "as far as the circumstances of the two "countries would permit." It ought now to be enough to ask him whether, in his present opinion, the circumstances of one of the two countries do admit of "simultaneity" in the treatment of this question. But, as Mr. CHAPLIN has since reminded him, his actual words in 1886 were considerably stronger and more definite than his latest summary of them. What he actually said was that it would be the ambition of the Government "to introduce into Ireland, if only peace "and order prevailed in that country and the same state of "law and general acceptance of obligations that prevails in "England, a local government as similar as possible to any "institutions of the kind introduced into this country." Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL has no refuge from the conclusion—fatal to all valid excuse for his recent speech—which these words suggest. He has been, in fact, driven to the amazing proposition that there would be no "bonâ "fide carrying out of the policy" he announced two years ago if Ireland is not to have local government until the state of order in that country is satisfactory to the Executive Government. What other test, in the name of sanity, can be applied to the question whether the conditions of the pledge of 1886 have or have not been fulfilled than the judgment of the Executive Government of the day? Are they to admit that these conditions have been fulfilled, and that "peace and order and the general "acceptance of obligations" prevail in Ireland whenever they may be told so from below the gangway, or even from the front Opposition bench? Is Mr. O'BRIEN to define "peace and order" for them, and are they to take their conclusions as to the "general acceptance of obligation" from the author of the Plan of Campaign? And, if not, how can the pledges of 1886 be properly made good, with due regard to their proviso, until "the state of order in "Ireland is satisfactory to the Executive Government"?

THE NEW GALLERY LICENCE.

THE "New Gallery," under the management of Messrs. Comyns Carr and Hallé, is already in trouble about its drinks. A licence was granted by the local justices, but required to be confirmed by the Middlesex Licensing Committee. Nobody—for a wonder—was found sufficiently silly or disagreeable to oppose the licence, so the Middlesex magistrates resorted to an objection of their own. They inquired whether everybody would be allowed to come into the Gallery without paying. They were told certainly not, and thereupon they refused to confirm the licence; and, as there is no appeal from their decision, the public who go to look at the New Gallery pictures will not (unless Messrs. Carr and Hallé are ingenious enough to defeat the Licensing Committee) be able to get anything to drink there—in other words, will not be able to lunch comfortably on the premises.

There are several more or less curious points about this decision. In the first place, it appears that the local magistrates, who granted the licence in the first instance, have a rule of their own, which happens to be the converse of the Licensing Committee's rule. The local magistrates will not grant a licence unless they are assured in writing that nobody will be allowed to come in without paying. The Licensing Committee will not confirm a licence if anybody has to pay to go in. It is not for us to say that either of these admirably simple and intelligible rules is otherwise than excellent, though, if we had to choose one, the local magistrates' rule would seem suitable to apply to art galleries, and the Licensing Committee's to apply to public-houses. But the application of both to any case or all cases seems unlikely to suit the views of anybody with more sense than Sir Wilfrid Lawson. Naturally enough the barrister who appeared to support the application said that drink was allowed to be sold at the Royal Academy, the Aquarium, the South Kensington Exhibitions, Olympia, and the like, and that in no such case was anybody allowed to come in who had not paid. Only one of these cases did the Committee attempt to distinguish from the case before them, and that was the august instance of the Royal Academy. They distinguished it by saying that the Royal Academy had no licence, and that they did not know by what right liquor was sold there. Perhaps it is in the charter; perhaps the Academy has contrived to get hold of a Free Vintner; perhaps they sell drink in defiance of the law, secure in the conviction that nobody would be brutal enough to prosecute them for it. Perhaps they have a licence. As to the other notorious instances of the same thing the Committee said nothing, or, if they did, it was not reported.

The refusal of the licence by the Licensing Committee is absurd enough, and the fact that it was refused because the applicant had perforce fulfilled the condition imposed upon him by the local justices—namely, that of undertaking in writing that the public should not be admitted without payment—is exquisitely absurd; but the affair is not without its serious side. Whatever the law may be, and whatever discretion the Licensing Committee may or may not have, the fact that a place of the character of the Grosvenor Gallery or the Royal Academy is not to be allowed to supply its visitors with such luncheon as sober and respectable persons are accustomed to procure for themselves when sightseeing is preposterous, offensive, and grossly unjust. It is not suggested that the granting of a licence could, among even the most idiotic of human beings, give any cause of offence. The proprietors of the Gallery will want to sell drink and their customers will want to buy it; and, as long as there is not a Maine Law in London, it is impossible to imagine a good reason why a transaction profitable to one party and convenient to the other should not be allowed to be carried out. If the law has in this instance been rightly construed and administered, it ought to be changed, and that at once.

THE HOUSE OF LORDS.

LORD DUNRAVEN is to be congratulated on more grounds than one. His Bill for the reform of the House of Lords has afforded him an opportunity of delivering a carefully prepared, and on the whole very creditable, speech. It has elicited from the Prime Minister an announcement of some importance as to the intentions of the Government in the matter in question; and it has further enabled Lord Salisbury, in an admirably weighty and cogent speech, to demolish the unstable and imperfectly thought-out theories of reform which underlie all those ambitious proposals of which Lord Dunraven's is the latest, and perhaps the most pronounced, example. The chief value, to our thinking, of the Prime Minister's criticism on Lord Dunraven's Bill consists not so much in his exposure of its extravagances of detail—for in these respects the next amateur reformer might keep clear of his predecessor's errors—as in its vigorous combating of the main principle, to almost all amateur reformers the accepted principle, on which the measure is based. Differing in many points from one another, the inventors of new Second Chambers almost all agree in adopting the elective principle in some form or other. It is in accordance, they tell us, with "the spirit of the age"—not perhaps having sufficiently considered whether "the spirit of the age" as they interpret it, or as it will certainly be interpreted for them by those from whom they borrow the phrase, will be contented with an engraftment of the elective principle on anything so opposed to the spirit aforesaid, according to the interpretation of its interpreters aforesaid, as "hereditary privilege." Lord Dunraven and other well-meaning projectors of the same kind would do well to perpend a certain dissent attached to the declaration of peers' eldest sons in favour of reform of the House of Lords which appears in the current number of the National Review. "I cannot," says the writer, Mr. Bernard Coleridge, "agree with any of the contemplated reforms of the House of Lords, being in favour of Single Chamber Democracy." There you have it, your "spirit of the age," which men like Lord Dunraven appear to think they can conjure with as long as they like, and bottle up like the fisherman's genie whenever it is becoming troublesome. They may rely upon it that, if the House of Lords were to enter on the course to which Lord Dunraven and Lord Rosebery invite it, future events would not shape themselves according to the wishes of amiable Girondins like the two peers in question, and like most of the signataries whose names are appended to the declaration in the National Review. Rather will they take the direction desired by Bernard Égalité and the Jacobins with whom that advanced young politician consorts.

Lord Salisbury's declaration towards the close of his speech is the announcement of a policy which may or may not be adequate in its operation, but which is, at any rate, open to no objection in point of principle. The Government, he said, had been considering the question since the introduction of Lord Rosebery's motion on the subject just before Easter, and, while very anxious to avoid the idea that they would undertake any great reform, they think that a measure for facilitating the entrance of life peers into the House one which would be useful and which they ought to propose. Lord Salisbury is not prepared to go the heroic length of Lord Pembroke's proposal to create 150 or 200 life peers; but, though he intends to proceed in a more moderate manner, he is willing to make a beginning at once, and promises the early introduction of a Bill on the subject. He is also desirous of obtaining power by Act of Parliament to expel unfit members of the Upper House—with a view, of course, of getting rid of the ludicrously exaggerated scandal involved in the existence—we purposely abstain from saying "the presence"—in that body of an infinitesimally small number of "black sheep." No doubt, as a matter of order and authority, the House of Lords, like any other Assembly, should possess the power in question; but we venture to think that its exercise, at least under present conditions, will produce no practical effect whatever on the substantial efficiency and dignity of the House. A creation of life peers, if within moderate limits, can do little harm; but we see no reason to believe that the peers thus added to the House will be superior, if they are even equal, to the average of those by whom its business is at present conducted. That they will increase the number of working members may or may not be an advantage, according to circumstances.

BOBBY.

THE birds and animals indigenous to South Africa are nearly all delightful as pets. They have the quaintest and most amusing ways, and become at once affectionate and companionable. It is surprising to find how quickly a creature which only a few days before was torn suddenly from nest or burrow, and abruptly turned out from a Hottentot's pocket into a human home, becomes an intimate friend, with clearly marked individual characteristics, most interesting to study, and quite different from those of all its companions, even of the same species. On one point, however, the whole menagerie is sure to be alike, and that is, in a strong feeling of rivalry and jealousy of one another, each striving to attract as much attention as possible. Of all the strange birds and beasts collected together on the ostrich farm, of which we spoke some time ago, Bobby the crow was perhaps, on the whole, the greatest favourite. He was a black imp of mischief, who destroyed the vegetables, stole the eggs, killed the chickens, and did his best to pull down the house; but, just as amongst the human race the characters we love best are not always those with fewest faults, so poor Bobby, full of imperfections as he was, possessed so many lovable qualities that his failings were redeemed by his virtues, talents, and devotion. Our first acquaintance began when he was a reddish-brown egg, lying on a flat untidy bundle of sticks in one of the few and far between trees on the Kliplaat Road. We kept an eye on the nest, watching the progress of the young bird through successive stages of repulsive ugliness, until as a half-fledged staggering creature, ungainly in figure, and only partially covered with stiff black quills, we took him home in triumph. At this time Bobby's principal characteristic was insatiable hunger. If any one passed near his basket, up he would shoot like a jack-in-the-box, opening a wide red throat, and shouting defiantly for more porridge, even immediately after a hearty meal. Soon he refused to remain during the day in his basket, tumbling out head foremost, and hobbling about the kitchen. When he had acquired the use of his limbs, Bobby followed us about like a dog, and seemed to think his superintendence was necessary whenever any work was going on, for he never failed to see the ostriches fed, the rations given out, or the washing done. Sometimes a sudden thought seemed to strike him, and he would begin whispering confidentially and eagerly what had come into his mind. He loved to go out riding, and would sit on his master's sun-helmet, balancing himself with his great black wings, and reminding one of the raven crest of some ancient Scandinavian warrior. Suddenly he would dart after one of those great gaudy locusts which look like painted toys, and having captured it, return to his place to enjoy the dainty morsel. Every morning Bobby wakened his master by a few gentle pecks, and then departed on his rounds outside. He would perch on the wire fence and begin to practise all the noises he could remember of fowls, donkeys, or dogs, or hold long conversations with himself, of which profane language seemed to constitute the greater part. At meals his curiosity was boundless; he wanted to taste everything, and his gestures and expression told as distinctly his opinions of the different viands as any language could have done. He knew his name, and would come at once when called, and no fear of danger would have prevented him following his master through fire or water.

As Bobby grew older a porridge diet was no longer to his taste, and he began to pick up a dishonest livelihood in the poultry-yard. He would fly to meet us in the morning and perch on our shoulders with an impudent assumption of innocence, quite unconscious that the yellow stickiness of his bill revealed that he had been breakfasting on newly-laid eggs. Then he took to eating the young chickens, and here his talent for mimicry provided him with many a delicate meal; for he could imitate the maternal call of a fowl to perfection. Many a battle was fought by the hens in defence of their deluded offspring; but Bobby nearly always soared off triumphantly with his prey to the top of the windmill, where he could enjoy the fruits of his poaching in security. One day he stole some food that had been mixed with wine for a sick fowl that wanted "picking up." Presently the Kaffir cook, hearing sounds she could not understand, ran out to see what was the matter. There lay Bobby on his back idiotically drunk, his little black feet kicking aimlessly in the air, and his wide open bill emitting the most extraordinary noises that had ever been heard even from his voluble and versatile vocal chords. This episode created a decided taste for stimulants. From that time Bobby haunted the storeroom with even more than his former inquisitive pertinacity, sitting on the top of the cask when the wine was being drawn for meals, bending down and twisting his neck to reach the stream as it flowed into the jug; gradually he learned to turn the tap and help himself, so that great caution was necessary that he should not remain alone in the store, as he never learnt to turn the tap back again. Unfortunately Bobby revelled in mischief, not for the sake of any good which it brought him, but from some inborn "cussedness." He was never so happy as when busily engaged in some work of destruction, and when discovered he would retreat to a safe distance, and if pursued would always manage to keep just out of reach, though not too far for one to see the triumph of enjoyment in his wicked old eye, and to hear his defiant croak as he strutted ahead, looking back triumphantly over his shoulder. It was most provoking on going to the garden to find that the few rows of peas or French beans which had been raised with much trouble were all rooted up to make play for Bobby. The culprit himself would probably be out of sight, for his gardening operations were usually carried on in the early morning; but once he was caught so deeply engrossed in putting the finishing touches to a row of beans which he had pulled up and laid in their places with even more than his usual neatness, that he only looked up in time to see his angry master a few yards off picking up a large stone. In an instant the imp's mind was made up. Instead of attempting flight and probably getting hit by the stone, he impulsively threw himself on his owner's generosity, perched on his shoulder, kissing him rapturously, and at once winning the pardon he so little deserved. Another piece of mischief was carrying off anything bright; such as spoons, or forks, and one day a razor, and dropping them into the well. For this he had to be forbidden the house, and Toto, the collie, learned to turn him out at the instant he appeared inside the doors. Bobby became very jealous of Toto and the other pets, which, less mischievous than himself, were allowed indoors, and he especially delighted in teazing the little suricate. He would come up noiselessly behind, and catching the tip of Ming's tail in his bill, would lift the little fellow off his legs, take him a few feet into the air, and drop him suddenly. Then, after waiting a few minutes until Ming was again off his guard, he would repeat the performance. The suricate—a plucky, independent little person—resented the insult deeply, chattering and scolding vehemently, showing his rows of sharp teeth as he hung helplessly by the tail; but he was powerless against his persecutor, and had to submit to be whisked up unexpectedly as often as his tormentor, by right of superior strength, chose to indulge in this practical joke.

At last, for his numerous offences, Bobby was sentenced to be tied up; a bangle of twisted wire was fastened round one leg, and attached to a long piece of wire outside the window; and there, so long as there were little chickens about the house or tender vegetables in the garden, he had to remain. At first we feared that, with his keen appreciation of freedom and love of independence, Bobby would pine in captivity; but he was somewhat of a philosopher, and resigned himself to circumstances, making the best of his fate. He harboured no resentment; but, with his sweet temper quite unimpaired by reverse of fortune, he would give just as warm and joyful a greeting and caress as lovingly as in brighter days He had a variety of resources at his command to beguile the time, and when not engaged in tearing the plaster off the house or picking the putty out of the window-frames would be found working perseveringly to get free of his bonds. Then, when he had succeeded, as he did several times, devastation in the garden, empty egg-shells in the hen-nests, and sad gaps amongst the rising generation of fowls, showed the good use he could make of his opportunities.

Bobby would have been invaluable to an exhibitor of performing animals. He would lie "dead" flat on his back, with his blue eyelids drawn up over his eyes, remaining motionless for any length of time, waiting for the word of command, when he would scramble to his feet in a great hurry, with a self-satisfied croak at his own cleverness; his solemn way of performing tricks, and the delight he took in "showing off," added much to the amusement he caused. Bobby would hang by his bill from one's finger, which he swallowed to its point of junction with the hand, and, with his wings drooping and his legs hanging down in a limp and helpless manner, looking a most strange and grotesque object, he would allow himself to be carried about anywhere. The sight of a little string of red beads would always throw him into a perfect frenzy of real or pretended fright, and if they were laid across his back, he at once commenced a series of startling antics, jumping and hopping about as if possessed, and screeching as if in agony.

Poor Bobby, like most pets, did not live out the natural term of his existence. It was never known what killed him, but he died in a few hours of paralysis. Whether his unconquerable curiosity led him to eat something poisonous, or whether the enforced sedentary life had undermined his constitution, or the dead snakes and the contents of the mouse-traps disagreed with his digestion, will never now be discovered; but he is still regretted by all who knew him, and lives in the recollection of his owners as the brightest and most comical of all their African pets.

TWO OLD FRIENDS.

THE interchange of expressions of friendship between Mr. Arthur Elliot and Mr. Cyril Flower, which was printed in the Times of Monday, is an interesting series of documents. It is true that Mr. Labouchere, or Mr. Labouchere's paper, thinks Mr. Elliot "came badly out of it," but this is the less surprising that Mr. Elliot in "it" had called Mr. Labouchere, or Mr. Labouchere's amendment, "silly and unpractical." The beginning of the matter seems to have been a little performance of Mr. Flower's of a kind which until recently would certainly have been considered rather curious by English party politicians of the better type, though it is common enough now. Everybody knows that part of the business by which Mr. Parnell's followers gain their daily and dirty bread is to go about the country stumping "at lairge" in Tory or Liberal-Unionist constituencies; and that in this creditable occupation they are often assisted by Gladstonian Radicals of the baser or Conybeare-Stuart-Ellis-Cossham kind. With rare exceptions, however, and until quite recently, the official kind of Gladstonian has kept himself aloof from this kind of privateering, and Mr. Elliot seems to have been all the more surprised at Mr. Flower's going to Kelso "to defend the National League" in that, as he rather unkindly remarks, he "does not remember to have heard or read any other speech of Mr. Flower's." And, indeed, Mr. Flower has not attained such notoriety as he possesses by oratory. On this particular occasion his sense of the base and brutal attacks made upon the National League by "persons like Mr. Arthur Elliot" has stirred him up to go to its rescue at Kelso in Mr. Elliot's constituency. This "Kelso convoy," however, of Mr. Flower's has brought rather heavy fire on him from

Mr. Elliot, who seems to be rather anxious to know what business Mr. Flower had at Kelso, and still more anxious to know why he told the Kelso people several things which appeared to him (Mr. Elliot), and which certainly appear still to some readers of Mr. Flower's defence, to be the things that are not. So Mr. Elliot, not exactly in the most amiable way in the world, administers to "Dear Flower" a series of posers. Did Dear F. say that he (Dear E.) voted against the Labourers' Allotment Bill, against Disestablishment in Wales, and against the reform of the House of Lords? If so, how came Dear F. to say so, when, as a matter of fact, Dear E. did nothing of the kind in any of the three cases? Also, parenthetically, does Dear F. consider Mr. Gladstone a true Liberal? and, if so, will he point out when that great man voted for any of the three measures which Dear F., as reported, says every true Liberal is bound to support? This is poser (and rider) No. 1. Then Mr. Elliot proceeds. If it is necessary for Dear Flower to go to Kelso to defend the National League against the attacks of men like Mr. Arthur Elliot, will he kindly begin by defending it against the attacks of men like Mr. Gladstone and Sir William Harcourt? For he, Mr. Elliot, has never used language about the National League half so strong as these great, these venerated men have used. When Mr. Flower politely remarked that Mr. Elliot "wrote argument after argument in a clever twaddling way about Disestablishment" what did he please to mean? Also, what did he further please to mean when he made the certainly rather vague statement that Mr. Elliot "not only voted in favour of the landlords, but in favour of everything that was base and scandalous"? What, says Mr. Elliot mildly to Dear Flower, "do you mean by such nonsense as this?" After putting which questions Mr. Elliot requests his friend to learn something that may be useful to him as Mr. Gladstone's junior Whip; and adds, again mildly, that of course you cannot expect much independence from a junior Whip; but still "it does seem something like impudence for a person of that kind to taunt Unionists with changing their colours. Our colours," continues he, "are Liberal principles, and not the livery of Mr. Gladstone." So Mr. Elliot, not good-temperedly, no doubt, but with some considerable force.

There is not observable in Mr. Cyril Flower's reply any disposition to answer the interrogatories administered to him. He remarks amiably, but not conclusively, that he and Mr. Elliot "are old friends"; but he omits altogether to give any particular reason for such a singular display of old friendship as the extensive, and indeed, as Mr. Elliot unkindly says, rather nonsensical, charge that his old friend has been voting for "everything base and scandalous." He has further "painfully present to his mind the fact that Mr. Elliot has been engaged" in the mysterious and legerdemainish operation of "identifying himself with the Tory party." He does not attempt to answer the question "Why did you say I voted against a Bill when I voted for it?" except by remarking that "We who represent English constituencies think very little of the Bill in question"—a delightful and memorable excuse. He "does not recollect saying that Mr. Elliot's book was clever" (this is cutting); but he may have said so, as he "wished to be lenient"—which, again, has little to do with the very distinct points to which Mr. Elliot had pinned him. But Mr. Flower is not lenient now. He winds up with a lofty assertion that, "if you are ever a junior Minister [a noble description for a Treasury saute-ruisseau], you will learn that you do not wear the livery of your chief, however distinguished he may be, but the uniform of your Sovereign and your country." This flourish reminds us dimly of the reason which Mrs. Handycock of Peter Simple immortality gave for her adoration of soldiers and sailors; but it sadly misses the point of Mr. Elliot's unkind remark. This point, of course, was that Mr. Flower ought to have worn the uniform of his Sovereign and did wear the livery of his chief. And the flourish has the further disadvantage of letting in Mr. Elliot, who counters heavily. In the first place, he remarks (this time sweetly enough) that Mr. Flower first does not answer his questions; secondly, does not apologize for inaccurate statements, the inaccuracy of which he practically confesses and avoids; and, thirdly, makes new statements of greater inaccuracy which Mr. Elliot proceeds to demolish. In the course of doing this he makes some fresh points, and he ends by taking up Mr. Flower's description of his clothes and suggesting, with some neatness, that a Minister who has worn the uniform of his Sovereign might find a better cause and more suitable allies than the Parnellites.

And this is the correspondence out of which Mr. Elliot, by the testimony of that impartial person Mr. Labouchere, "comes badly." Some doubt may perhaps be felt whether Mr. Elliot was well advised in taking Mr. Cyril Flower for a serious politician; but the member for Roxburghshire may fairly retort, "If I am not to take a Minister who wears the uniform of his Sovereign and his country seriously, what illusions are you going to leave me?" And, to tell the truth, Liberal-Unionists have been so cruelly disillusioned in many ways, and have taken their sufferings so much like men and Britons, that we have not the heart to insist on their surrendering one more cherished fancy. But Mr. Flower himself is a pearl of great price. It has been said by the wicked of a Gladstonian that qua Gladstonian he is bound to be wrong in his facts, fallacious in his arguments, weak in his retorts, baseless in his accusations, and inconsistent with himself in everything except in impudence to his antagonists and subservience to his leader. But nearly always, even if we accept this sweeping indictment, the Gladstonian manages to dress up his little failings in this or that rag of covering, logical or rhetorical, serious or jesting. Mr. Cyril Flower, either because of that lack of practice in public speaking to which Mr. Elliot refers, or of insufficient attention to his part, or of some natural gift or absence of gift, seems to display these attributes of Gladstonianism in their quiddity. Conceive, if it be conceivable, the state of mind of a man who says, "You voted against that Bill," and, on being reminded that his old friend voted, not against it, but for it, rejoins, "Ah, yes! but you know we don't think much of that Bill." The implied argument is remotely allied to the famous "It was a very little one," but quite distinct from it; and we are inclined to think it a much more noble, remote, and inimitable order of fallacy. "Jones, you stole fifty pounds from Smith." "On the contrary, as it happens, I gave Smith fifty pounds." "Ah, that may be, but you know we who represent English constituencies don't think much of Smith." There is no end to the applications of this new argument of Mr. Flower's, which is, we verily believe, that blue dahlia of logicians, a really new fallacy, a kind of paralogism never hit upon before. We recommend it to some new Whately, who might group with it other instances of the same family which are more frequent in the feminine than in the masculine style of reasoning.

Feminine, too (though the late Mr. Carlyle would probably have called it sartorial), is Mr. Flower's horror of a uniform being called a livery; but this is certainly not new. The arrangement was, if we recollect rightly, always called a uniform by the choice spirits to whom Mr. Weller was introduced at Bath. They shared Mr. Flower's disgust as to the brutal term livery. And yet—and yet, you know, Mr. Elliot was right, except that it was scarcely fair to the livery-wearers. All biographers of a useful, maligned, and little known body of men have agreed that a lack of proper spirit or a willingness to perform uncovenanted and degrading offices is not among their attributes. Now, whoever heard of a Gladstonian refusing to eat, not merely cold meat, but much less honourable viands? of his not merely declining to carry not merely a coal-scuttle, but drawing the line at any political behest of his chief's, as something plusquam menial? The thing is unheard of, and impossible. The flower of Mr. Gladstone's following know no such compunction as that which induced Mr. Whiffers to "resign"; though they can readily resign themselves to doing any dirty work for and with the very men whose imprisonment, whose suspension in the House, they voted for and cheered to the echo, and against whom they were ready to entrust Mr. Gladstone—and Mr. Gladstone was ready to be entrusted—with powers which would have been considerable for a despotic sovereign. No, Mr. Elliot; it is not just to the livery.

THE UNIVERSITIES (SCOTLAND) BILL.

THIRTY years ago the Government of Lord Derby introduced and carried a Bill for the reform of the Scottish Universities which effected many and important changes in those institutions. During the period which has elapsed since that date the growing prosperity of the Universities has amply justified the changes then made in their constitution and administration. Experience has, however, shown that in some respects there yet is room for improvements, which may render the Universities still more available for the purposes of the higher education in Scotland. Bills have been introduced within recent years with a view of effecting these improvements; but, like many other Bills, they have fallen victims to that Irish obstruction, which has postponed measures intended to promote the interests of England or of Scotland to the demands of the disorder and sedition of the sister country.

The Bill laid on the table of the House of Lords by Lord Lothian is a renewed attempt to complete the reforms initiated by the Government of 1858; and it is highly appropriate that the work begun by one Conservative Administration should be completed by another. The idea of the legislation of that year and of the present measure is, in a large degree, to state it briefly, that of "popularizing" the management of the Universities. The risk involved in such legislation is that academic interests may be sacrificed to popular ideas, which have not been matured by careful and intelligent consideration of the whole circumstances of the case. There is the additional risk, which one may say attends all Scotch legislation, that English legislators may be induced to accept the statements of interested parties, in Scotland, as the expression of the real opinion of those who alone are able to represent the educated judgment of the country upon questions peculiarly Scotch. The average English member of Parliament is not thoroughly acquainted with Scottish institutions, either legal, educational, or ecclesiastical. There is a wide divergence in Scotland between what may be called popular views upon education, and the convictions of those whose opinion is entitled to the weight due to culture and experience. In drafting the present Bill we are inclined to think too much importance has been attributed to what we may call, without offence, uninstructed popular opinion.

The two main points of the Bill are those clauses which remodel the University Court, and those which provide for the "affiliation" of subordinate seminaries to the Universities. Up to the year 1858 the government of the Universities and their whole administration had been vested in the Senates. The Bill of that year introduced the "University Court" as a Court of Appeal possessing also certain strictly defined administrative powers. That Court was a small body, of which a representative of the Senate, a representative of the University Council, the Rector, and the Rector's Assessor, the Chancellor's Assessor, the Principal, and one or two other officials were members. The "University Council" is the general body of the graduates of the University, who, in the case of the larger Universities of Glasgow and of Edinburgh, are some thousands in number. These graduates are scattered over the face of the whole earth, lawyers, divines, men of business, and predominantly, doctors of medicine. Their connexion with the Universities, after they have left them, is necessarily slight, and the members actually present at the half-yearly meetings of the Council are a very small percentage of the entire constituency, that small percentage, as a rule, consisting of men who, residing at the University seat, are always ready to attend meetings and take part in business. The General Council can, therefore, scarcely be regarded as a fair representation of the opinions of the graduates at large. It is in these Councils, however, that the movement has arisen which has evidently influenced, in a preponderant degree, the policy of the present Bill. That policy appears to be to oust the Senate from its old position, and to entrust the whole Government and management of the University to a Court, in which the popular element shall entirely outweigh the academical, and which shall give full effect to the policy of affiliating to the Universities educational bodies hitherto entirely unconnected with them. In the University of Edinburgh, for example, the Court is to consist of four representatives of the Senate, four representatives of the Council, the Rector, and the Principal, the Rector's Assessor, the Chancellor's Assessor, two Assessors nominated by the Crown, the Lord Provost of Edinburgh, and another representative of the Town Council. Of these sixteen, the only representatives of the University proper will be the four Assessors of the Senate and the Principal. The municipal representatives and the Assessors of the Crown may be appointed on grounds entirely unacademic. The Rector is the choice of the students, and is always selected for political reasons; and, by what appears a very questionable clause of the Bill, it is provided that he shall in future consult the students as to the appointment of his Assessor, so that, in point of fact, the students will have two representatives in the governing body, in which the Senate has only four. But, further, it is provided that, not only shall the head of any college which may be affiliated be a member of the Court, but he shall bring with him such members of the governing body of his college as the Commissioners appointed under the Bill, or, after the expiration of their powers, a Committee of Privy Council, to be called the "Universities Committee," may determine. It is evident from this that by the process of affiliation the influence of the existing Universities may be completely swamped, and the representatives of what are practically rival institutions may have the absolute power of controlling their government. We say rival institutions, because those bodies which are understood to desire affiliation may be classed under two heads, medical corporations and Nonconformist theological colleges. The medical corporations, which at present occupy an entirely subordinate position, and are unable to command the best medical talent, which naturally gravitates to the University chairs, desire to have their lecturers admitted to the same status as the Professors of the Universities, and their course of instruction recognized as qualifying for graduation. The affiliation of such bodies, upon these terms, would have the immediate effect of lowering the value of the medical degree. More might be said for the affiliation of the Nonconformist colleges; as their curriculum is probably equal in educational value to that of the divinity halls of the Universities; but no real advantage to theological science would accrue from their affiliation, unless there were a provision (which the Bill does not contain) that the theological chairs—alike in these colleges and in the Universities—should be emancipated from their denominational connexion. Without this provision their affiliation would simply be the introduction of a sectarian element from which Universities should, of all places, be kept free.

A University Court in which the ancient academic element is practically superseded by this infusion of scientific and sectarian rivalry would, we fear, do little for the highest interests of education. The risk of such an infusion would be materially lessened were it provided—first, that no college or seminary should be affiliated whose endowments and emoluments were not on a par with those of the existing University; and, secondly, that the representation of the Senate in the Court should not, in every case, be limited to four, but should stand in a fair proportion to the whole membership. The Bill, however, contains no such provision.

The powers conferred upon the University Court appear to be too autocratic. The Court is to have practically unlimited powers of administration. It is to be a Court of Appeal, while there is no provision for appeal from its own decisions; it is to hold and administer the whole finances and property of the University; it is to regulate the whole course of study and the rules of graduation; and the professors are to hold office subject to its approval. It is also to dispense, if not the whole, the greater part, of the University patronage. To invest a body the majority of whose members is to be elected by constituencies, sure to be swayed by popular rather than by academic influences, with such powers is, we apprehend, a very hazardous experiment. The maintenance of discipline in the University can hardly be expected to stand the strain of an unrestricted power of revision on the part of this Court, either on appeal from the students who may be the subjects of discipline, or, as the Bill provides, on the initiative of any member of the Court. That large and heterogeneous body will, in the exercise of its patronage, be open to all manner of political, sectarian, and personal influences. We question whether the character of the Scottish professoriate, created by such patronage, will maintain its present high standard, more especially when we consider that in the adjustment of the professorial salaries, in the direction of the course of study, and in the fixing of the terms and tenure of office, as well as in the allotment of pensions, the power of the Court is absolute.

The real want in Scottish education is one which this Bill does not touch. It is the want of a connecting link between the preparatory school and the University. That want may be supplied by some modification of the proposed system of affiliation; but the modification must be the result of a prolonged and careful inquiry, which should be remitted to the University Commissioners. The results of their inquiry may be embodied in a subsequent measure. We hardly think a satisfactory result can be achieved under the present Bill. On other points, on which we have not touched, the provisions of the Bill are satisfactory; and a judiciously selected Commission, with the powers which it confers on them, may effect useful reforms upon the present system of the Universities. We, therefore, trust that the Bill may pass; although, to be thoroughly beneficial, it must be modified in the directions which we have indicated. The Scottish Universities are national institutions; and it is to be hoped that Parliament will give the Bill a candid and intelligent consideration, and not deal with it from a merely party point of view. The interests involved are those of the higher education. These interests, and not the demands of theorists, of rival parties, or of the uninstructed democracy, must govern the issue.

DRAMATIC RECORD.

AFTER a lengthy absence and brilliant theatrical tour through the United States, Mr. Irving has returned to the Lyceum, selecting for his first series of performances Faust. So much has been written concerning this striking production that the subject may well be said to be fairly exhausted, and it will almost suffice for us to record that the drama was restored to the stage on which it was originally acted with all its original perfection of picturesque and artistic detail. It is not our habit to record the applause of spectators; but the enthusiasm which greeted Mr. Irving's reappearance was so exceptional that it may linger long in the memory of the distinguished artist, as demonstrating the great esteem and affectionate regard with which his name is held, as being associated with all that is highest in English dramatic art and literature. There is little else to be said. Perhaps Mr. Irving's Mephistopheles is now acted in a lighter and more sarcastic vein of fiendish humour than heretofore; at any rate, it seemed to us to be, if anything, more spiritual, in the diabolical sense of the word, and therefore truer to the text of Goethe than to that of Mr. Wills. The Margaret of Miss Terry is as before a matchless piece of acting, at once realistic and poetical. Discarding conventionalism even in the matter of costume, the actress succeeds in being upon the stage a very incarnation of Goethe's ideal. The Faust of Mr. Alexander has certainly greatly improved in finish. It is more restful and serious than it was at first, and if it never strikes one as in any way realizing the mysterious character created by Goethe, the fault perhaps after all lies rather with the adapter than with the actor. Needless to say that the scenery and all the accessories belonging to it were as beautifully perfect as before, for Mr. Irving never neglects a detail. At the close of the performance Mr. Irving spoke a few concise words of gratitude for the warmth of his reception and for that, equally hearty, of Miss Terry, and announced his intention of speedily producing Robert Macaire and Mr. Calmour's play, The Amber Heart. There was no mention made of Werner, and we may, therefore, conclude that this wearisome drama will be permitted to rest in peace.

The success of The Pompadour at the Haymarket, contrary to general expectation, is an accomplished fact. That this is partly due to the perfection with which the piece is "mounted" may be the case; but, on the other hand, the drama is decidedly interesting. If we forget its extraordinary distortion of historical facts, and imagine that it deals with the adventures of a Mme. de Pompadour at the Court of a Louis XV., it assumes quite another aspect. The legend then presents many striking situations, and is effective and dramatic, and its dialogue is excellently written. We must also remember that the theatre-going public is possibly not so familiar with the history of the famous mistress of Louis XV. as some people imagine, and that to those whose time is mainly occupied in the conduct of their own private concerns the drama has even an historical interest which the privileged who are intimately acquainted with the works of the brothers De Goncourt, the Vie Privée de Louis XV. and the Chroniques de l'Œil de Bœuf, cannot realize or appreciate. The first two acts are by far the best of the four, and these seem to please the public, judging from their recognition, more than does the conclusion, with the dénouement in which both history and common sense are violated. The scene in which Mme. de Pompadour changes her splendid garments for those of a peasant girl is faulty, but is more than saved by Mrs. Tree's admirable acting. Mrs. Tree, if she is neither the Pompadour of history nor the Pompadour of the authors of this curious play, nevertheless gives a very charming and interesting interpretation of the character. Her singing of a quaint ballad by Mr. Henschel without accompaniment is a master-piece of expression and tunefulness. It would be impossible to sing it better, for she makes no attempt at displaying her agreeable voice or her excellent method, but simply chants dreamily to herself, producing thereby a most pathetic impression. Mr. Beerbohm Tree's Narcisse has, we think, been judiciously modified in certain details since the first night. It was then remarked that his restlessness, combined with the fact that he was engaged in a risky undertaking—that of representing a personage who is never in perfect command of his wits—rendered the part slightly monotonous. Mr. Tree has taken the hint, and thereby has imparted a graver air to the character which, whilst it in no way diminishes its weirdness, adds considerably to its dignity. The incident with the china mandarin is better managed now than originally, and the long monologue is listened to with greater interest and attention. In the last scene, however, we think the concluding climax is not well reached. It is true that, in his curse upon his dying wife, Narcisse has to utter two sentences immediately succeeding each other, which, in a way, create a climax, followed by an anti-climax. He cries out first that he is the incarnation of "outraged France," outraged by the iniquities of the greedy favourite, and then anathematizes her with terrific vehemence as "Empress of Hell." Mr. Tree seems to exhaust himself between these two strong lines, and both consequently fall rather flat. Were it not better to omit either the first or the second, so as to make the speech—a good one in a purely theatrical sense—terser? Of the minor characters, one of the best performances is given by Miss Rose Leclercq, who plays the Queen with great dignity and feeling. Her voice, charged as it is with subdued emotion, is admirably managed. Its tones are full of genuine sadness—elle a les larmes dans la voix. Miss Le Thiere, usually so capable in parts which demand dignity of presence and manner, does not seem at home as Mme. d'Epernay. True, her dress is the reverse of becoming, but even its preposterous hoop and furbelows need not oblige her to answer savagely the sprightly sarcasm of M. de Voltaire. She is altogether too surly. The Voltaire of Mr. Charles Brookfield is a very striking impersonation. If we forget the actual stature of the great philosophe, the resemblance is otherwise perfect. By the way, at Tussaud's Exhibition is a cast taken by Mme. Tussaud herself from the face of Voltaire, which, although little known, is most remarkable, and has been pronounced by competent authorities to be one of the best likenesses of him in existence. The mise-en-scène at the Haymarket is superb. Nothing can be imagined finer than the view from the Terrace at Versailles; it is replete with picturesque charm. The colours chosen for the costumes are perhaps a trifle too dull, and it is a rather curious fact that the famous Pompadour combination of pale blue and pale rose is only introduced as a scenic decoration in Mme. de Pompadour's boudoir.

The departure of M. Coquelin for Lisbon, and thence for America, has deprived the French colony in London of many a delightful evening; but beyond this fact there has been nothing done in the theatrical world worthy of record. Of the half-dozen new pieces produced at various matinées none are likely ever to see the footlights again.

THE BUDGET DISCUSSION.

THE debate on the second reading of the Customs and Inland Revenue Bill established conclusively, what no competent authority seriously disputes, that, even after the Budget proposals are carried into effect, there will be a disparity in the charge under the Death-duties upon real property and upon personal property. But it did not prove that, therefore, the Budget ought to be remodelled. To recast the fiscal system of the country requires long and laborious investigation and much anxious thought, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer this year has not had the leisure because he had to prepare his Conversion scheme. The success of the Conversion proves unquestionably that the time was ripe for it. It has effected a great saving for the taxpayers, and it has enhanced considerably the credit of the country. It was, therefore, the more urgent question of the two, and Mr. Goschen was consequently right in giving it the precedence. Had he attempted at the same time completely to remodel the Death-duties and to equalize the charges upon real and personal property, he would probably have caused much more injury than he would have remedied. It was far more prudent to wait until he has more leisure at his disposal. Even then, if we were prepared to accept Mr. Gladstone's argument we should not be bound to adopt his conclusion. But, as a matter of fact, the argument itself is open to much question. It is obvious that, before we can say whether there is or is not an equalization of the charges upon real and personal property, we must know what proportion to the whole property of the country each of these two kinds bears. Mr. Gladstone attempted this, and, taking as his authority a return presented to Parliament three years ago, he estimated the value of the whole property of the United Kingdom at 9,410,000,000*l.* Realty is set down at 3,778,000,000*l.*, and personalty at 5,632,000,000*l.* Now this return is to a very large extent mere conjecture. The statistics are, no doubt, approximately accurate; but no one would be more ready than the authors themselves to admit that they probably err by hundreds of millions. In the Income-tax returns we have data for estimating the value of the property assessed to the Income-tax; but we have no trustworthy data as to the incomes which are not assessed to that tax. Again, the Probate, Legacy, and Succession duties afford us data for estimating approximately the value of the property subject to those duties; but the very discussion about the Death-duties on which we are commenting shows how much uncertainty there is as to the real incidence of those duties and the value of the property upon which they fall. The truth is that a very large proportion of the accumulated wealth of the country cannot be ascertained at all. Statisticians may guess as to its amount, but they can do nothing more; and, until something like a trustworthy census of the wealth of the country can be taken, we may dispute, but we can form no really accurate opinion as to whether the charges upon realty and personalty are equalized or not. The return on which Mr. Gladstone based so much of his argument, it will be observed, represents the personalty as about seven-twelfths of the whole property of the country, and the realty as about five-twelfths. Mr. Gladstone argues that the whole of the realty is not included, and that realty in actual fact amounts to very nearly half of the whole property of the country. This is certainly contrary to the general impression. It may, of course, be quite true; but the fact that it is contrary to the general impression of those who have paid much attention to the matter is an additional reason for receiving these returns with little confidence. Before the matter can be dealt with satisfactorily it is evidently necessary that we should have some more accurate information as to the proportion borne by personalty and realty severally to the whole wealth of the country.

Turning from the broader question of the incidence of taxation upon realty and personalty to the narrower question of the Death-duties, there can be no question at all that the Death-duties fall much more heavily upon personalty than upon realty. The total yield of those duties in the year 1886-7 was a little over 7½ millions. Of this sum, according to Mr. Gladstone's analysis, somewhat less than 7 millions were yielded by personal property, and only 560,000*l.* by real property. The disparity is somewhat exaggerated. Mr. Gladstone himself admitted subsequently in the debate that he had made a mistake on one point, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer pointed out two other errors in his analysis. But, roughly, the figures may be allowed to stand, as they are not very wide from the truth. Partly, the greater productiveness of the Probate and Legacy duties is due to the fact that a very much larger mass of personal property becomes subject to those duties every year than of realty which becomes subject to Succession-duties; but in a still greater degree it is due to the fact that the Probate and Legacy duties are levied upon the total value of the properties subject to them, while in the case of the Succession-duty only the capitalized value of the life interest of the person inheriting is charged. The Chancellor of the Exchequer a week or two ago stated that the average length of life of persons subject to Succession-duty is about 13½ years, and Mr. Gladstone pointed out, therefore, that, in the case of real property, the value is fully twice 13½ years—in other words, that the Succession-duty is levied only upon half the real value of the property upon which it is assessed. Further, it is to be recollected that the Succession-duty in the case of lineals is at present only 1 per cent., and even under Mr. Goschen's proposals will be raised to but 1½ per cent., while the Probate-duty is 3 per cent. It is true that, when the Budget resolutions come into effect, half the Probate-duty will be handed over to the local authorities and only half retained by the Imperial Exchequer. Still the fact remains that the full 3 per cent. will be paid by property subject to Probate-duty, however the yield of that duty may afterwards be distributed, while realty will only pay 1½ per cent., or just half as much. The result, Mr. Gladstone argues, is, firstly, that the rate of Succession-duty upon real property is only half the rate of Probate-duty upon personal property; and, secondly, that in consequence of the Succession-duty being levied only on the life interest, while the Probate-duty is on the full value, only half the real value of realty is charged. The final result, therefore, is that the charge upon personalty is about four times greater proportionately than that upon realty. And the disparity is still further increased by the fact that those who have to pay Succession-duty are to be allowed in the future eight years within which to pay the tax, while those who have to pay the Probate-duty have to pay it at once. As we pointed out when commenting upon this subject a fortnight ago it is necessary to give a period of grace to the owners of real property, for the reason that a small slice of an estate cannot be sold in order to pay the Succession-duty, whereas personal property can always be rapidly realized. But there can be no dispute, of course, that, confining our attention to the Death-duties alone, there does appear to be a very great disparity in the charges upon realty and personalty.

Sir Michael Hicks-Beach, however, pointed out that it is not fair to confine our attention to the Death-duties alone. In the first place, real property is subject to a special tax which is not levied upon other properties—that is to say, is subject to Land-tax. Half the Land-tax, it is true, has been redeemed; but the interest on the redemption money must be taken into account. At present the Land-tax yields a little over 1,000,000*l.*, and, adding the amount which has been redeemed, real property is subject to a charge for Land-tax, or for the interest on the money by which the Land-tax was redeemed, of about 2,000,000*l.* annually.

It was admitted by Sir Michael Hicks-Beach that under the Death-duties personalty pays about a million and a quarter more than realty; but, if we add the Land-tax to the charges upon realty, we find that the balance is fully redressed. For the reason pointed out above, however, we are not very confident as to figures of this kind. The real proportion borne to the whole wealth of the country by realty and personalty it is impossible to ascertain, and, such being the case, it does not seem to us possible to say what the disparity is in any particular case. All that can be urged with confidence is that under the Death-duties personalty is charged much more heavily than realty; that, on the other hand, real property is subject to a special tax in the form of Land-tax, and that this special tax goes to a considerable extent, at least, to redress the balance as between the two kinds of property. There is one other point which should be borne in mind. It is estimated by the Inland Revenue Commissioners that owners of real property are assessed to the Income-tax at about 20 per cent. more than they receive, while owners of personal property are assessed only on their actual receipts. Here, again, the incidence of taxation falls more heavily upon realty than upon personalty. But it must be confessed that this system of redressing the balance by maintaining inequalities and injustices is by no means satisfactory. It may be that the exceptional charges upon realty and personalty balance one another, and that the final result is a rough kind of justice being done between the two. But, after all, that only goes to strengthen the general conviction that an equalization of the charges upon the two kinds of property ought to be taken in hand as soon as there is time for effecting it cautiously, prudently, and completely. The matter is too intricate and too difficult to be carried at a rush. It must be carefully thought out if we are not to do more harm than good. But that it ought to be done at the earliest convenient opportunity no reasonable person will dispute, and indeed all parties on Monday evening were practically agreed upon that. There is one other point to which we would direct attention, as it increases the difficulty of estimating the comparative values of realty and personalty. It is notorious that a very large portion of the landed property of the country is heavily encumbered. In attempting to estimate the accumulated wealth of the country, it is clear that the debts upon a property, and the property itself, must not both be reckoned. For example, if the owner of an estate worth 20,000*l.* a year has to pay portions to his brothers and sisters, to pay a jointure to his mother, and to pay interest upon mortgages and other debts, the annual interest upon the whole amounting, let us say, to 10,000*l.*, the estate would still be worth only 20,000*l.* a year, not 30,000*l.* Yet, if we entered the owner's interest, upon the one hand, as real property, and the interest of the several encumbrances, on the other, as personal property, the whole would rank as worth 30,000*l.* a year. It seems clear to us that Mr. Gladstone did not make sufficient allowance for the encumbrances upon real property, and that his figures would be greatly modified had he done so. In any event, it is clearly necessary, if we would arrive at some certainty as to the incidence of taxation upon real and personal property, to ascertain more fully than is now known the amount of the charges of all kinds upon real property. The discussion on Thursday evening calls for little comment. It was but an elaboration of arguments with which we have already dealt. Before it began the Chancellor of the Exchequer announced that on Monday he will propose to raise the minimum weight of carts to be taxed and to lower the rate of taxation, so that the yield of the tax will be reduced 100,000*l.* As for the debate itself, it was inevitable that the taunt should be repeated that the Budget benefits only the rich, and that it should be moved to lower the taxes on the poor. But the contention was triumphantly refuted by Mr. Goschen's statement that between 1876 and 1887 the taxes paid by the poor had been reduced two millions, while those paid by the rich had been increased twelve millions. The disposable surplus being small, Income-tax payers have a prior claim to relief—firstly, because the Income-tax was raised to meet an emergency, and ought to be lowered now that the emergency has passed; and, secondly, because it presses more heavily on struggling classes than the Tea or any other duty. Just as little ground was there for the opposition to the tax of five shillings a dozen on bottled wine, though Mr. Gladstone gave his authority to the argument that it is protective in tendency. There is no fairer tax than one on a luxury like bottled wine. And it is surely equitable that dear wine should be taxed more highly than cheap wine. As for the fear that the tax will strengthen Protectionism in France, unfortunately Protectionism all over the world gains strength, whatever we do. In any case we cannot regulate our action by the movement of foreign opinioh.

MR. MANNS'S BENEFIT AT THE CRYSTAL PALACE.

ON Saturday the 21st this series of concerts at the Crystal Palace ended with Mr. Manns's benefit. The selection, as is usual on these occasions, was somewhat long and miscellaneous, and included a good many solos, both vocal and instrumental. Two important classic compositions for the orchestra, Beethoven's Overture Coriolan and Mendelssohn's Scotch Symphony, stood one at the beginning and the other at the end of the programme. Both these are played well at the Palace, and the Scotch Symphony, indeed, is one of the chefs-d'œuvre of Mr. Manns's orchestra. It came appropriately enough then on this occasion, though it must be confessed that before it arrived the audience, and possibly the performers, were somewhat exhausted. The Overture, however, was not heard under such conditions, and the performance was as fine as could be wished. The huge strides with which it appears to enter on sonorous chords and unisons were firmly and nervously planted. The Overture is severe and contains but few beauties of a luscious sort; the wood wind is not often employed in producing warbling passages or soft and rich varieties of colour, but the strings have fierce and furious passages, which were given with a splendid effect of nervous impatience. The Scotch Symphony was excellently phrased, and all the points were made with judgment, yet the playing was scarcely as enthusiastic as on the last occasion of its performance. The "Scherzo," one of the most charming things in music, was the least animated in proportion of all the movements. At the sublime wind-up of the "Finale," however, the orchestra, tired as they must have been, rose to the height of the occasion, and worked with tremendous energy and a perfect ensemble of intention. Another work of that original young composer Mr. Hamish MacCunn was played for the first time at the Crystal Palace. Like "Lord Ullin's Daughter," it is a setting for orchestra of a Scotch ballad, "The Ship o' the Fiend," and it is full of the same wild and picturesque instrumental effects. We cannot help thinking, however, that this new piece is more refined and reticent than its predecessor. The instrumentation is full of beautiful points, of rapid changes of colour, of quiet and stormy passages artistically bound together. The effects are congruous, however surprising, and one accepts them as they come without hesitation. Heavy artillery, such as the big drum and the trombones, is most aptly employed. Some of the agitated rushes on the violins and the subterraneous booming of the lower strings which precede and follow the storm are as picturesque as anything by an English musician. Slavonian Dances (Nos. 1, 2, and 3 of the third suite), by Mr. Dvorák, completes the list of purely orchestral numbers.

Mr. Ernest Gillet made a first appearance in Mr. Manns's Paraphrase for Cello and Orchestra of Strings on Hartel's "Abendständchen." The setting has been tastefully done; a passage of pizzicato accompaniment is highly effective, and, generally speaking, the simplicity of the thing enabled one to feel the fine richness of the strings. The soloist produced a good tone and played with considerable smoothness. He was afterwards heard in a Nocturne by Chopin and a Spinnlied by Popper. Both pieces produced the effect of educated vulgarity; only in Popper's the vulgarity is inherent, whereas in Chopin's it is perhaps imported by the change from piano to violoncello. Herr Hans Wessely, of whom we spoke in describing a late concert, made a second appearance in Vieuxtemps's "Ballad and Polonaise" for violin. The vocalists were three in number. First Mme. Carlotta Recoschéwicz made her début in this country in Meyerbeer's "Ach, mein Sohn" from Le Prophète, and in two songs, "Es war ein Traum" (Lassen) and "Frühlingslied" (J. Peiser). Her low notes are very fine and without that greasy fatness which spoils so many contraltos. She has dramatic feeling for recitative, which she sings better than flowing melody in which equality of voice and a continuous song are necessary. Miss Nikita (as we cannot follow her example and deprive her of any title) met with a most enthusiastic reception at her first appearance at the Crystal Palace. Certainly her charming voice and spontaneous and delicate style richly deserved applause, and she is quite artist enough to please without certain mannerisms and affectations in which she indulges. She gave Mozart's "Deh vieni" from the Nozze di Figaro, the "Jewel Song" from Gounod's Faust, and the "Last Rose of Summer" in response to a recall. The habit of plucking a rose to pieces, natural as it may be on the stage, becomes rather ridiculous with a background of sober, bald-headed musicians. Not the least interesting feature of the concert was the reappearance of the celebrated Herr Carl Formes, who charmed our forefathers with his tremendous "basso profundo." He sang Mozart's "In diesen heil'gen Hallen" from Zauberflöte, and "Piff Paff" from the Huguenots. One can only regret not having heard him in his youth; he must have been astounding. Even now his low notes are good and the volume of his voice unimpaired. By way of an "encore" he gave the well-known "Mill-wheel"—a song, we believe, of his own composition—and accompanied himself on the piano.

We cannot take leave of this series of concerts without congratulating every one concerned in their success. There have been moments when the performers surpassed themselves as in the Schubert concert, important works have been heard for the first time, and others have been disinterred from oblivion. As to the way in which they have been interpreted, we need only say that it would be difficult to beat this orchestra in an all-round contest. Mr. Manns is a most intelligent conductor, with a wide sympathy in art and a perseverance that always leads to improvement. Of course every orchestra has its special qualities and its favourite composers. This one may show a certain want of briskness and point in some few pieces; but it is remarkable, on the whole, for the breadth of its interpretations, the fine volume of its strings, and the excellent quality of its wind instruments. As to the principals of the various departments, we are paying them no undeserved compliment when we say that they have co-operated greatly in the success of the season by a thorough proficiency, especially noticeable when their instruments came into prominence in solo parts.

OUT-HARCOURTING HIMSELF.

TO persons who are disposed to take politics too seriously, the presence of Sir William Harcourt in the House of Commons is a precious boon. He is amusing even when he tries to be so—a result which does not always follow the effort. Sometimes his speeches illustrate the remark that a man may lose the wit which is natural to him by striving to show more wit than he possesses. But, on the whole, even Sir William Harcourt's most painstaking endeavours to be funny are attended with more success than might be expected. Perhaps his greatest achievements, however, as a jester are accomplished when he assumes to be prodigiously in earnest. Sir William Harcourt as a political moralist, as a constitutional authority, as the guardian of consistency and character in statesmanship, is more entertaining than he is when he frankly lays himself out to win the laughter of the House of Commons by jokes and gambols which recall the clown in the ring. Any one who examines the sentences in the reports of his speeches which are followed by the parenthetical word "Laughter" will find that that explosion of mirth is often evoked by his gravest expositions of moral and constitutional principles. Sir William Harcourt is backed by a sturdy phalanx of laughers and cheerers. Occasionally, when his jocosity goes beyond decorous limits, it creates a little uneasiness; but, on the whole, his friends are true to him, and may say, as the poet of the New Whig Guide said of a Parliamentary authority in his day not less important than Sir William Harcourt is now:—

> As rhetorical graces
> We truisms cheered, and extolled commonplaces,
> Washed over with praise every folly and flaw,
> And smiled at his jokes and looked grave at his law.
> Could friendship do more while indifferent folks
> All smiled at his law and looked grave at his jokes?

Sir William Harcourt has out-Harcourted himself in his sayings and doings during the present week. He probably would reckon the grave lecture which he read to Lord Hartington on Monday evening as his most brilliant performance. If the sublime may occasionally lapse into the ridiculous, the ridiculous occasionally raises itself into the sublime. Sir William Harcourt, taxing Lord Hartington with political inconsistency, and with a defective sense of that personal honour which binds a man to make common cause with his colleagues, is an astonishing spectacle. Lord Hartington is charged with inconsistency in opposing Mr. Gladstone's resolution for equalizing the Death-duties on real and personal property, while he had supported Mr. Childers's proposal to a similar effect in 1885. He ingenuously confessed that, being occupied with important official duties in that year—a year of difficulties of every kind and in every quarter of the globe—he had found it impossible to pay the close attention to the details of the Budget which, as a responsible Minister of the Crown, he ought doubtless to have given, and that he had placed his financial conscience where he should not now be disposed to place it, or any other conscience - absolutely in the hands of Mr. Gladstone. This, we must admit, was rather hard upon Mr. Gladstone. He has enough to do as the keeper of his own conscience, and to give him a vicarious responsibility for that of any other person is cruelly to overweight him. Lord Hartington added that, so far as his recollection went, there was not absolute unanimity in the Cabinet with respect to every one of the financial proposals of 1885. The statement may have been technically improper; but assertions of this kind are habitually made. More than one of the colleagues of the late Mr. Forster, acting on the maxim that the dead are always in the wrong, have declared that they decline to hold themselves responsible for his administration of Ireland. Even Mr. Gladstone has shown an eager precipitancy to disconnect himself with measures for which he was not only theoretically answerable, but which there is reason to believe were taken sometimes at his instance, and in every case with his full knowledge. He has publicly referred, in a manner compared with which Lord Hartington's indiscretion is trivial, to Lord Hartington's attitude in the Cabinet upon Irish questions; and Lord Hartington himself, with much more reason, addressed to him a remonstrance similar to that which he has now received from Sir William Harcourt. These casual allusions are almost unavoidable, and it is absurd to make much of them. Sir William Harcourt, however, seized his opportunity to exhibit himself as the Puritan of politics, and to vindicate the doctrine of collective Ministerial responsibility which he censured Lord Hartington for violating and disparaging. The doctrine of collective Ministerial responsibility does not by any means imply that there is absolute unanimity in the Cabinet on any question. It involves the opposite fact, that there are differences which are waived for the purpose of common action; and to assert that such differences existed with regard to a particular scheme is only to say what every one must know to be the fact. The rule that disclosures of what may have taken place in the Cabinet cannot properly be made without the direct permission of the Sovereign is extravagantly stretched when it is made to cover a statement so general as that which Sir William Harcourt reproved in Lord Hartington.

The reproach which Lord Hartington is disposed to make with respect to himself is not that which Sir William Harcourt addressed to him. In his speech at the Mansion House the other day, after receiving the freedom of the City, Lord Hartington said that he had so strong a sense of the necessity of common action in the members of a party, and especially of a Cabinet, that he had on several occasions waived his individual opinion for the sake of Ministerial union. Sir William Harcourt accused Lord Hartington of reviving the tactics of George III., "who endeavoured to set up a number of separate individuals without any common responsibility for the government of the country." There is something to be said even for George III., in whose days the Whig party was in danger of substituting the ascendency of an organized oligarchical faction for the Constitution as it was then understood. The system of George III. was not, however, invented by him. George II. carried matters to even greater lengths. "His Majesty," Henry Fox wrote to the elder Pitt, "in a most determined manner gave a negative to the lead of the House. He will have no leader there. What he expects and requires is that his servants shall act in concert and with spirit in their respective departments, and not quarrel among themselves." George II. practically attained this end by sending down Sir Thomas Robinson, an ancestor, we believe, of the present Lord Ripon, and the "jack-boot" of the Duke of Newcastle, to sit in the seat of the leader. Pitt described the working of this arrangement in his well-known speech in 1756 on the Hanoverian supplies:—"I don't call this an administration; it is so unsteady; one is the head of the Treasury, one Chancellor, one head of the Navy; one great person of the Army; yet this is an administration. Says one: 'I am not General; the Treasury says I am not Admiral, the Admiralty says I am not Minister.' From such an assemblage of separate and distinct powers a nullity results. One, two, three, four, five lords meet; if they cannot come, we will meet again on Saturday; oh, but says one of them, 'I am to go out of town.'" This is the state of things which Sir William Harcourt charges Lord Hartington, in violation of all the principles of the Constitution and of the Cavendishes, with endeavouring to bring back. It was bad enough, but the danger which exists now is not of separate action on the part of Ministers and of servile dependence upon the Crown, out of a slavish submission of conscience and intelligence to the dictates of a single statesman who imposes an obsequious silence and calls it unanimity.

STAGE SCIENCE.

V.

WHEN the dramatic student has acquired a thorough knowledge of pantomime he has still three other important stage arts to acquire—the vocal, the elocutionary, and, lastly, what is popularly termed the art of "making-up." In this country not much importance has hitherto been attached to the study of the voice for the purpose of public speaking, and it may be due to this neglect that so few of our members of Parliament and even our lecturers are distinguished as orators, whereas it is quite the contrary in America, where in most of the more important colleges elocution is invariably taught, possibly because almost every young American is expected to develop into a politician. When a foreigner visits our Houses of Parliament he is immediately struck by the great contradiction which exists between the excellent matter of the speeches and the general badness of their delivery. It is not given to everybody to possess a fine singing voice, although the Anglo-Saxon race is usually gifted with an agreeable speaking voice; but, as it is one of our national habits to subdue it as much as possible in ordinary conversation, when an Englishman is elected to Parliament or to any other public office where he is obliged to use his voice in a large space, he finds himself more often than not in an exceedingly embarrassing position. He has all the ideas, but he interrupts their delivery by hawing and stuttering, and from his ignorance of how to strengthen the volume of his voice, he is more frequently than not quite inaudible, and what is more remarkable, this is the case with some of our most distinguished statesmen, politicians, and lecturers, whose speeches can scarcely be heard. This is sometimes the case, too, with our actors and actresses. Some have the habit of speaking in a high head register, which gives the voice a shrill and, to use the Italian phrase, "an unamiable quality." Others lower their tones at the end of a speech, so that they are nearly inaudible; while others, in moments of passion, by the indistinct swiftness of their utterance appear to be gabbling in an unknown tongue. These defects are scarcely ever found in foreigners, and especially among actors; for the simple reason that the earliest object of their histrionic education is the acquisition of a knowledge of vocal art.

Although the art of training the voice for the speaking stage only is in a certain measure distinct from that of cultivating it for the lyric profession, both are fundamentally identical. The former is, however, of course much less elaborate than the latter. The illustrious Pietro Romani, who died some fifteen years ago at Florence, aged eighty-four years, was widely acknowledged to be almost the last teacher of singing who possessed the traditions of the great vocal art imparted to him by his master, Cherubini, who had acquired it from Porpora, and through him from a long line of teachers stretching back through the epochs of the Renaissance, the middle ages, to those lovers of vocal music, the Romans, who, according to Fétis, inherited their knowledge of the art of singing from the Greeks, Egyptians, and Hebrews. Romani began to teach his pupils by what he called "breathing" lessons, whereby he made them expand their lungs so as to strengthen them, and at the same time acquire the habit of retaining sufficient breath to finish a long sentence or cadenza without interrupting it. Once he had ascertained the register of the voice, whether it was bass, baritone, or tenor, soprano, mezzo-soprano, or contralto, he immediately obliged his pupil to promise him on his honour not to attempt to force a single note above or below his natural register. This art of breathing is one of the first taught in the great Conservatoires of Europe. The pupil takes a looking-glass and stands before it, throws back his chest, puts his feet together in a straight line, and begins to fill his lungs gradually with air, keeping the mouth wide open, with a smiling expression. When the lungs are full, he beats with his fingers generally from three up to about fifty strokes before he allows the breath to escape very slowly from the open mouth without closing the mouth at all. These exercises, repeated for about a quarter of an hour three or four times a day, unquestionably benefit the health and imperceptibly but rapidly increase the volume of sound emitted. In about two months the pupil begins to add to these breathing exercises others, in which he draws his breath in the same manner, but pronounces each of the vowels at first very piano, and increasing gradually by degrees to fortissimo—almost to a shout. Singers, of course, replace these simple sounds by solfeggi and other vocalizes. The great teachers of the past kept their pupils at least two years in the mechanical part of their education, and did not entrust them with recitatives or songs until their voice was what is technically termed properly "placed" and thoroughly exercised. Here it may be observed that in the recently published Memoirs of Samson, the great French actor and dramatic teacher, he states that he always, before teaching a pupil to act, obtained the advice of a competent singing-master, so as to enable him to determine what was the real register of the student's natural voice, just as if he were preparing for the lyric stage. "Mlle. Rachel," said he, "who was my most illustrious pupil, possessed, had she chosen to study as a singer, a fine contralto voice, and I never permitted her to speak out of her natural register." In point of fact, M. Samson treated the speaking voice exactly as if it had been the singing. He taught his pupils to speak from the chest, just as Romani taught his pupils to sing from the chest; and he deemed that no pupil was perfect who had not so completely mastered the art of breathing that he could sing as loudly as possible the most elaborate air with a candle burning within two inches of his mouth without its flickering in the least degree. This rather singular exercise demonstrates infallibly to the vocalist that his voice is properly "placed," and that he is not wasting any of his breath.

The next point is clearness of pronunciation. It is not necessary to bawl on the stage, just as it is not necessary for a singer to scream or shout, however large may be the theatre. Many will remember the extraordinary impression said to have been made by Mrs. Siddons in the sleep-walk scene in Macbeth, wherein, we are assured, her slightest whisper was heard in every part of the vast auditorium of Drury Lane Theatre. This accomplishment was not peculiar to Mrs. Siddons. Anybody whose voice is well trained can easily acquire it, and those great actors and actresses who have seriously studied their art have completely mastered it; for Mme. Ristori produced exactly the same effect in her version of the same scene, and Mme. Sarah Bernhardt's slightest whisper can be heard all over Her Majesty's Theatre. Again, the writer remembers on one occasion Mlle. Titiens, when in New York, laying a wager one morning at rehearsal that she would speak in a whisper on the stage, and yet be heard by a person placed at the back of the gallery of the immense Academy of Music, and she won it. She simply spoke, obeying the same rules as Mme. Adelina Patti when that lady sings a bocca stretta "Home, sweet Home." There are several fixed rules—we might almost call them tricks—for the production of vocal sounds on the stage, the acquisition of which is invaluable to the artist. The abrupt force, for instance, as it is technically called, which distinguishes Mme. Sarah Bernhardt above all other living actresses, and which consists of an exceedingly rapid, yet distinct, utterance of the words of her most passionate speeches, beginning in a very low tone with extraordinary swiftness, and ending the phrase with a loud and vibrating climax, which gives an impression of intensity and power well calculated to startle the audience and rouse the greatest enthusiasm, is only an acquired art—a trick—and simply the result of hard practice. She herself has said that her quarrel-scene in Frou-Frou took her many months to learn. Her method is to first read the speech as she would like to eventually speak it on the stage, but in an undertone, as slowly as possible, pronouncing each word with a long breath drawn before and after it. This exercise she by degrees increases in rapidity until she has almost insensibly the habit of pronouncing the sentence with what appears to the spectator to be a perfect whirlwind of inspired passion. Referring once more to singing, it may be observed that, if an actor or actress has even a small voice, it can always be turned to advantage in their profession, and, if cultivated to a certain degree in the good old school, they will always be able to increase their value by singing properly and with effect the incidental ballads which are occasionally introduced into modern plays. Those who have seen Miss Geneviève Ward in Forget-Me-Not will not easily forget how that once excellent prima donna, Mme. Guerrabella, made her entrée after singing an elaborate operatic cadenza in the wings. It gave a tone to the entire impersonation, and showed at once that the adventuress, Stephanie de Mohrivart, was an exceptionally accomplished woman. Even a knowledge of the pianoforte and of other musical instruments should not be overlooked by the sincere dramatic student; for nothing pleases an audience more than to see the hero or heroine of a play perform upon the piano or the violin, if it be necessary in the piece. In this necessarily brief space we cannot now enter into fuller details concerning the importance of vocal training. All we can do for the moment is to point out how sadly it has been neglected by our actors and actresses, who seem to be under the impression that they have only to learn their words by heart and bound upon the stage full-blown celebrities, forgetting that the histrionic, like any other art, has to be thoroughly studied in all its manifold aspects, if lasting fame and fortune are to be obtained by its professors.

EXHIBITIONS.

BOTH the great water-colour shows are open; that in Piccadilly and that in Pall Mall, and it must be confessed that both are tiring, though in different ways. The bulk of large exhibitions must be commonplace. In the Royal Institute you are bored by commonplace truths; in the Royal Society by commonplace untruths. The Institute maintains a higher general level of workmanship, but, perhaps in consequence, no pictures stand out so conspicuously as one or two at the Society. The show at the Institute, which has averaged a thousand in past years, is as usual much the larger of the two, but the other exhibition is big enough. In the present state of things huge promiscuous gatherings like the Academy and the Institute may be unavoidable; but, as exhibitions by coteries and by single men grow in favour, their tediousness becomes more apparent. The confused and exhausted condition in which one leaves these closely packed jumbles of style and no-style, of high tone and low tone, of warm and cold, large and small, figure and landscape, real and ideal, coarse and delicate, contrasts unfavourably with the easy interest one derives from an artistic ensemble, such as Mr. Menpes's show, or such a single-minded collection as that of the New English Art Club.

The Royal Society, as a whole, is behind the taste of the age, and so, from lack of sympathy with its aims, one is apt to be unjust to individual members. Seen alone, many of these pictures might please by their neat and elaborate conventionality; seen in numbers, a vapour of falseness, triviality, and decayed mannerism seems to rise from them. Outside of the Society a great advance in realism has been going on for many years, and, since a shorter time, new ideas of what is decorative have begun to prevail. Would the arrangements and schemes of colour that we see in a general view of these walls be acceptable in rugs, carpets, or decoration to a person of taste? We think not; and yet upon examination it will be found that, in too many cases, these pictures are not unpleasing by force of being grimly real. Bright, shallow, unaerial colouring, false tone, flimsy construction, and purely fanciful effects, repel the person who would seek to associate them with memories and sentiments of nature. Again, many men that have some claim to sincerity compromise their main intention by an inartistic style and a niggling workmanship. Their use of material is at cross purposes with their object; it hinders rather than helps their explanation; it will not allow them to convey any unity of impression, or to adjust various facts in their relative importance to the scene. Mr. C. Gregory, in "A Quiet Evening" (147), gives us true tones; but, to make these effective, we should also require some art in the composition and in the definition of the forms according to their relative submergence in the ensemble of tone. As it is, Mr. Gregory's truth becomes false, and his picture as incongruous as plaintive words set to a jig. Not to have donned the mere technical uniform of the day is no reproach to any artist, or any set of artists. We can make no comparison between the two men whose work unquestionably stands out pre-eminent in this Gallery. Sir John Gilbert is of the old school, Mr. Arthur Melville of the most modern, and very strange he looks in the Royal Society. Sir John Gilbert's "After the Battle" (126) is a most noble piece of romantic idealism, a grand subject, treated with great fertility of invention. The stringy handling entirely disappears at the right distance, and the general effect becomes truly magnificent. Mr. Melville's more realistic sketches shine by the brilliant cleverness and beauty of their broad and captivating style. In the "Snake Charmers" (163) and "Waiting an audience with the Pasha" (199), whatever we may think of his subjects, his feeling, his view of things, we at least recognize that Mr. Melville has done all that art can do to bring them home to us with effect. Here is no uncertainty in treatment, no undue importance of unessential details, no interference of unintentional forms, no haphazard handling, making patterns at cross purposes with the sentiment. You see just what the artist wanted you to see, and he has nowhere been forced by clumsiness or ignorance to show you anything that might weaken his main effect. Good sound realism may be seen in Mr. H. Moore's strong and sincere "Freshwater Bay" (262), Mr. Thorne Waite's scheme of chalk and blue "Beachy Head" (266), Mr. P. J. Naftel's graceful "Autumn" (219), and several bold sketches by Mr. R. W. Allan. Mr. Eyre Walker and Miss Clara Montalba attain a certain breadth; Mr. A. Goodwin is telling and striking in the colour scheme and arrangement of "Lincoln" (143); Mr. A. W. Hunt shows a charming feeling and a broader handling than usual in "A 'Wind of the Eastern Sea'" (36), and Messrs. M. Hale, T. J. Watson, A. Glennie, G. A. Fripp, G. P. Boyce, send agreeable work. Of two comic subject-pictures, "Married" (211) by Mr. J. H. Henshall and "Shakespeare or Bacon" (274) by Mr.

A. E. Emslie, the latter is much the finer in technique, though both are highly amusing.

There is much more of thorough realism, much more of sound technique at the Institute; but its effect is a good deal lost by numbers and the multiplication of commonplace. Moreover, water-colours are generally too delicate and too small to stand exhibition by the thousand. Nothing startles, nothing attracts one specially in the Institute. In fact, it would be difficult to seize on any general features of the show, and yet it contains many more accomplished works than can be remarked on in detail. Figure is less cultivated and less successfully than landscape, and yet several good styles may be seen. The best of Sir James Linton's contributions to the list of portraits or single figures is his "Sacharissa" (23), in the first gallery. The blue and orange stuffs wrapt in a full mellow solvent of atmosphere make fine harmonious colouring, and the workmanship is fine and precious, unexceptionable indeed, if only it had less of the tame "reproduced" air of a copy by the Arundel Society. Mr. E. J. Gregory's portrait of himself, "Study of Costume" (351), shows a delicate manipulation, perhaps still more exquisite than the President's, and incomparably freer and more captivating. Mr. Hubert Vos's portrait of a shoeblack, "A Brother of the Brush" (166), belongs to a different category. It is large, if not of life-size, and is modelled excellently and in the modern atmospheric Whistlerian fashion. By far the greater number of the figure painters rely rather on character of form, expression of face, incident, and story for their interest and their merit than on truth of effect, artistic grouping, or pictorial arrangement. Some of them achieve excellence in their way and on their own lines; thus it would be difficult to find a more lively illustration of a scrimmage than Mr. Thomas Gray's "Sortie" (124). Though the light and shadow is far from logical or convincing, the lines giving the expressions and gestures are full of life and the character of action. On the other hand, "The Delicate Question—which" (392), by Miss Gertrude Demain Hammond, is a fair example of the sort of picture which has been treated for the whole scene for figures and environment, and for arrangements of pleasant colours and accessories rather than for character and drawing. Mr. W. Hatherell's "Quarterdeck of a P. and O. Steamer" (231) aims at a clever atmospheric rendering of the confusion of many figures at different distances and among natural surroundings. Though each separate figure is both full of character and elegantly painted, the general aspect suffers because the confusion does not arrange itself in its right planes and values without trouble to the mind and eye. Amongst the landscapes are several imaginative and poetic effects, such as Mr. Severn's large "Mussel Gatherers" (89), with its striking silhouettes of figures and horses against a threatening sky; Mr. J. R. Wells's romantic "Treasure Galleon" (111), ploughing through a heaving sea under a fine evening effect; and Mr. Keeley Halswelle's robust "On the Greta, Yorkshire" (734), a picture remarkably free from his tight and uncomfortable-looking manner. Mr. J. Knight's "Weeding" (50) and Mr. Claude Hayes's "On the Common" (740) make most satisfactory spots of rich low-toned tranquillity on the walls, though the latter may be a little confused in its structure. Mr. Ayrest Ingram's "Falmouth Harbour" (93) and Mr. Caffieri's "Old Harbour, Walberswick," are bathed in an excellent unity of effect by the true grey of atmosphere. Another group of painters with a broad fixed convention is well represented by Mr. T. Collier's "Under a Welsh Crag" (484) and Mr. Wimperis's "Sauchy Moor, near Brockenhurst" (574). Together with one or two others, Mr. J. White in "Early Blossom" (470), Mr. Alfred Parsons in "Autumn Morning" (8), Mr. Parton in "The Lily Pool," and Mr. Yeend King in "Through Meadows Green" (899), obtain a good effect from strong vivid greens and firm drawing. Evening effects on village scenes are rendered with feeling and art by Mr. J. S. Hill in his mellow "Barns" (719), by Mr. Leopold Rivers in a pleasant arrangement of blue and grey, "The Old Fiddler" (718), and by Mr. Peter Ghent in a broad composition treating light and shadow on white walls, "Sunny Afternoon in a Welsh Village" (830). Very good work comes from Messrs. Rupert Stevens, Wilfred Ball, E. Bucknall, O. Rickatson, and a great many more than we can mention.

RACING.

THE day after the City and Suburban Handicap, which we noticed in our last article on racing, the Esher Stakes brought out nine horses and produced a fine race, at Sandown. Lord Ellesmere's rather jadish mare Cataract, who had achieved the feat of losing fifteen races successively in two years, now won the 721*l.* by a head from the three-year-old filly, Abeyance, who had 12 lbs. the worst of the weights, at weight for age. General Owen Williams's filly by Silvester, out of Violetta, won the Sandown Park Two-Year-Old Stakes of 516*l.* by a neck, and on the following day she won the Walton Two-Year-Old Stakes of 1,000*l.* by a head, and was bought in for 610 guineas, a price at which a filly that could win races of this kind ought not to be dear. The preceding race was the Mammoth Hunter's Steeplechase of 2,000*l.*, and its result proved the truth of the well-known racing motto "Blood will tell"; for the winner, Mr. J. G. Muir's bay gelding Coronet, who is said to have been purchased as a hunter, could scarcely have been better bred, as he was directly descended from Birdcatcher on his sire's side, and from Touchstone on his dam's. The children of Trappist won two successive races over five furlongs at Sandown on the Saturday, and it may be that, like their sire, they will show great speed over short courses.

At the Newmarket Craven Meeting the young nobleman who races under the name of "Mr. E. Wardour" won two races with his two-year-old Present Alms, a colt that was bought last year at the sale of the Whimple yearlings for 400 guineas. Lord Randolph Churchill at last won a race of some importance in the Fitzwilliam Plate of 700*l.* His two-year-old colt by Retreat, out of White Lily, which he had purchased for 500 guineas at the sale of Lord Bradford's yearlings, now admirably ridden by Tom Cannon, won by a neck; while the second, third, and fourth in the race were only separated by heads. This is not the first race that Lord Randolph has won this spring; and, as the good-looking White Lily colt seemed rather backward, it is unlikely to be the last. The Crawfurd Plate was won by the Duke of Montrose's Dazzle, who started only eighth favourite out of a field of thirteen, at 12 to 1. For the Biennial, Lord Zetland's Caerlaverock was made favourite, although it was generally thought that he scarcely looked fit; he ran wretchedly, so much so indeed that some good judges consider his performance too bad to be trusted, for he was the last in the race, which was won by General Pearson's black colt Anarch, who has laid on a good deal of muscle since last season. He won pretty easily from Van Dieman's Land, a colt by Robert the Devil, and a winner of three good races last season. This colt had also been beaten by Anarch as a two-year-old. The Duke of Portland's Ayrshire, the second favourite for the Derby, came out for the Riddlesworth Stakes, for which he was only opposed by the Duke of Hamilton's Disappointment, a filly that had been beaten by Ayrshire twice last year, and had since then become a roarer. The long odds of 8 to 1 were laid on Ayrshire, and the race was a mere farce. Critics were divided in opinion as to whether Ayrshire had improved much in appearance since last season, and it is but fair to say that some were disappointed with him. On the Wednesday, Mr. J. Lowther won the Babraham Plate with King Monmouth, who started first favourite. He is not a very satisfactory horse to back, as he is not always to be trusted; but he can do great things when in the humour. His victory on this occasion was a very popular one. Backers met with a terrible reverse of fortune in a Two-year-old Plate, which was won by Sir M. FitzGerald's Cecil, a very small filly, by Bend Or out of Garterless. Odds of nearly 3 to 1 were laid freely on Pantomime, while 20 to 1 was laid against the winner. At the sale of Mr. Barnard's horses in training there was some very spirited bidding for the three-year-old Noble Chieftain, who realized 3,000 guineas, in the face of the fact that his public form had been far from first-rate.

The Craven Stakes, although it was only worth 586*l.*—a mere nothing in these times—excited more interest than any other race of the meeting, for it served as a public trial for the Duke of Westminster's colt, Orbit. His form of last season had been considered good enough to entitle him to stand at about 10 to 1 for both the Two Thousand and the Derby; but fault was found with his flat sides and badly-shaped neck. Eight horses opposed him, among them being Anarch, who had shown himself to be in form by winning the Biennial on the Tuesday, and Lord Londonderry's Hazlehatch, a colt that had cost 1,750 guineas as a yearling, and had last season won two victories worth 2,204*l.*, besides running second to Friar's Balsam for the Middle Park Plate. Both of these colts were giving Orbit 5 lbs. The race came off over the Ancaster Mile, which, as everybody knows, is very unlike the Rowley Mile over which the Two Thousand is run, as it is the last mile of the steep and exceedingly trying Cambridgeshire course. Orbit was, of course, a strong favourite, and he was backed at 6 to 5; but a good deal of money was persistently invested on both Anarch and Hazlehatch just before the start. The three favourites did not come to the front during the early part of the race, and Hazlehatch seemed to be pulling Barrett almost out of the saddle; yet, when they came to the well-known red post, he collapsed altogether. In the opinion of certain able judges this was no cause for surprise, as they had not thought him looking thoroughly trained before the race, and he had certainly sweated; others considered that he ran more like a fast horse than a stayer. Not long after Hazlehatch had been beaten, it became evident that Anarch was also incapable of winning, and as soon as Webb had made quite certain of this he eased him. At the distance, Orbit went up to Lord Lurgan's Cotillon, a little esteemed colt that had made most of the running, and was still leading. To everybody's surprise, instead of gliding past him, Cannon was seen to be "at work" upon Orbit, and without any very apparent result. On the previous day Cotillon had won a race after a hard struggle in very moderate company, and surely, thought judges of racing, this was not the sort of form with which to test a Derby colt. Yet there was the fact that both Anarch and Hazlehatch were left behind; and presently, when Cannon really rode hard on nearing the winning-post, Orbit got the lead and won by three-quarters of a length. After the race Orbit looked far less distressed than Cotillon, to whom he had given 5 lbs.; and his friends said that he had run lazily, but like a fine stayer, and that he had in reality won with a good deal in hand. Nevertheless, the race led to a great deal of discussion and difference of opinion, and it gave judges of racing a splendid opportunity of exercising their skill. The Craven meeting was far more successful than had been generally anticipated; and much of this success is to be attributed to the wise action of the Newmarket authorities in reducing the racing from four days to three.

REVIEWS.

THE COMING OF THE GREAT QUEEN.*

IN many respects the subjugation of the Burmese Empire has differed from that of native dynasties in India proper. With contiguous Mahratta and Mahommedan States, after each successive war, annexation, or treaty, some new cause of quarrel was sure to arise. The conquest of Mysore in the last century was compressed into less than a decade. Only three years intervened between the first and the second Sikh campaign. The Mahratta houses were either subdued or reduced to impotence in little more than twenty years. But it has taken two generations or sixty years of history to make the Burmese Empire an integral part of the British dominions. We had no reason originally to expect hostility or opposition from the King of Burma. We had comparatively little intercourse with his Empire. But the successors of Alompra in the early part of this century were perpetually encroaching on our North-Eastern frontier; and Lord Amherst, by no means an aggressive ruler, had no option but to declare war in 1824, and begin by driving out the Burmese from Chittagong. After a campaign which lasted two years and cost about ten millions of our money, the King of Ava was compelled to give up all claim to Assam, and to cede to us the provinces of Arracan and Tenasserim. That King had, however, still left the province of Pegu with the fine port of Rangoon, and the whole of Upper Burma, with its independent and wild tribes. But our new acquisitions now touched the Burmese Empire on two sides, and for a quarter of a century there were perpetual complaints of Dacoits, raids, ill-treatment of traders, impediments to commerce, and all the other stock subjects which arise everywhere when the pioneers of civilization come in collision with autocratic rulers. How very nearly we were involved in a premature second Burmese war in 1841-2, when our prestige had been lowered and our resources were strained by untoward events in Afghanistan, is known only to a few Anglo-Indians. But a quarrel was then averted by the foresight and tact of Mr. Wilberforce Bird, the President of the Council, while Lord Ellenborough was issuing grand manifestoes and feasting Sepoys with sweetmeats at the other end of the Empire. Then came the war commenced by Lord Dalhousie, after a series of insults which such a ruler was not likely to pass over. It was said, with truth at that time, that Commodore Trunnion, with Pipes and Hatchway at his back, was not exactly the man to conduct negotiations peaceably with the representatives of the haughtiest and most aggressive Court in the East. But with the Burmese peace must always have been "precarious, and not at all permanent." And the second campaign was concluded in eight months, at an expenditure of only about one million and a half. We thus got possession of the whole seaboard. Continental nations were shut out. The anticipations of peace and development made at the close of this war were amply fulfilled. The land revenue rose from a humble estimate of 300,000*l.* to one million. Commerce flourished. The people were easily ruled. In the Sepoy Mutiny Burma could be safely denuded of English troops; and the King of Burma might have been reigning to this hour had it not been for his own cruelty and folly.

Something about all these events may be found in Major Browne's Narrative of the Acquisition of Burma; but we cannot admit his claim to have given us more information on Indo-China generally than can be found in print. Nor was it necessary for him to apologize for the introduction of his own personality in his narrative. His book, in fact, may be cut clearly in half. The history of the Burmese Empire from the earliest times down to the war of 1885 is a mere compilation; and the accounts of the manners of Karens, Shans, Chins, and Kachins are mainly, if not entirely, secondhand. We should have preferred a simple narrative of what the author experienced when serving under Sir Harry Prendergast. Much of the work is superfluous, and the table of contents is meagre and disappointing, while there is not even an attempt at an index.

Previous experience had taught the author what he might look for in such a country and climate. He knew something about the expense of living, the houses made of wood, the excessive rainfall, the snipe-shooting, the sky races of the English officer, and the boat races and football play of the Burmese. He had also made a trip to the capital in 1871, had shaken hands with Thibau, and had climbed to an eminence which commanded a magnificent view of the city of Mandalay, its woods, ramparts, pinnacles, and temples. At the commencement of the last war, Major Browne offered to raise a corps of fifty mounted volunteers for service with the expeditionary force. It does not seem as if the country was well fitted for what the Baron of Bradwardine termed the prælium equestre, any more than the country round Preston Pans. Neither does it appear that much enthusiasm was manifested and encouragement given by the authorities to this new feature in Burmese warfare. But stout ponies were to be had in numbers, and there was no backwardness on the part of natives "who could ride well, perched on their brand-new red-cloth saddles." The animals and their riders were distributed over various steamers, and, in spite of official obstruction, mounted infantry in small columns did scour the country after the capital had fallen, rode thirty miles where the country was flat, and were ready to dismount and explore ranges of hills when the ride on the flat was over.

The account of the expedition by river and land, of the taking of the city, of the surrender of the King, his wives, and retinue, and of the arrival of the Viceroy, is well told, barring occasional flippancy. On the question of annexation versus protectorate this book gives no uncertain sound. The latter expedient has never succeeded in India. How, indeed, could it succeed when against the self-indulgence, the training in luxury and vice, and the tyrannical, hereditary interests of a despot, the wisest English Resident had nothing to oppose but vague phrases and unfulfilled threats? The one province in India where the influence of the British Resident or Agent, who does not directly administer, has been of real use, is Rajputana. In other provinces we have had to set aside a ruler here, to select another there, to take temporary charge during minority or incapacity, and to reconstruct the very framework of society. A protectorate in Burma, the author truly remarks, would have been attended with increased risks and difficulties, "owing to the presence on the scene of a de facto sovereign of the reigning dynasty, and the impossibility of getting the people to bury their instincts or sink their loyalty so far as to suffer any authority to exist on an equality with a prince of the royal blood." We could not gracefully retire and let in any European competitor. The only practicable and politic measure was to end the existence of Burma as an independent sovereignty. We shall be no worse off with China and Siam for our neighbours, if we only have patience, and do not frighten those Powers with premature treaties, telegraphs, railways, and other resources of civilization. The only mistake committed after annexation was the attempt to complete the pacification of the country with an inadequate force. Past history—to say nothing of the records of the Foreign Department—might have taught both the Viceroy and his lieutenant that what was not very easy for Sir John Cheape and Lord Dalhousie in 1852 would be as difficult in 1886. But as we write much has been effected. In Burma we have not to deal with the fanaticism of one creed and the exclusiveness of caste of another. There is plenty of waste and unoccupied land for the expected increase of population, and we shall be much surprised if our civil and military officers do not earn the same reputation for overcoming the defiance and the distrust of wild tribes which they have acquired in dealing with Mairs, Coles, Garos, and Bheels in India Proper.

About these same wild tribes in Burma we have some interesting details. A young staff officer fresh from a fort built near the plateau of the Southern Shan tribes describes the country as abounding in wood and water, and the Shans themselves as addicted to blood feuds of a not very alarming or dangerous kind. Two clans had fought for thirteen days consecutively without coming to close quarters, and with only one casualty. The Northern Shans are divided into some twenty-four semi-independent tribes, always squabbling and fighting. The Burmese exercised over these clans a sovereignty which varied in oppression and weight according to distance. Our policy of encouraging trade, promising protection, and demanding an annual tribute of moderate amount, is in accordance with precedent, and in the hands of experienced officers may lead to cordial and close relations. Another tribe, that of the Chins, has its home near the head waters of the Irrawadi and the Chindwin rivers. A curious fable about the origin of the human race from one hundred and one eggs is too long to quote or analyse. That these Chins have devoted most of their energies to the preparation of khaung, an intoxicating drink, without any prompting from the English pioneer, is a very melancholy fact which we commend to Canon Farrar. The details of this mixture are repulsive. Bark, the root of the egg plant, beans, peppercorns, garlic, the entrails of a porcupine, and rice flour are all mashed up together in balls, exposed to the sun for three days, then buried with parboiled rice, and diluted with water. The preparation is now fit to be sucked up through tubes —like American drinks—and is pronounced "divine." Indeed, by reason of its excellence, it must be first offered to the Nats or spirits. The system of cultivation by burning strips or terraces of land is, like that of all tribes on the Eastern frontier, wasteful and improvident. Women do all the hard work and become prematurely ugly and old. Divorces are easily obtained. Widows may be claimed by the brothers of their husbands, but have no share in the family property. Marriages are simple in form, and are accompanied by a large consumption of fowls, pork, and liquor. Deaths and burials are equally the occasion for sacrifice and feasting. The corpse is first burnt, and the calcined bones are kept in a pot for one year, and then deposited in the family burial-place. In the account of the Kakyens, who occupy the slopes between Upper Burma and the Chinese province of Yunan, we come on the same account of the worship of spirits who preside over agriculture, on offerings to propitiate these deities, on the harsh treatment of the female sex, and on more devouring of swine's flesh and of an intoxicating drug called sheroo. Marriages are concluded under a form of abduction, duly legalized and sanctioned by an officiating priest. At burials the relatives and friends perform a dance in order to drive away the spirit of the deceased, which is supposed to linger round its former tenement. And it is curious, if true, that those who have been killed "by shot and

Major Browne indulges in speculations as to future intercourse with China, increased trade, railways, the policy of the French at Saigon, and other matters into which we shall not follow him. But a suggestion that we might raise and discipline irregular levies of Karens and others has precedent and success in its favour. It is obvious that this book will be the forerunner of others about the new province. It has no hereditary chiefs, nobles, or great landholders. The export of rice is likely to assume gigantic proportions, and the soil also produces cotton, sesamum, and tobacco. The total population, excluding the late annexation, was estimated in 1881 at something under four millions. There are twenty large towns with populations varying from five to fifty thousand, and Rangoon in addition counts one hundred and thirty-four thousand souls. The revenue assessment is very light, and the Government deals with the cultivators direct, at an average assessment of three shillings and threepence an acre. Perhaps the worst feature of the country is its climate. The average rainfall is about one hundred and twenty inches, and with all the exploration and research of our officers, we have not yet been able to find a local sanatarium where invalids can reside at any month in the year. But already we have two lines of railway, fleets of boats, sailing vessels and steamers, a high rate of wages, cheap and plentiful food, no likelihood of drought and famine, a rich soil, and, as far as we can judge, a readiness in the mass of the community to acquiesce contentedly in the Coming of the Great Queen.

HERR PAULUS.*

IN Herr Paulus Mr. Besant leaves his beloved East End in order to fall foul of modern Spiritualism, and describes with infinite spirit and truth the form taken at the present day by a delusion which in all ages has flourished among all races of men. To communicate with the spirits of the departed is what we all should be glad to do; and, if any man announces with sufficient pomp that he can put us in the way of doing it, poor human nature is ever prone to believe him; for, indeed, who can prove that he cannot do so? A curious result of this yearning after the unseen world is that the confirmed Spiritualist is not disconcerted by his medium being proved to be a vulgar impostor; quack after quack may be detected, and nevertheless the true believer's faith is no more shaken than that of a fervent Christian would be by the shortcomings of individual clergymen. We may wonder how any man could be such a fool as Mr. Cyrus Brudenell, but when we read the History of Count Cagliostro we cease to wonder; for he, as Carlyle tells us, "starting from the lowest point of Fortune's wheel, rose to a height universally notable; without external furtherance, money, beauty, bravery, almost without common sense, or any discernible worth whatever, he sumptuously supported, for a long course of years, the wants and digestion of one of the greediest of bodies," entirely by the ministrations of such men as Mr. Besant's retired shipowner and millionaire. It is interesting to read how the whole business struck Darwin's shrewd intelligence. In his recently published Life, vol. iii. p. 187, we read:—"We had grand fun, one afternoon, for George hired a medium, who made the chairs, a flute, a bell, and candlestick, and fiery points jump about in my brother's dining-room, in a manner that astounded every one, and took away their breaths. . . . How the man could possibly do what was done passes my understanding." He adds the characteristic comment, "The Lord have mercy on us all, if we have to believe in such rubbish." Unlike Count Cagliostro, Mr. Besant's hero starts with the possession of great personal beauty, charm of manner, and keen intelligence; but, like him, Ziphion Trinder, the budding poet of the little Puritan New England township, "dived deep down into the lugubrious obscure regions of Rascaldom; like a Knight into the palace of his Fairy, remained unseen there, and returned armed at all points." The writer's skill is shown by the manner in which Herr Paulus, who from the beginning is suspected by Tom Langston, the accepted lover of Mr. Brudenell's daughter, nevertheless wins, not only Tom's sympathies, but also those of the reader. Tom, who has considerable mechanical genius as well as scepticism, rigs up a tarpaulin tent on the roof of the house, containing a camera obscura, by means of which he can see everything that passes in Mr. Brudenell's study, and it is no mean proof of his confidence in the medium's honesty that he sees him manipulating Mr. Brudenell's keys and cheque-book, and yet does not interfere. Herr Paulus for some time plays the part of Good Fairy, or Lar Familiaris, but at last his powers desert him; he deserts his trade, publicly recants, and becomes an honest man. His recantation and exposure of his own tricks have, as we have said, not the least effect on the faith of his followers, who merely begin to follow somebody else, and instead of talking about The Ancient Way, Isâk Ibn Menelek the Falasha, Abyssinia, &c., talk about Esoteric Buddhism, astral bodies, Mahatmas, Karma, Thibet, and Mme. Blavatsky. Populus vult decipi.

THEATRE CONSTRUCTION AND MAINTENANCE.*

MR. BUCKLE is by no means guilty of self-exaltation when in the preface to his useful volume he asserts that a perusal of his pages "will afford an insight into the complex arrangements of modern theatres, without which knowledge, acquired either by reading or personal observation, neither legislation, supervision, nor control can be satisfactorily accomplished." For perhaps the first time we have a practical man sitting down with the avowed object of showing not merely how a theatre is built, but how it ought to be constructed in order that the audience may see, hear, and enjoy that immunity from disaster, arising from fire or panic, which has hitherto been denied them. Although Mr. Buckle's volume is necessarily overlaid with technicalities, the details are so clearly and concisely grouped as to exercise a kind of fascination over those readers who take an interest in the stage itself as distinguished from the glamour which surrounds a première as with a halo of delicious delight. Then, too, it was thoughtful indeed of the author to introduce cross-headings to his innumerable paragraphs, instead of "lumping" his materials together under half a dozen titles. If the ordinary playgoer could be brought to read only those pages which treat of the necessity for constructing theatres on an entirely different plan to that which has hitherto been adopted, an agitation against the oft condemned death-traps and fire-traps would arise, with the result that the Legislature would be compelled to interfere and to supervise theatres with a strictness now only conspicuous by its absence. Now, how would Mr. Buckle have playhouses and music-halls constructed? It is worth while following him in his suggestions, for they are eminently practical, although it is to be feared that the majority of managers will treat them as scornfully as most of them have treated the suggestions for an improved description of playhouses made from time to time—particularly within the last year—by those who have the safety of the public as well as the welfare of the stage at heart. Week by week, with painful monotony, we drew attention to the terrible condition of the vast majority of the London theatres and music-halls, and our remarks received a striking confirmation when the appalling accident at Exeter took place. For the Exeter theatre—bad as it undoubtedly was, and only licensed, as we have lately shown, by the culpable negligence of the magistrates—compared very favourably with many of the fire-traps of the metropolis.

First, then, a theatre should be built on an isolated site at least ten feet from contiguous buildings; failing this, the builder should secure a corner site. "In the near future, theatres will probably be licensed to accommodate certain numbers, as is now the case with steamships and omnibuses"; but, for such a reform, we must wait until Parliament can find time to take in hand this matter, as well as measures for upsetting arrangements which answer very well as they are. "Managers," says Mr. Buckle, "are unable to withstand the temptation to pack their houses"; hence, "discomfort, insufficient ventilation, congested exits, and the risks inseparable from panic intensified." The stalls should be from 20 to 24 inches wide; the dress circle seats, 20 to 22 inches; the upper circle, 18 to 20; the pit, 16 to 18; amphitheatres, 16, and gallery 15 inches; and, in addition to this, allowance must be made for standing-room.

"Fire and panic drills" are absolutely necessary; all the members of the company should be instructed in these exercises, and the attendants should be taught, not only how to use the fire-extinguishing appliances, but exactly what to do in the event of panic. When Mr. Wilson Barrett had the Princess's Theatre, his actors and actresses, and all concerned, were practised in these matters; and if at the Princess's, why not at the other playhouses?

"The grand principle," however, that should govern the disposition of the plans is the provision of fire-resisting structural divisions between the auditorium, entrances, and staircases, public rooms, managerial offices, stage, workshops, property-stores, and dressing-rooms. Where practicable, these division walls should be carried up through the roof. In the case of the proscenium-wall this is imperative. All the roofs should, without exception, be constructed as flats, and connected with iron ladders, to enable the firemen to get quickly from one point to another. The auditorium should be cosy, and not too large." And here it may be said that Mr. Buckle legislates for an audience of 2,000, divided thus—stalls, 200; pit, 600; first circle, 250; second circle, 350; amphitheatre, 100; gallery, 500. For the purpose of comparison, it may be added that the Lyceum holds only 1,850; the Olympic, 900; the Opera Comique, 1,000; the St. James's, 1,000; the Strand, 1,000; Toole's, 900; Vaudeville, 1,000; the Gaiety, 1,150; the Haymarket, 1,100; the Comedy, 1,185; Drury Lane, the Alhambra, and the Britannia, each 3,500; the Empire and Covent Garden, 3,000; Her Majesty's, 2,444; the Prince of Wales's, 1,200; the Princess's, 1,900; the Royalty and Terry's, 800, and the Criterion only 750.

There should be windows in every part of a theatre; external porticoes should communicate with an inner vestibule, despite the fact that this part of the house has been described as the curse of all theatres, "as, in the event of a panic, constituting a meeting-point for large numbers of the audience." Besides the outer vestibule or portico, Mr. Buckle argues in favour of an inner vestibule, large enough to serve as a crush-room for what the author terms "the dress portion of the audience." Of course entrances and exits are all important, the safety of an audience depending more upon "judiciously arranged means of egress than the presence of real danger." At least two means of egress from each section of the auditorium leading direct into the street should be provided, and indicated, not by placards or framed notices, but by permanent inscriptions on the doors or walls. All exits should be used nightly, not merely when there is a fire or a panic, and "an attendant wearing a distinctive badge or dress should be placed in charge of each exit door." All external doors ought to be made to open both outwards and inwards. Supposing a theatre to hold a thousand persons, the minimum width of the exit passage should be ten feet—one foot per hundred; which seems only reasonable. In the best appointed London theatres the door-egress allowed for exit averages about one foot for each sixty persons, the rate of egress at ordinary times being about four hundred persons a minute.

If external doors are (they ought not to be) fastened during the performance, only such bolts should be used as can be easily forced by pressure from without. With "panic bolts," such as those at the Lyceum and the Egyptian Hall, such a disaster as that which occurred at Sunderland a few years ago would be impossible, the bolts yielding only to pressure from within.

Mr. Buckle has a word in favour of the queue, as used at the pit entrance of the Savoy as well as at the Grand Theatre at Leeds. While the staircases should be as near as possible the exits, there should be no intervening passages leading thereto. Portland cement concrete is recommended for the steps, being more to be relied upon as a fire-resisting material, as well as cheaper than natural stone. "An endeavour should be made to light all staircases by means of windows; this is conducive to safety, cleanliness, good ventilation, and a saving in the consumption of gas at matinées," the latter now a considerable item in the weekly expenses of a theatre. External escape staircases are compulsory in some Continental towns, and Mr. Buckle suggests, where the situation of the building admits of these being placed, the fixing at each floor of iron balconies communicating with the street by iron stairs, to be used on ordinary as well as extraordinary occasions, as "appliances provided for use at remote intervals are invariably found to be out of order, and fail to act when most needed." Where the building does not admit of improvement, the canvas sheet used in Paris might advantageously be fitted to existing windows or openings expressly made.

Mr. Buckle, while full of forethought for the safety of playgoers, does not forget to say a word for their comfort. There should be a retiring-room off the main vestibule, "where ladies and gentlemen may await their carriages without impeding the egress of the audience, and a small room for the use of footmen and servants in waiting. There is room for improvement," Mr. Buckle rightly thinks, "in the present method of—to adopt a military simile—incarriaging and decarriaging the audience. Ladies in evening attire and thinly wrapped have now to stand exposed to the cold winds waiting for their carriages," and he proceeds to furnish us with a code of rules which would, he thinks, facilitate incarriaging. Then the foyer should be made, what it very seldom is, "an enjoyable lounge," nothing "repellent to good taste" being sanctioned. The refreshment-rooms should be "of attractive appearance," and the liquors, &c., good, managers having the power "to insist that wholesome beverages be supplied to their patrons. The intellectual appreciation of a play is not enhanced by the wholesale distribution of poison during the entr'acte."

The sanitary accommodation is frequently very inadequate in theatres: and hereon Mr. Buckle speaks out in a manner which we may commend without quoting. An "accident room" is suggested; and then the author deals at length with the seating accommodation throughout the house, into the details of which he need not be followed; though we may pause for a moment to agree with Mr. Buckle that the gangways should never be occupied during a performance, and that "the number of seats in a row should never exceed twelve without an intervening gangway."

Before dealing with the stage and its appurtenances, Mr. Buckle dwells awhile on the question of fire-resisting curtains, and gives the preference to those made of asbestos metallic cloth, as being light in construction, economical in cost, and easy of manipulation. The Edinburgh Lyceum Theatre and the London Prince of Wales's both have fire-resisting proscenium curtains, constructed of wrought-iron plates, worked by water obtained from tanks on the roof, weighing from seven to eight tons, and capable of being raised or lowered in from thirty to fifty seconds, with an expenditure of only eighty-four gallons of water. When he comes to speak of the construction of the stage, Mr. Buckle has much to tell us about "cuts," "sliders," "bridges," "traps," "flats," "wings," "Back-cloths," "borders," "butts," "rakes," "gridirons," "cloths," "tumblers," "fly galleries," "docks," "Jacob's ladders," "grooves," "fly trusses," "cleats," and so on. Pages are occupied with these details, which are sufficiently interesting, though unnecessary to dwell upon here. A word, however, concerning the dressing-rooms, which, except in a very few theatres, may well be described as the "abomination of desolation." In Mr. Buckle's opinion "the dressing-rooms should constitute a distinct block, and be separated by a fire-resisting lobby or corridor from the stage. This block should be divided into two sections, having separate staircases and approaches for the men and women, with distinct sanitary conveniences provided on each floor." Daylight, fresh air, warmth, adequate bath space and drawers, clothes racks (or cloak pegs), and plenty of hot and cold water are the essentials to a good and comfortable dressing-room; but how often are they provided? A leading professional lady told Mr. Buckle that "to dress in a cold room chills every feeling, and renders you physically unfit to perform your part satisfactorily"; and those who have tried either to dress or to write under such conditions will appreciate the force of her remark.

In the chapter devoted to lighting and acoustics Mr. Buckle tells us that "a writer" described the Opera House in the Haymarket as being, in 1864, "the very best theatre in the world for sound," although it was built without any scientific principles of acoustics. The house at that time (it was burnt in 1867) "was like a drum, and the wall of the auditorium was flat. There was no projecting ornament of any kind. The outsides of the boxes were flat and even, and the ceiling was smooth, without any ornamentation in relief, and the form that of a slight dome. The pit tier fitted tight on to the floor. In this short description we have the whole secret of good sound." Ventilation naturally deserves serious attention in an essay on theatre building, and we learn that Mr. Buckle prefers the plenum, or mechanical principle, to the vacuum, or natural principle, for the very good reason that the latter "has been a signal failure in every theatre where adopted." Of the various systems of automatic or natural ventilation Mr. Buckle prefers the well-known one of Messrs. R. Boyle & Sons, while for forcing fresh air into theatres he seems to think the Æolus water-spray ventilator best. When he comes to deal with the lighting of theatres, Mr. Buckle is firm in the belief that, whether the system be gas or electricity, "there should be a supplementary system of lighting by means of oil lamps"—the point on which we repeatedly insisted last year when reporting on the general state of the London theatres and music-halls. While fully believing that the electric light will "in the very near future entirely supersede gas as an illuminant in theatres," Mr. Buckle is careful to point out that the introduction of electricity will not dispense with the necessity for ventilation, and he is earnest in showing that "defective insulation" has caused many fires. Given a good system of insulation, and there is practically no danger whatsoever in electric lighting of theatres. While there is general agreement in the advantage of electrical non-gas lighting in the audience parts of theatres, experts differ as to the expediency of throwing such a glare on the faces of the performers, contending that a mass of white light "shows up" too minutely the blemishes in even the most perfect beauty. The "fierce light which beats upon a throne" is, in fact, stronger than the most lovely daughter of the stage can bear with equanimity. So far as concerns the foot-lights, then, the much-derided gas will probably long continue to hold its own. Mr. Buckle's most important chapter is that on the prevention of fire. He holds that the primary consideration should be to build a theatre in the most substantial manner, and with externals that will not aid combustion; that all scenery, properties, and wardrobes should be coated with an anti-ignition solution; and that there should be fire appliances, plenty of water, systematic inspection, "on fire watch," and periodical fire drills. Assuredly, if theatres were constructed on Mr. Buckle's plan there would be few, if any, disasters, and panics would be things of the past. Some novel suggestions for a model safety theatre are offered by the author, who does not regard Mr. Irving's recent proposition as a successful solution of the problem. Mr. Buckle's argument may be thus condensed:—"The safest theatre in the event of a panic would be one in which the public had to rush up staircases into the streets, rather than down. Hence the gallery, and not the pit, should be entered from the street level." The theatre most closely approximating to Mr. Buckle's ideal playhouse is, the reader may be surprised to learn, the Criterion, every part of which is below the street-level, a superstructure being raised over the auditorium, of which the house itself is only the basement.

If the author of Theatre Construction and Maintenance is right, the architects of the future will build playhouses without staircases; and it would be practicable to do so provided the site were isolated.

We are shown a perspective sketch of such a theatre as that suggested by the author, erected "within an excavation or moat, leaving an open area all round the theatre 25 feet wide from the external walls of the building to the boundary walls of the site"—an arrangement allowing every part of the house to be lighted by windows, and securing perfect ventilation and absolute control in the event of fire. The gallery is entered on a level with the street by bridges spanning the moat.

Mr. Buckle's book merits a more exhaustive notice; but probably enough has been said to direct that attention to it which it undoubtedly deserves.

HISTORY OF SOUTH AFRICA.*

MR. THEAL is a most indefatigable searcher of records. Recently we had occasion to notice his very valuable History of the Boers in South Africa, which gives the fullest account yet published of the causes that led to the emigration of the Dutch from the colony, compiled from original documents to which he had access as a custodian of the archives of the Cape. Now he gives us a volume of equal value dealing with the first colonization of the Cape by the Dutch East India Company, and the events happening under its rule between the years 1649 and 1691. Mr. Theal's book, however, is rather a précis than a history, and will conduce more to the enlightenment of the student than the amusement of the general reader. The care with which it has been prepared and the labour involved in its preparation are very patent. Not only has Mr. Theal studied all the old Dutch records in the Cape archives, he has also visited the Hague, and spent some months in examining the seventeenth-century manuscripts and maps that are collected there, with the result that his work will become invaluable to all students of South African history.

* History of South Africa [1486-1691]. By George McCall Theal. London: Swan Sonnenschein & Co. 1888.

In the seventeenth century, when the great Dutch Company carried on their trade with the Netherlands India, the want of a place of refreshment for their vessels was much felt. The travellers of to-day in well-appointed steamships have little idea of the frightful risks and hardships involved in a sea voyage two hundred and fifty years ago. In the transit from the Netherlands to the Cape—which was never accomplished under eighty days, and sometimes took twice as long—it was no uncommon thing for half the passengers and crew to perish miserably of scurvy. Sometimes, when, after these weary days of death and desolation, the vessel at length reached Table Bay, the survivors on board were too weak even to furl the sails or bring their sick on shore. Nevertheless, as nothing short of actual extermination will check the greed of man being clothed and of a civilized mind, the trade went on, and the East India Company very sensibly sought how best to mitigate its death-rate. For some years before the occupation of the Cape, the fleets had made a custom of dropping anchor in Table Bay, where they watered, and, if possible, bought a few cattle from wandering natives. Finally, some shipwrecked mariners having reported favourably of the place, the Supreme Directory of the Company determined, upon the 30th August, 1650, to establish a victualling station at the Cape, where, it must be noted, the English flag had already been hoisted in 1620, and erect a fort containing space for seventy or eighty men. This decision being come to, they at once appointed one Jean Van Riebeeck, an ex-surgeon, to be the head of the new settlement. The expedition sailed on the 24th December, 1651, and after a prosperous and, as it was then considered, a rapid passage of one hundred and four days, dropped anchor in Table Bay. Van Riebeeck was a man of great energy of character, and he certainly needed all he had, for a more trying task than that which lay before him it is impossible to conceive. It is no light thing to undertake to turn a hitherto uninhabited coast into a thriving settlement capable of supplying large fleets with all needful refreshment in the shape of vegetables and meat. Moreover, at the Cape the difficulties of the colonists were much increased by the presence of tribes of wandering Hottentots, whose good will had to be gained; for on these tribes they relied for their supply of cattle. But to a very large extent Van Riebeeck succeeded. For ten years he ruled the infant settlement with an iron hand—there was scarcely anything that its members might do without the permission of the officers of the Company—striving in all things to promote the interests of his employers; and when, in 1662, he handed over the command to Commander Wagenaar, the colony had struck firm root in African soil. Its growth, however, was of the slowest; and for the period with which Mr. Theal deals in this volume its history cannot be called interesting. Indeed it consists in an oft-told tale of petty squabbles with petty chiefs, struggles with the soil and seasons, and abortive expeditions in search of fabulous cities in the interior. There is scarcely an incident recorded that in any way strikes the imagination, unless it is the occasional narration of the sufferings of crews shipwrecked along the coast-line, or the circumstances under which the building of the castle was carried out. By degrees a class of burghers sprung up, and were settled on farms at Stellenbosch and other convenient spots. These men were no longer directly in the service of the Company, but they were subject to many onerous regulations. Probably we here discover the root and origin of that hatred of rule for which the Boer race is so remarkable. It is an inherited reminiscence of the iron rod of the Company. But, if the Company was severe, it was also provident and wise. It established schools, provided ministers, and generally looked after the interests of the colonists. Moreover, it inaugurated a just and merciful course of dealing with the natives; and, though this was to some extent an interested proceeding, seeing that, unless they were well treated, the tribes would not sell cattle, the conspicuous moderation of its methods is much to the Company's credit. But, notwithstanding all efforts to multiply the population by means of the introduction of Huguenot refugees and otherwise, the increase of the colony was very slow. In the year 1691, at which date Mr. Theal closes his volume, it only numbered about a thousand souls. This handful was, however, a seed from which a considerable people was to spring, and we shall look forward with interest to Mr. Theal's account of its more active and vigorous growth.

PERSIAN PHRASES.*

LIEUTENANT EARDLEY-WILMOT, when working at Madras for one of the examinations in Persian, made careful extracts from the text-books which he was reading, with the English on one side and the Persian on the other. He has now rearranged these various passages under different heads, according as they relate to various administrative functions, and has printed the detached sentences. The book is thus, no doubt, a useful one for anybody who wishes to learn Persian in an extremely dull and uninteresting manner, much as though he were to learn by heart columns of a dictionary. For purposes of literature it cannot have, nor is it intended to have, any value, and we think that those who are engaged in the study of Persian would be far better employed in learning their own note-book than that of another person. Of course, as all students of foreign languages know, one of the best ways to acquire a language is to learn detached sentences by heart. We applaud Lieutenant Eardley-Wilmot's industry, and hope that he passed his examination.

It seems, however, a suitable occasion to inquire whether the examination in Persian in India should not extend to works of later date than those from which extracts are made in this compilation. Persian, as the ancient Court language of India, and as the language which still has greatest general currency after English, must for long to come be of importance for Indian officials, and the study of its very beautiful literature is improving and valuable. But it should be borne in mind that the Persian of the present day is very dissimilar to that of the past, and the tongue as it is spoken is fully as worthy of study as translations of Malcolm's History in a somewhat stilted style. Sir Richard Temple's quotations from Hafiz, in his speech in Parliament lately on the liquor traffic of India, afforded additional proof (were it needed) of the rare common sense of the Persian poets, and of the wisdom their writings contain.

NOVELS.*

CURB and Snaffle is a novel that is more or less like a great many one has read before; most of the incidents strike one as being familiar, and most of the dramatis personæ are old friends. There is the pompous bishop, who is so strongly imbued with a sense of his exalted position that he never relaxes aught of his dignity, even in the bosom of his own family; the son who is never understood by his father, and who stands in such awe of him that he prefers sacrificing his whole career to refusing submission to one of his (the father's) wishes; the dashing cavalry officers, who under ordinary circumstances are as rollicking and devil-may-care as you please, but who, when the occasion demands it, can become as gentle as women. All these well-known characters are to be found in this book; and, though one is always delighted to meet old friends, one sometimes has a hankering after something new and original in a novel. The title is well chosen. Curb and Snaffle is exactly the right term to express the different ways of bringing up the two lads who are the joint heroes of the story. It is a great pity that the bishop did not have the advantage of as good an education as he gave his son. When one compares their language on different occasions, one cannot help feeling that it would be better were they to take example by the father and son in Vice Versâ and change places. The prelate says to his secretary, with a fine disregard for grammar, "Do me the favour to leave this person and I alone." Mark the difference between this and the simple language of the Eton boy:—"I wonder, if my mother had lived, what she would have said to all this—this quenching of natural instincts, this fanatic and blind-like confidence which I place in the future, a future, too, utterly at variance with my tastes and feelings, and yet one which I school myself day by day to consider as right." As most of the incidents are connected with some kind of sport, it seems a pity that the author had not previously studied the subject more carefully. The Eton and Harrow match is doubtless the event of the season at Lords; but still the authorities of the M.C.C. would feel rather surprised, and perhaps protest in a forcible manner, if, to quote the words of the book, "Drags, omnibuses, landaus, and every sort of vehicle" were to "find their way inside the ground and take up their allotted positions" two days before the match. The system of scoring in the match described is somewhat peculiar. "The newcomer scored 8 off the first over—25 to tie; then Conroy made a boundary and 2 singles—2 to tie," says Sir Randal Roberts. Most people are under the impression that one four and two singles make six; how they can possibly amount to twenty-three would puzzle a "senior wrangler at either University," if, as the author asserts, both Universities boast such a phenomenon. Then, again, where can Sir Randal Roberts have got his experience of horses? He talks of a horse standing about 15·3 as a "low, lengthy nag." A hunter of nearly 16 hands is not generally considered low. He subsequently informs us that the average height of an Arab horse is 15 hands 2 inches. There are very few Arabs within a hand of that height. These and many other such extraordinary blunders rather destroy one's pleasure in reading Curb and Snaffle, which, for all that, is a book that has its merits. It is easily and naturally written for the most part, and the author goes straight to his point, wasting no time over descriptions and explanations. Briefly, it is just the sort of novel one likes on a railway journey, or on other occasions when one feels inclined for nothing but what is essentially light reading.

For some reason or other we have come to look upon the Scotchman, as portrayed in novels, as a bore. This is said without the slightest reflection upon the Scotch nation at large; but the typical Scotchman of fiction, though a most estimable person, thoroughly respectable in every sense of the word, and the very embodiment of all that is shrewd and common sense, is always a bore. Jealousy is notoriously one of the most powerful motives that actuate human nature, so perhaps this idea arises from a feeling of his superiority. He is so painfully precise—one is almost tempted to say priggish—and the impression he gives of carefully weighing the pros and cons of everything he says or does before he commits himself in any way jars upon the reader, if he or she, unfortunately, happens to be a creature of impulse. This is not at all the case with the hero of The Lindsays. Alec Lindsay is just sufficiently Scotch to be consistent with the notion one has formed of the national character; but quite sufficiently English (in a novelistic sense, of course) to be sympathetic, so that one cannot but follow his struggles and hardships with interest. His impulsiveness at times borders closely on Quixotism; there are not many poor men who would indignantly repudiate a legacy of a quarter of a million of money, to which they were legally entitled, on account of some conscientious scruple. Yet this action is only what we should expect from this fiery young Scotchman. The book is well and graphically written throughout, and the author has the art of expressing himself concisely without in any way impairing the effect of his descriptions, which are specially worthy of notice. No one but an ardent lover of the picturesque could have sketched the mountain scenery of Scotland in so realistic a manner. Mr. Lindsay's impressions of Westminster Abbey are quite as good in their way. The novel being intended for English readers, the author is careful to explain any Scotch words that may occur in it. For most of these translations one feels grateful and edified; but surely Mr. Leys might have given the most ignorant of cockneys credit for knowing that gloaming being interpreted means twilight! In fact, the more ignorant he is, the less likely is he to know that the word does not belong to his mother tongue. Most amusing accounts are given of various manners and customs of the Scotch, notably their methods of carrying on courtship and of keeping the Sabbath. The religious controversies between Alec and his friend Cameron are entertaining and fairly clever, the latter's comparison of religion and houses being particularly original. Alec remarked:—

"'True religion consisteth in great part of the affections,' says Jonathan Edwards. Perhaps you think dogmas are hindrances, not helps."

"True houses consist in great part of walls," retorted the Highlander; "is that to say they should have no foundations?"

Unfortunately, these discussions never seem to come to a definite conclusion, neither disputant ever appearing convinced by the arguments of the other. The faults of this book are chiefly technical, and generally of a trifling character. Whatever Mr. Leys may know of Scotch law, he is certainly not well versed in English legal matters. It is impossible to conceive that a judge trying a criminal case at the Old Bailey would twice refer to the prisoner at the bar as "the defendant." With the exception of a few other similar insignificant errors, which it would be hypercritical to lay too much stress upon, The Lindsays is a good novel. It is for the most part excellently written, and never in the least degree commonplace or dull.

Mr. Wells has given us in his book a tale of adventure. Roland Rollinston, an Englishman, who has come over to Pará in pursuit of a fortune, in the course of business supplies a Peruvian firm with a large consignment of rifles and other weapons, the value of the order amounting to 5,000*l*. This sum Ignacio de Souza Miranda, to whom the goods have been sent, refuses to pay, alleging as his excuse that they have been seized by the Peruvian Government as contraband of war. He then retires up country to gather rubber and avoid his creditors. Rollinston, realizing the impossibility of taking legal proceedings, follows him, in company with Eustace Warren, an Englishman, Tim Matson, an American, Peter Petersen, a Swede, and several Indians, also to gather rubber and to confront the defaulter with his little bill. His plan is eminently successful, as he finally walks off with the whole of Ignacio's property, repaying himself at the rate of over eight hundred per cent. He is assisted in his enterprise by a tribe of Indians, called Hypurinás, who have also a grudge against Ignacio, on account of his having behaved in a most unfriendly manner by destroying five of their villages. Rollinston gains the support of this tribe by playing them a tune on a bullock-horn—lent him for the purpose by an old pioneer named Urbano—hence the title of the book, The Voice of Urbano being still farther represented by an embroidered packet of prayers. The Hypurinás cannot resist these two strong claims to their affection, and decide to make common cause with the Englishmen against the slippery Peruvian. This is hard luck on Ignacio, for, though he is an excellent hand at cursing, he is not much good at fighting; and ultimately he and all his gang are annihilated, after a most exciting battle, which is capitally described. The white men manage to save his wife and sister-in-law, who are the daughters of a wealthy tradesman at Manáos. On the return voyage Peter, the Swede, falls in love with Adelia, the sister-in-law, whom he has rescued from a watery grave. He proposes to her in a somewhat novel and amusing manner, as will be seen from the following extract:—

Peter had evidently at last screwed up his courage to break the distressing silence, for, with great beads of perspiration standing upon his brow and after sundry coughs delivered in the intervals of his huge sighs, he murmured in what he intended for a soft tone of voice, but which unfortunately sounded deep and rough,—

"Do you like—mangoes?"

"Yes," came the reply, softly uttered and followed by a closer nestling movement, which Peter dared to respond to by a closer pressure of his arm round her waist.

"And—cocoa-nuts?" continued Peter, again sighing furiously.

"Yes," was again softly sighed like a gentle murmur of the wind through the trees.

"And—and—bananas?" again he questioned hoarsely, and becoming very red in the face.

"Yes, yes—and—and you too!" replied the impulsive Adelia, as she threw her arms round his neck, and vigorously hugged and kissed the astonished but delighted Peter, who after such a complete rupture of the ice of bashfulness was not slow to reciprocate the endearments of his companion.

It must be rather startling for a nervous man to have the momentous question abruptly answered, when as yet the declaration of his love has only reached the preliminary stages of mangoes and cocoa-nuts. On the arrival of the travellers at Manáos the nuptials are celebrated, and the bashful Peter is made a partner in his father-in-law's business. Urbano is so gratified at the extinction of Ignacio that he declines to take back his voice, but presents it to Rollinston, who puts it under a glass-case when he gets back to England. The latter marries the girl for whose sake he has been in the pursuit of fortune for eight years, and who by the well-timed death of a rich uncle becomes an heiress. So after all, as Warren says, they might just as well have left Ignacio alone. However, if they had, the novel-reading public would have lost a very interesting book. Interesting not only on account of the exciting story, but also because of the graphic way in which Mr. Wells puts before us the scenery of Brazil, and the manners and customs of its inhabitants.

TWO BOOKS ON BIRDS.*

A HANDSOME octavo volume of 200 pages on the Ornithology of the Argentine Republic, though presented with all the advantages of clear type and full-page illustrations, and the further assurance of good scientific work, for which Mr. Sclater's name is sufficient guarantee, does not necessarily commend itself to the general reader, to whom a catalogue of South American birds, few of which have attained more than local notoriety, can offer but very limited attractions. He will learn from the table of contents that the order Passeres is fairly represented; will accept as inevitable some new arrangement of the families; will observe that in South America, as at home, are the thrush, the wren, and the ubiquitous sparrow; and will then lay the book aside as a "work of reference" which may perhaps be usefully consulted at some future time. It is possible that Mr. Seebohm's quarto volume on The Geographical Distribution of the Charadriidæ will be similarly regarded. The title alone is a formidable one; while the diagnoses of the several varieties or species, couched in the inharmonious Latinity of science, and the lists of synonyms, do not promise that recreation for a wearied hour which our above-quoted "general reader" commonly desires. And yet, if he will nerve himself to something more than an idle examination of either work, he will find they are not volumes to be dismissed too lightly; that, while they satisfy the strictest requirements of ornithological science, they are enlivened with ample notes, results of careful observation upon the habits and peculiarities of the particular birds described, which are not merely interesting in themselves, but are suggestive of curious questions of evolution and heredity and origin of species, for which, with all deference to our more advanced transformistes, it is certain that no entirely satisfactory solution has yet been discovered; and, whether we accept the suggestions of Mr. Hudson on community of descent and inherited habits or the more decided teaching of Mr. Seebohm in his introductory chapters, it is certain that each author has recorded facts in support which not only command careful consideration, but which, by any other theories than their own, may be very difficult, if not impossible, to explain. How, for instance, shall we discover the influences which result in entire, yet persistent, differences of habit between creatures which in every other respect are most nearly allied? We are tolerably familiar with the habits of swallows and martins; five species only are found in Europe, three of which are regular summer migrants to the British Isles. Messrs. Sclater and Hudson catalogue eight species as occurring in the region known as Argentina; seven present no special peculiarity of habit, but the eighth, the Tree Martin (Progne tapera), never alights upon the ground or on roofs of houses, but only upon trees, and, though it collects materials for building, it uses them to line the nest of another bird, the "Hornero," or "Red Oven-bird" (Furnarius rufus), whose deserted home it appropriates or whom it forcibly dispossesses. Moreover, it indulges this parasitic tendency only at the expense of the Hornero, neglecting what might seem the equally eligible nests of other birds, or the burrows of the Vizcacha, a common rodent, or the owl, to which a closely-allied species, the Bank Swallow (Atticora cyanoleucha), commonly resorts.

* Argentine Ornithology: a Descriptive Catalogue of the Birds of the Argentine Republic. By P. L. Sclater, M.A., &c., and W. H. Hudson. Vol. I. London: Porter. 1888.

The Geographical Distribution of the Charadriidæ; or, the Plovers, Sandpipers, Snipes, and their Allies. By Henry Seebohm. London: Sotheran.

The nest-building habits of the above-mentioned Oven-bird are somewhat peculiar. Mr. Hudson relates that these birds, which apparently pair for life and are by no means unfrequent, begin building in the autumn, and continue their work through the winter whenever there is a spell of mild wet weather. The material used is mud, with the addition of horsehair or slender fibrous rootlets, which make the structure firmer and prevent it from cracking; when finished the structure is shaped outwardly like a baker's oven, only with a deeper and narrower entrance, and is lined with dry soft grass. The oven is a foot or more in diameter, and is sometimes very massive, weighing eight or nine pounds, and so strong that, unless loosened by the swaying of the branch to which it is attached, it remains unharmed for two or three years; a second oven is sometimes built on the top of the first.

It may be easily imagined that, in a country where parasitic habits among birds appear to be unusually frequent, a fine "landed estate" such as one of these huge mud-built Ovens must present irresistible attractions, not to the Tree Martin only, but, among others, to the socialistic sparrow (Sycalis pelzelni); which, though wearing a suit of yellowish green instead of the prevailing sober brown which clothes his English relative, equally inherits the larcenous habits of some predatory ancestor. The sparrow, however, does not restrict himself to appropriating the property of the Oven-bird, but makes himself equally at home in the large stick-built nests of the "Leñatero," or "Firewood-gatherer" (Anumbius acuticaudatus). But of all Argentine birds the most contemptuous of proprietary rights is the "Pajaro negro," or "Cow-bird" (Molothrus bonariensis), whose irregularities have furnished Mr. Hudson with a text for a thoughtful dissertation on the "peculiar mistakes and imperfections of the procreant instinct." The "Pajaro," closely allied to the North American Cow-bird (Molothrus pecoris), and widely distributed in the Southern continent, in size and appearance and in its gregarious habits resembles our well-known bird the starling; it congregates in large flocks which do not break up even in the pairing season; the hen birds, whose numbers are singularly disproportionate to those of the males, only deserting the flock while they steal away to deposit their eggs in any nests they can find—sometimes in old forsaken nests, sometimes in nests where incubation has already commenced, and sometimes, when no convenient nest is discoverable, content to lay in any hole or corner, or even on the open ground, continuing to scatter their often-wasted eggs during four months of every year. An even more reprehensible peculiarity is that the female Cow-bird constantly destroys or steals the eggs in the nests she visits, and that without any sentimental regard for original proprietorship. Mr. Hudson relates how he has often examined all the parasitical eggs in a nest—for different female Cow-birds often visit the same—and after three or four days has found that these eggs have disappeared, others, newly laid, being in their place; adding that he has not only seen a bird strike her bill into an egg and fly away with it, but has observed the male bird perch himself close by, while the female was in the nest, and immediately she quitted it drop down and begin pecking holes even in the egg she had just laid.

The love affairs of some of the Argentine birds are prettily told. The "Black-headed Siskin" (Chrysomitris icterica), a tuneful, restless little bird, builds its nest in the bole of a tree, and, while the female is sitting, the male is seen to perch near her among the leaves, gently warbling his little song, apparently for her pleasure only, the notes being so low that at the distance of a few yards they can scarcely be heard; another, the "Short-winged Tyrant" (Machetornis rixosa), pairs for life, frequenting the same locality and breeding in the same place for years; when not on the nest they invariably hunt together, and at intervals fly to some favourite perch to indulge in a duet of rapid shrill notes before they again seek their food; the "Bienteveo" (Pitangus bolivianus), found in every orchard and plantation in Buenos Ayres, pairs also for life; unlike the last, they do not hunt in couples, but separate, to meet again at intervals during the day.

One of a couple, say the female, returns to the tree where they are accustomed to meet; and, after a time, becoming impatient or anxious at the delay of her consort, utters a long, clear call-note. He is perhaps a quarter of a mile away, watching for a frog beside a pool, or beating, harrier-like, over a thistle-bed; but he hears the note, and presently responds with one of equal power; then perhaps for half an hour, at intervals of half a minute, they answer each other; at length he returns, and the two birds, nestling close together, with their yellow bosoms almost touching, their crests elevated, and beating the branch with their wings, scream their loudest notes in concert—a confused jubilant noise, that rings through the whole plantation. Their joy at meeting is patent, and their action corresponds to the warm embrace of a loving human couple.

Mr. Seebohm's volume on The Geographical Distribution of the Charadriidæ is in every respect an important contribution to ornithological science. It is not, as he is careful to inform us, to be regarded as a monograph of the extensive group of birds which comprises the plovers, the sandpipers, the snipes, and their nearest allies; but is devoted chiefly to a description of those characters which are diagnostic, and to the geographical distribution of the several species. His book is thus, in one sense, supplementary to the chapters on the Charadriidæ in his History of British Birds, and in his two fascinating volumes, Siberia in Europe and Siberia in Asia, with which, to properly appreciate the work before us, the reader should make himself familiar. The intention with which it is undertaken is thus described by Mr. Seebohm. He writes:—

I propose to take for granted the truth of the statement, that the species of Charadriidæ existing at the present time are the modified descendants of a common ancestral species; that they were not specially created in the various localities where they are now found, but have emigrated thither from a common centre.

In the earlier chapters, on Evolution and Differentiation of Species, Mr. Seebohm discusses what he rightly regards as the bases of the theory of evolution—namely, the principle of descent with modification, and the causes which have probably affected this modification. To complain that he fails to lead his reader to an absolutely definite conclusion would be unfair; but the facts that he is able to adduce, and the legitimate inferences which can be drawn from them, render any other explanation somewhat difficult of acceptance; and yet these facts and inferences would, a very few years ago, have been received, not alone by theologians, but by the scientific world itself, with something more vigorous than incredulity.

There are 222 existing species and sub-species of plovers, sandpipers, and snipes; during the breeding season they are distributed in fairly proportionate numbers between the Arctic, Temperate, and Tropical regions; about one-half of the species are shore-birds; of the other half, a small number frequent forests and the banks of rivers, the rest affect the open steppe or prairie. Mr. Seebohm assumes that the ancestral species, from which all existing species are derived, was circumpolar, and for its origin assigns a period—we cannot call it a date—when, as geological evidence distinctly proves, a mild, if not a genial, climate prevailed around the Pole. How long the one species remained, or whence it came, is not the question; the wandering habits resulting from the three months' night, and the custom, so frequent among birds of certain species, of driving away their young to find distant breeding grounds, prevented isolation, so that modification was slow, and the conditions of life for the widely increasing family remaining the same and interbreeding being unchecked, there was less opportunity for variation. But then followed, not suddenly but by slow degrees, what is known in geology as the first Glacial period, which, with Lyell, we need not assume was earlier than post-Pliocene times. Ice began to form, perpetual snow covered the highest hills, the winters grew more severe, the short summer had less power; soon enormous glaciers crept down to the sea, and year by year the breeding-grounds of the Charadriidæ were pushed further south, and their winter migrations more widely extended. Isolation became inevitable, and under changed circumstances was naturally followed by variation; until, when this Ice age had passed away, as it did in lapse of time, and the Arctic breeding-grounds were again thrown open, the descendants of the one species which had left the Polar basin at the beginning of the pre-Glacial period returned now multiplied into ten, while an equal number of species remained behind never to return at all. For long ages, variously estimated at from twenty to eighty thousand, and even to half a million years, conditions remained favourable, and then commenced another Glacial epoch. Events followed in the same cycle as before; the island-studded Polar seas gradually frosting over became masses of "thick-ribbed ice"; the open marshes, dear to snipe and sandpiper, the pleasant valleys and well-wooded hills, were buried under sheets of hardening snow; and as years rolled on, the cold, extending into what had been and what have again become temperate climes, caused the emigration of Arctic birds to districts still further south. Their gradual dispersion followed; the vast glaciers which overspread the more elevated tracts of North America and the mountains of Nova Zembla and Eastern Siberia, accelerated by the increased struggle for existence and modification under changed conditions tending to the isolation of species, produced ever-new variations, and habits of migration, originally formed when the increasing severity of the winters compelled the birds to absent themselves from their breeding-grounds in search of food, were never wholly abandoned, but still remain hereditary.

The distance travelled by some of these birds in search of winter quarters seems almost incredible. Many of those which now breed in the Arctic regions cross the tropics in their migration and seek the south temperate zone, some even occasionally going as far as New Zealand, as the Asiatic Golden Plover (Charadrius fulvus), the Turnstone (Strepsilas interpres), and forms of the Curlew, the Whimbrel, and the Knot, in all about seven species; a still larger number, not less than twenty of the Charadriidæ, visit Australia, and even more are believed to retreat to South Africa. It appears to be a general rule that the further north a bird goes to breed, the further south it migrates to winter. The rule may seem somewhat difficult to prove, since it is impossible to mark and identify individual birds, but a little consideration will establish its probability. Thus, the well-known Barn-swallow (Hirundo rusticus) winters in Northern and Central Africa; it returns to Southern Europe about the middle and end of February, crosses the Channel in April, and reaches North Scotland early in May. Enormous flocks of the Barn-swallow winter in Natal and South Africa, not beginning their northward journey until late in April—i.e. they do not leave their winter quarters until our own migrants have arrived. It may fairly be assumed that these are the birds which within comparatively few days make their appearance in great numbers in Northern Europe and North-East Asia, breeding often as far north as latitude 68°, traversing a distance of not less than six or seven thousand miles.

But the reader should himself refer to Mr. Seebohm's notes on Migration, and also to his chapter on the "Paradise of the Charadriidæ," where twelve hours after the snow departs, between the northern forests and the shores of the Polar sea, there smiles a fairy land of bog and marsh, full of delightful little lakes and tarns, where snipe and sandpipers trip over beds of moss and water-weed amid anemone and marsh marigold to spend a joyous honeymoon, feeding fat meanwhile on larvæ of water-beetle and mosquitos and the fermenting frozen fruits of last year's autumn. What we have said will perhaps suffice to draw attention to a book which our author may with good reason "commend to the careful consideration of ornithologists," and which, "whatever its faults and shortcomings," may at least claim the merit of originality.

LOTUS AND JEWEL.*

THOUGH he has drawn once again on the inexhaustible stores of the Mahâbhârata, Mr. Edwin Arnold's versions or adaptations of Sanskrit poetry form but a small portion of the miscellaneous volume which he has prettily entitled Lotus and Jewel. The sacred blossom is represented by an idyllic poem "In the Temple," in dialogue with lyrical interludes. The Jewel section is made up of a series of poems arranged acrostic-wise, setting forth the fabled virtues of Oriental gems with sundry legends peculiar to them. Various nondescript pieces form another division, the volume concluding with an episode translated from the Mahâbhârata, "A Queen's Revenge," one of the most remarkable and dramatic in the original form of the epic, and one in marked contrast to the desultory ethical discourses grafted from time to time on the elder and heroic legends by philosophic scribes and interpreters. In the prologue to "In the Temple" the scene is presented with considerable pictorial skill. The calm and glowing landscape, the lassitude of heat, the ancient temple, and the three speakers who share in the dialogue within the temple, are the chief poetic circumstances in an attractive picture. The speakers are a learned Pandit, Govind his name, an Englishman of mild theosophic tendencies who is addressed as Saheb, and a naughty nautch-girl, or nauchtnee, whose playful ways somewhat irritate the Englishman who sits at the feet of the philosopher like another Gamaliel. The Pandit expounds the mysteries of the Mandûkya text and the unutterable significance of the mighty monosyllable Om, with its triune sound and sense, and while the dark exposition progresses the spritely nautchnee sings pretty lyrics of love and the lotus to the melodious twang of the vina. When they are comfortably seated in the temple's shade, the English disciple, impatient of the frivolous minstrel's interruptions, exclaims:—

> Keep your eyes
> Curtained with lashes just one little while;
> Now for this dread word— OM.

His attempt to syllable the word arouses the Pandit, who cries:—

> Oh!—not like that!—
> Reach me the lota, girl; that I may wash
> My mouth from stain; then, covering one hand,
> I raise this other to my lips, and say,
> With three half breaths drawn in—but slow and low—
> The three great matras of this mighty Word
> Which is as Silence spoken! Hear'st thou?—OM!—
>
> SAHEB. How are there three?
>
> PANDIT. 'Tis made of A,—U, —M.

Perhaps even now the English reader requires further illustration of the true method and right ceremonial. "Thus have we seen," to quote another poet:—

> A comely bachelor,
> Fresh from a toilette of two hours, ascend
> His rostrum, with seraphic glance look up,
> And in a tone elaborately low
> Beginning, lead his voice through many a maze
> A minuet course; and winding up his mouth
> From time to time into an orifice
> Most delicate, a lurking eyelet, small,
> And only not invisible, again
> Open it out, diffusing thence a smile
> Of rapt irradiation exquisite.

Allowing for Western manners, this may assist the reader in realizing the solemnity observed by the devout Govind when, with new-washed lips, he pronounced the mystic word in the presence of his pupil and the gazelle-eyed Gunga. He then explains the meaning of the A, and what the U denotes and what the M, discoursing of life's three conditions, of which the third > is Prajna, letter M

> * * * * *
> When he asleep desireth no desire,
> Dreameth no dreams, that is the perfect sleep.

Attaining this condition with flesh subdued by sleep, the spirit sees "his sense slumbering," and free to roam

> Thus, like a falcon, flying here and there
> From cliff to cliff of sleep's far boundaries;
> Seeing the glad and sad, the old and new,
> The good and ill—presently wearieth.
> Then doth it fold its pinions, and sink down
> Into Soul's nest, reaching the dreamless peace
> Prajna. There follows not to that deep state
> Gladness or sadness, good or evil. Life
> Is lifted out of living—soul grows Brahm!

The passing of the soul through all three conditions to final absorption in deity is described in fluent verse with felicitous imagery, though it is doubtful if the reader whose Sanskrit is sadly to seek will share the enlightenment of the Gods who waited "through twenty thousand moons" under the Nyagrodha tree to learn of Indra the nature of Brahm, and at length, hearing the mystic word uttered, "went to their places wise."
